The group also accepted a new definition of "election crimes" and commissioned the first government-sponsored national study on the subject.

Election crimes have been defined as actions that allow ineligible persons to vote, eligible voters to be excluded, or other similar interference. The new definition says such crimes generally involve deceptions, coercion, damage or inaction.

WASHINGTON (AP) — Even the Republican National Committee, long a model of in-the-black budgeting, came out of this year's elections in debt.

Republican officials say the RNC has a $3 million deficit. It's not alone. The Democratic National Committee reported a $4 million bank debt. And party committees such as the Democratic Congressional Campaign Committee, the National Republican Senatorial Campaign and the National Republican Congressional Campaign are all reporting deficits after the most expensive midterm election.

The RNC's post-election report to the Federal Election Commission shows $6.2 million cash in hand, but officials said that money has already been spent or committed to be spent. The DNC reported $4.7 million cash on hand as of Nov. 27.

Support For White House Bid Eludes All But A Few, Polls Show (CQ)

By Marie Horrigan

Congressional Quarterly, December 8, 2006

With no incumbent president or vice president considering a run, the 2008 presidential race is described as one of the most wide-open in years. But two new polls indicate that at this early point in the race, only a few candidates in either party enjoy significant support.

The surveys, released separately Thursday by Fox News and the Marist College Institute for Public Opinion, both showed New York Sen. Hillary Rodham Clinton of New York with a more than 2-to-1 lead over the rest of the Democratic field.

Clinton was supported by 33 percent of respondents in both surveys. Her closest competition comes from three people who, like her, have not officially declared their intentions: 2000 presidential nominee Al Gore, freshman Illinois Sen. Barack Obama and former North Carolina Sen. John Edwards.

Obama was backed by 12 percent of respondents in both surveys. Gore was just ahead of him in the Marist poll, but trailed Obama by 1 percentage point in the Fox News poll, conducted by Opinion Dynamics.

Edwards, the Democrats' 2004 vice presidential nominee, trailed Gore and Obama in the Fox News poll, where he registered 8 percent. However, he was tied with Gore in the Marist poll.

The remaining Democrats were mired in single digits in both polls. That group included 2004 presidential nominee, Massachusetts Sen. John Kerry, and the two declared candidates in the race, Iowa Gov. Tom Vilsack and Indiana Sen. Evan Bayh.

Larry Shiman, a vice president at Opinion Dynamics, told CQPolitics.com he was surprised by the strength of Clinton's lead. "It's no lock, but she's certainly in a very stronger position and a little bit stronger than what I expected," he said of her results.

Among Republicans, the surveys showed former New York City Mayor Rudy Giuliani and Arizona Sen. John McCain leading the pack.

Giuliani led in both surveys, though he was statistically tied with McCain in the Marist poll, which showed Giuliani at 24 percent compared to 23 percent for McCain. The Fox News poll gave Giuliani a larger lead over McCain, 30 percent to 23 percent.

The Marist poll also showed solid support for Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice, who was backed by 15 percent of respondents. Rice, who has consistently denied holding presidential aspirations, was not included in the Fox News poll.

Other Republicans, including Kansas Sen. Sam Brownback, who announced his campaign Monday, trailed with single-digit percentages.

With 23 months until the election and more than a year until the first nominating contest in Iowa, pollsters caution against viewing the leads as prohibitive — most of the candidates are largely unknown to many Americans, and surveys taken this far out from previous elections have proven poor predictors of the actual outcomes.

Usually, such skepticism also is rooted in the belief that the public is not engaged in politics so far out from the election, but the Fox News poll indicates interest is already running high: Nearly seven out of 10 respondents described themselves as "very" or "extremely" interested in the presidential election.

The recent midterm elections, ongoing fighting in Iraq and long-awaited release of the Iraq Study Group's report on that conflict have kept politics in the front of voters minds, Shiman said.

Both pollsters underscored the electability of the top candidates. While Clinton amassed an enormous campaign chest for the 2006 election and had $13.9 million in cash as of Oct. 18, despite spending more $29.5 million on her Senate election, she scored poorly outside her own party.

The problem for Giuliani, however, is flipped — many voters remain unaware of his liberal stances on social issues including gun control, abortion rights and gay marriage, which could make it difficult for him to win over the conservatives that make up a large part of the Republican primary voting base.

"The problem for [Giuliani] is to continue to be acceptable to Republican primary voters. Right now most of them find his ideology to be fine — but then again, they don't know that much about him," said Lee M. Miringoff, director of polling for Marist College.

Clinton and Rice, the Marist poll suggested, will have to counter public ambivalence about their possible candidacies: Half of the respondents asked each woman not to run for president.

What was unclear from their poll, Miringoff told CQPolitics.com, was whether voters' impression of Clinton was implacable.

"There's just a huge number of people who would not consider voting for Hillary Clinton; it's close to half the electorate," he said. "And that means she's either got to drive that number down or there's not a lot of room for error in the campaign."

The WNBC/Marist Poll was conducted over the telephone from Nov. 27 to Dec. 3 with 1,229 adults, 967 of whom were registered voters, and had an error margin of plus or minus 3 percentage points. The Fox News Poll was conducted over the telephone from Dec. 5-6 with 900 registered voters, and also had an error margin of plus or minus 3 percentage points.

For Now, An Unofficial Rivalry (WP)

By Charles Babington And Shailagh Murray

The Washington Post, December 8, 2006

On Wednesday night, Sen. Edward M. Kennedy hosted the nine Democratic members of his health and education committee at an intimate dinner in his home in Washington's Kalorama neighborhood. The surroundings were stylish, the food home-cooked and tasty.

And then there was the entertainment.

The gathering included a former presidential candidate, Sen. Tom Harkin of Iowa, and a close friend of Kennedy's, Sen. Christopher J. Dodd of Connecticut. But the star attractions were Hillary Rodham Clinton of New York and Barack Obama of Illinois, two junior committee members who may be duking it out for the 2008 Democratic presidential nomination in a matter of months.

The air was thick with ambition. "I don't know why we're here, Bernie," Rep. Sherrod Brown (Ohio) quipped to a fellow senator-elect, Rep. Bernard Sanders (I-Vt.), as the guests walked into the dining room.

Neither Clinton nor Obama has formally declared a candidacy, but their rivalry is already the talk of the chamber, an amusing sideshow for Democrats and Republicans -- at least the handful who aren't weighing their own White House bids.

Kennedy (Mass.) tried not to play favorites on Wednesday, seating the two superstars on his right and left at dinner. But the dais of his committee will be another matter next year, after Obama joins the panel in January: According to seniority rules, the two are likely to be seated next to each other, toward the end. There they will vie for prominence on major issues such as stem cell research, the minimum wage and college tuition subsidies.

In the fishbowl of the Senate, interactions between Clinton and Obama are frequent and closely scrutinized. During a routine vote yesterday morning, Obama and Clinton brushed past each other on the Senate floor. Obama winked and touched Clinton on her elbow. Without pausing, she kept walking.

The 100-member Senate has never run short of presidential wannabes, but this time, Democrats worry that the clash of titans will overshadow their legislative agenda, leaving mere mortals grasping for notice and potentially compromising the party's efforts to expand its Senate majority.

"Everybody's going to be fighting for oxygen at a very high altitude," said Sen. Ron Wyden (D-Ore.).

Colleagues say Clinton and Obama appear to genuinely admire each other. So far, they claim to see zero evidence of public rancor. "Everybody gets along just fine," Harkin said. Kennedy described the pair as "extra-dimensional individuals" and asserted in an interview: "There's no sort of pettiness or jealousy that I see. They understand the momentous nature of what the search for the presidency is all about."

Behind the scenes, of course, it's a slightly different story. "Don't tell Mama, I'm for Obama" has become the Obama campaign's unofficial motto. It's a reference to Clinton's nickname as first lady and an example of the conflicted loyalties of many Democratic political aides. Some are talking to both camps about possible jobs in the presidential campaigns. Meanwhile, Democratic senators who are not considering presidential bids of their own are remaining neutral.

Some Obama allies suspect that Clinton supporters generated recent rumors that former vice president Al Gore is weighing a 2008 bid, hoping to discourage donors from signing up with Obama just yet. On Monday, Obama tiptoed onto Clinton's turf, traveling to Manhattan to talk with big-time Democratic donors such as George Soros.

Speaking later to reporters, he made a point of praising Clinton. "I think she is tough, I think she is disciplined, I think she is smart, and I'm not one of those people who believe she can't win," Obama said. "I recognize it's fun to set these things up as a contest between the two of us."

Clinton has been less effusive. She rarely comments publicly on Obama, and when she does, it's often in snippets. She declined a request to be interviewed for this article. In October, she said "it's great" that he is thinking of running for president. And Democrats credit her for letting Obama and a first-term senator, Ken Salazar (D-Colo.), headline a Capitol Hill media event last year while other senior Democrats grumbled about their nonspeaking roles.

Some of Clinton's chief supporters, however, have been less charitable. John Catsimatidis, a supermarket magnate and Clinton donor, said yesterday of Obama: "He might be ready for prime time, but I think it's too early."

Clinton and Obama were unusual senators from the start. They hired established, high-level staffers such as Pete Rouse, who was chief of staff for former Senate majority leader Thomas A. Daschle (S.D.) and took the same job in Obama's office, and Tamera Luzzatto, the former top aide to Sen. John D. Rockefeller IV (W.Va.), who now runs Clinton's staff.

Both senators maintained low profiles, at least at first, restricting most public activities to home-state events. Despite their megawatt qualities, both were deferential to older colleagues, and both made friends and co-sponsored legislation with Republicans.

Because Clinton spent eight years in the White House, she is a particular anomaly, escorted through the corridors by a security detail and rarely engaging in hallway banter with reporters before and after votes. On Tuesday, Obama lingered by the elevators near the Senate floor, feeding quotes on Medicare and tax cuts to a gaggle of scribes. Clinton rushed by a few minutes later, flanked by staff members, and headed straight onto a waiting elevator.

"She likes to stand alone," said one senior Senate staffer.

Clinton's colleagues were surprised when she teamed up with former GOP House speaker Newt Gingrich (Ga.) and Senate Majority Leader Bill Frist (Tenn.) on health-care initiatives, and when she staked out a moderate stance on abortion in a prominent speech in January 2005. But her reluctance to hog the spotlight has earned her considerable goodwill -- to the extent that some of her colleagues have speculated that she might become the top Democratic leader someday, should her presidential bid falter.

Obama, only two years removed from the Illinois legislature, initially stirred jealousy among some colleagues for the rave reviews of his keynote speech at the 2004 Democratic convention. But he earned loads of gratitude and goodwill by campaigning doggedly for fellow Democrats this fall, often drawing the largest crowd of each campaign.

Senators say Obama's explosive rise has startled Clinton and her advisers, who are mulling how to react. With Obama planning a trip to the early-primary state of New Hampshire on Sunday, they may need to decide soon.

"Hang on tight," advised Sen. Richard J. Durbin (D-Ill.), an Obama fan. "They ain't seen nothing yet."

It's A Cheney! (WP)

By Ruth Marcus

The Washington Post, December 8, 2006

My only regret about Mary Cheney's pregnancy is that it didn't happen earlier -- say, during the 2004 presidential race, when Cheney was working for her father's campaign and his running mate was busy trying to write discrimination against people like her into the Constitution.

Imagine a hugely pregnant Mary Cheney sitting in the vice president's box at the convention. Imagine Cheney and her partner, Heather Poe, cuddling their newborn onstage at the victory celebration.

How perfectly that would have illustrated the clanging disconnect between the Republican Party's outmoded intolerance and the benign reality of gay families today.

Better late than never. Cheney's no crusader; she has little interest in becoming the poster mom for gay parenthood. But whether she intends it or not, her pregnancy will, I think, turn out to be a watershed in public understanding and acceptance of the phenomenon. This is the Ellen DeGeneres moment of national politics.

Acceptance won't come immediately, of course, and certainly not from all quarters. The folks who have fits about "Heather Has Two Mommies" are beside themselves over "Heather Is One of Two Mommies." Especially because the other mommy is -- as Mary Cheney is inevitably described -- The Vice President's Openly Gay Daughter.

"Unconscionable," said Janice Crouse of Concerned Women for America. "Her action repudiates traditional values and sets an appalling example for young people at a time when father absence is the most pressing social problem facing the nation," Crouse wrote on the TownHall.com blog. "Her child will have all the material advantages it will need, but it will still encounter the emotional devastation common to children without fathers."

"I think it's tragic that a child has been conceived with the express purpose of denying it a father," pronounced Robert Knight of the Media Research Center. The couple, he said is seeking to "create a culture that is based on sexual anarchy instead of marriage and family values."

I can understand that people -- especially those who have no personal experience with gay families -- are uncomfortable with the notion of children without a parent of each gender. What I can't understand is using words such as "unconscionable" or "tragic" to describe the choice of two people who love each other and want to create a family together.

To be a badly wanted child (one thing that's indisputable about the children of same-sex couples: the parents had to work to make it happen) in a home with two loving parents is no tragedy. If they're worried about "emotional devastation," the Crouses and Knights of the world would do better to reserve their lamentations for children in poverty, those who are abused or neglected, or for children in families splintered by divorce.

As to sexual anarchy, Mary Cheney and Heather Poe represent its antithesis. This is a couple who've been together for 15 years. In her mind, as Cheney told "Primetime Live" this year, "Heather and I already are married. We have built a home and a life together. I hope I get to spend the rest of my life with her. The way I look at it is, we're just waiting for state and federal law to catch up with us."

That could take some time, especially if Mary Cheney's political party has anything to do with it. As a resident of Virginia, which does not permit a gay parent to adopt, Poe will have no legal connection to the child that she and Cheney clearly intend to have and raise together. If the couple were to split up, Poe would have no legal right to see the child.

Virginia's newly adopted and expansively drafted constitutional amendment prohibiting gay marriage casts doubt on the ability of Cheney and Poe to write binding medical directives and wills. Without any legal protection, state or federal, against job discrimination -- the Bush administration opposes extending anti-discrimination laws to cover sexual orientation -- Mary Cheney could be fired simply because she is gay.

In fact, perhaps because it's less susceptible to being hijacked by the extremes, the business world is outpacing the political sphere in recognizing and responding to the new, out-of-the-closet reality of gay Americans. More than half of the Fortune 500 companies offered health benefits for domestic partners this year, up from just 28 a decade earlier, according to the Human Rights Campaign.

The latest issue of Fortune describes how companies seeking to attract and retain gay workers are offering bereavement leave if a same-sex partner dies, adoption assistance or paid leave for gay employees who have children, and relocation help for gay partners when employees are transferred. "Put another way, gay marriage -- an idea that has been banned by all but one of 27 states that have voted on it -- has become a fact of life inside many big companies," the magazine said.

Perhaps Cheney's high-profile pregnancy will help the Republican Party come to grips with those facts of life. If not, though, she's going to have to explain to her child what mommy was doing trying to help a party that doesn't believe in fairness for families like theirs.

The Comptroller's Glass House (NYT)

The New York Times, December 8, 2006

If there is any job that requires extraordinary integrity, it is that of the inspector or watchdog. The official who investigates others has to keep his own house cleaner than clean. Otherwise, any criticisms can too easily disappear in a hail of counter-criticisms and claims of hypocrisy. This is the problem that Alan Hevesi, New York State's comptroller, faces as his office audits everything from school boards to the state's racing board. When he bars a Medicaid provider because of overpayments or asks a school district to tighten its controls or details the weaknesses in oversight of gambling, the easy political response is, "Who are you to point a finger?"

For over three years Mr. Hevesi was unlawfully allowing the state to pay in full for a car and driver for his ailing wife. He has apologized, repeatedly, and is now in the process of paying back the state for the misuse of taxpayer money. Despite all this, he was re-elected, and his supporters say he should thus be allowed to serve another term.

But an election cannot overcome the possibility that Mr. Hevesi violated state law, as charged by the State Ethics Commission. Moreover, as each new release of the details about Mrs. Hevesi's chauffeur and car has become available, it has become clear that Mr. Hevesi's behavior was at odds with the way a comptroller, or any other state official, should do business.

Take a recent comptroller's report criticizing the state Health Department for not reviewing files in a "timely manner" in order to discontinue Medicaid benefits for those who were disqualified, including 34 who were dead. The impact of the report was muted by Mr. Hevesi's own failure to pay back the state for the use of a driver in a timely manner.

Then there is the problem of records. If you read through the audits from any comptroller's office, many of the strongest criticisms concern the way records are kept. Record-keeping, in fact, is the meat and potatoes of public accountability. Yet, Mr. Hevesi "failed to take a single step to ensure that proper records were maintained so that the proper reimbursement amounts could eventually be calculated," wrote David Kelley, the special counsel appointed by Gov. George Pataki for this case. At this point, there are three continuing investigations of Mr. Hevesi. The others are by Attorney General Eliot Spitzer's office and by Albany County's district attorney, David Soares.

Those investigations will take time and drain resources, while it is already clear that Mr. Hevesi's record in this matter is not up to the standards of his job. His own words should remind him of what is at stake. When a former Oswego mayor was questioned about $3,500 in spending on dining and travel, Mr. Hevesi said, "We take a zero-tolerance approach to local officials who abuse their position and use public money for their own benefit."

That is exactly why Mr. Hevesi should resign instead of expecting to be sworn in for a new term. The Legislature and Mr. Spitzer, the incoming governor, should pick a replacement — not a political crony but a person who can criticize others from a position of strength and rectitude.

US Still Hopes For NKorea Nuclear Talks This Month (AFP)

AFP, December 8, 2006

The United States said it had not "thrown in the towel" on efforts to resume nuclear disarmament negotiations with North Korea this month, but admitted it could still take weeks to organize the talks.

"We would still hope that we could get some discussions, get a new round of talks going this month," State Department spokesman Sean McCormack said.

"We're not ready to throw in the towel at this point," he added after preliminary meetings between US, North Korean and Chinese diplomats in Beijing last week failed to overcome obstacles to a resumption of broader negotiations also involving South Korea, Japan and Russia.

But the State Department official said Washington was "also not going to try to push to get something done in December if that means those talks aren't as well prepared as they possibly can be".

"If it's a matter of slipping things a few weeks, then so be it, we will," he said.

"The key is to get back to the table in a timely manner and in a way in which the conditions have been created so you can make some progress," he said.

McCormack was responding to reported comments by an unnamed North Korean diplomat who told the Russian news agency Interfax that formal negotiations could not resume this month as hoped.

"The renewal of the talks process in December 2006 is not possible nor is it -- without changes in the American position -- in the foreseeable future," Interfax quoted the diplomat as saying after the latest round of talks in Beijing.

North Korea agreed in principle in October to return to the six-party negotiations after being hit with UN sanctions for having carried out its first test of a nuclear bomb earlier in the month.

The six-party talks began in late 2003 but Pyongyang walked away from the process a year ago after Washington imposed financial sanctions on the country that were not directly related to the nuclear issue.

A possible easing of those sanctions is one of the carrots being offered by Washington if Pyongyang will return to negotiations on the basis of a September 2005 agreement under which it pledged to give up its nuclear weapons program.

According to Interfax, the North Korean diplomat said he government was demanding as a condition for renewed negotiations "the removal of American nuclear weapons from South Korea and other countries of the region".

McCormack reaffirmed the US position, reaffirmed in the September 2005 pact with North Korea, that the United States "has no nuclear weapons on the Korean Peninsula and has no intention to attack or invade the DPRK (North Korea) with nuclear or conventional weapons."

Analysts: U.S. At Root Of Effort To Topple Lebanese Government (MCT)

By Tom Lasseter

McClatchy Newspapers, December 8, 2006

BEIRUT, Lebanon - American political leaders watched with alarm during the past week as the Hezbollah militia laid siege to the U.S.-backed Lebanese government, but few would acknowledge publicly what most analysts and politicians here say is obvious: American policy may bear much of the blame.

Many in Beirut say that U.S. failure to stop Israel's onslaught against Hezbollah last summer crippled the Lebanese government - a U.S. ally - while strengthening Hezbollah - a U.S. enemy. That created an environment in which the Shiite Muslim militia could call for overthrowing Sunni Muslim Prime Minister Fuad Saniora and his Cabinet.

"Hezbollah has more support in the population now because they are the `victorious resistance,'" Cabinet member Ahmed Fatfat said. "And it weakened the government because we did not get any concessions ... the last war was a disaster for Lebanon and the image of the United States."

Fatfat, like several other Cabinet members, has been in hiding at the government building in downtown Beirut for days as tens of thousands of protesters outside demand a new administration led by Hezbollah, a group that's on the U.S. State Department's list of terrorist organizations.

The standoff between Shiite Hezbollah and its allies and the Christian and Sunni government has sparked street fighting in Beirut's neighborhoods and raised the specter of civil war.

It's also underscored a belief among some regional leaders that the United States has lost its footing in the Middle East. On Tuesday, the bipartisan Iraq Study Group recommended in Washington that the Bush administration reach out to Syria and Iran - U.S. foes - in a search for ways to resolve Iraq's violence. The group called for Syria to cease aid to Hezbollah and to stop trying to topple Saniora's government as part of a deal that might include Israel returning the Golan Heights to Syria.

But those suggestions seem behind the times as Hezbollah presses its campaign to force Saniora out.

Fatfat and other Lebanese officials said that while there was a complex set of reasons for the crisis - Syria is trying to derail a tribunal from investigating Syrian participation in political assassinations, Shiites long have felt underrepresented by their government, Iran is pushing against U.S. interests across the region - the conditions largely were set by U.S. actions during the conflict last summer.

The fighting began in July when Hezbollah kidnapped two Israeli soldiers, an act that began weeks of thunderous Israeli bombing and artillery barrages - often using munitions bought from U.S. suppliers - that killed at least 1,000 Lebanese, mostly civilians. Hezbollah answered by launching hundreds of rockets into Israel.

Saniora pleaded with American officials to intervene, but for weeks Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice and others said there first must be a "durable solution," meaning primarily that Hezbollah had to be contained and then disarmed.

As the fighting stretched on for more than a month and the Bush administration didn't intervene, Saniora looked ineffectual, a nearly unforgivable sin in a region in which military force and political strength are often synonymous.

"This summer was a catastrophe on many levels. This summer was bad news," said a Western diplomat in Beirut, who spoke only on condition of anonymity because of the sensitivity of the situation. "In general, Lebanon is in a much, much weaker position now than it was in June. There's no question at all levels - politically, economically, in terms of unity - everything is much worse now than it was in June."

How did the U.S. response contribute to that?

"It was painful to be here this summer, you know. I'll just leave it at that," the diplomat said.

Hezbollah officials have harped on the Lebanese government's reliance on U.S. help at a time when American policy makers weren't putting pressure on Israel to stop its aerial bombardment.

"It's no coincidence that all those who supported Israel in the war are today supporting what remains of this falling government," Hezbollah leader Hassan Nasrallah said Thursday night via video feed to a cheering crowd of thousands.

"Does any Lebanese accept ... supporting a government that George Bush and (Israeli Prime Minister) Ehud Olmert support?" he asked.

The sea of men, women and children booed and screamed for the government's downfall.

Asked for comment, a representative at the U.S. Embassy in Beirut referred a McClatchy reporter to remarks by Rice last summer in which she said any peace deal had to ensure that Lebanon didn't return to its "status quo," again meaning that Hezbollah must be brought under control.

But Hezbollah now appears more in control than ever.

The United Nations Security Council resolution - with American approval - that ended hostilities in August mandated that Lebanese and United Nations troops patrol southern Lebanon, Hezbollah's heartland. The introduction of soldiers in the south, where the militant group was used to complete freedom of movement, probably ordained that Hezbollah would move against the government.

Hezbollah "knew all along that Saniora's government is pro-American and wants to disarm them as a military organization," said Hilal Khashan, a political studies professor at the American University of Beirut who's written extensively about the group.

The push against Saniora was an easy sell to Hezbollah's rank and file.

"Saniora's government did not help us during the war," said Hussein Ali, who was sitting with a group of friends across from his shoe store in a southern suburb of Beirut.

Ahmed Musalmani, who sells ceramic tiles, added: "And Fuad Saniora was kissing Condoleezza Rice."

DOJ_NMG_0103878

Rubble from Israeli bombing runs stood in piles throughout the neighborhood. Where buildings once stood, craters were carved in the ground. Collapsed roofs leaned against fragments of walls.

The two men were with a group that was heading to join the demonstration downtown outside the building where Fatfat and his fellow ministers were living behind armed guards.

"You cannot play with Hezbollah," Ali said. "We are going to bring down the government."

Hezbollah Vows End To Lebanon Government (AP)

By Sam F. Ghattas

AP, December 8, 2006

Hezbollah leader Sheik Hassan Nasrallah promised thousands of supporters Thursday that they would eventually bring down Lebanon's Western-backed government, but the prime minister vowed to stand firm against protesters.

It was the seventh day of street demonstrations by Hezbollah and other pro-Syrian parties aimed at pressuring Prime Minister Fuad Saniora to quit in a deepening political crisis threatening to tear the country apart.

In a rousing speech delivered on huge screens in two central Beirut squares, Nasrallah accused Saniora of conniving with Israel during its monthlong war with Hezbollah last summer. He claimed Saniora ordered the Lebanese army to confiscate Hezbollah's supplies of weapons — his sharpest attack on the prime minister since the August cease-fire that ended the fighting.

"Didn't the prime minister of Lebanon work to cut off the supply lines?" Nasrallah said. He added that government officials had asked American envoys to persuade Israel to destroy Hezbollah.

"Those are the ones responsible for the war, not the resistance," Nasrallah said.

Hezbollah has gained increasing political clout after the war, which began after Hezbollah guerrillas snatched two Israeli soldiers patrolling the south Lebanon border. It wants to topple Saniora's government because it has rejected demands for forming a national unity government that would give the pro-Hezbollah factions veto power in the Cabinet.

Ahmed Fatfat, who was acting interior minister during the war, dismissed Nasrallah's accusations as "false stories about the war." He told AP Television News the charges would strengthen the government's resolve.

Saniora's allies have accused Hezbollah of being influenced by Iran and Syria, which they claim want to destabilize Lebanon by supporting the militant group's plans to oust the government.

Nasrallah said protests would continue until Hezbollah's demands are met. But he also said he was prepared to negotiate and that the Shiite guerrillas would use arms only against Israelis.

"We are a people that will not be defeated in the battle of wills," he said to roars from the crowd. "We will not leave the streets before achieving the goal that saves Lebanon."

It was only the second time Nasrallah addressed a mass rally since the August cease-fire. For security reasons, he did not appear but spoke via video link.

He addressed warnings from politicians and the army commander that the mass protests could drag Lebanon back to the sectarian civil war of 1975-1990.

"We will not lift our weapons in the face of anyone," Nasrallah said. "We will defeat you with our voices.

The army, overstretched with keeping Beirut's streets clear of blockades and clashing protesters, called for calm for the second time in four days.

"Offering sacrifices for the sake of the nation is not a duty of soldiers only, but it is a duty of all the nation's sons, specifically their political and spiritual leaders," the army said in a circular to soldiers that also addressed the politicians.

Saniora, emboldened by international support for his U.S.-backed government, insisted he would not give in to protesters. He spoke to hundreds of supporters outside his offices, where he has been hold up, ringed by troops, riot police and barbed wire.

"We are standing fast, believing in the justness of our position," Saniora said.

Nasrallah's speech appeared to be an attempt to rouse supporters for a massive demonstration planned in Beirut on Sunday.

A Sudanese envoy, who arrived in Beirut on Thursday for talks with the rival factions, said the street protests should end, but supported the opposition's call for a broader-based government.

"The basis of a solution must be founded on the formation of a national unity government and withdrawal of dialogue from the street to parliament," said Mustafa Osman Ismail, the envoy of Sudanese President Omar al-Bashir.

Thousands of Hezbollah supporters have staged nightly protests in Beirut, and tents have sprung up in two city squares, shutting down shops and paralyzing the heart of the capital.

Syrian Vice President Farouk al-Sharaa, meanwhile, denied his country was interfering in Lebanon's internal affairs. Instead, he accused unnamed foreign powers of using Lebanon against Damascus.

He added that Syria will not send back its army to Lebanon "no matter what happens."

Syria withdrew its troops from Lebanon last year under heavy international pressure, after the assassination of former Prime Minister Rafik Hariri. Syria's Lebanese opponents blamed Damascus for the killing, a charge it denies.

Hezbollah's Leader Vows To Continue Protests (NYT)

By Nada Bakri And Michael Slackman

The New York Times, December 8, 2006

BEIRUT, Lebanon, Dec. 7 — Ratcheting up pressure on the besieged American-backed government of Lebanon, the Hezbollah leader Sheik Hassan Nasrallah insisted Thursday night that his followers would not leave the streets until their demands for more power were met. He also appeared to accuse government officials of trying to have him killed during the war with Israel.

With fears of a civil war running high in Beirut, Sheik Nasrallah's speech seemed calculated to bolster thousands of Hezbollah's supporters who have been camped in tents downtown, while also warning those followers against engaging in sectarian violence that could spread and possibly hurt Hezbollah's chances of appealing to more than its Shiite base. The speech also asked Arab governments in the region not to take sides in the conflict.

In an impassioned speech broadcast live on two large screens in downtown Beirut and throughout the region on satellite channels, Sheik Nasrallah told the government and its supporters that they were dreaming if they thought his alliance would end its protest, now in its seventh day, before it won a larger share of government power. And he called on all his supporters to hold another mass demonstration downtown on Sunday, raising the prospect of hundreds of thousands of demonstrators once again pouring into central Beirut, as they did last week.

"Tell them today, from the square of the strike, tell them tomorrow during the Friday Prayer, tell them every night, tell them on Sunday during the great gathering, tell them after Sunday, that you who bet on our surrender are deluded, deluded, deluded," he said, to chants of "We will follow you, Nasrallah."

Although Hezbollah has said before that the government had effectively colluded with Israel in the hope that its bombing campaign would destroy Hezbollah's militia, on Thursday, Sheik Nasrallah went a step further, saying that a government agency tried to find out where he was staying during the war and that the government worked to block the resupply of Hezbollah during the battle.

And he threatened to name names.

"Those who sat with the Americans and requested from them that Israel launch a war against us, they know themselves, and I know them, and I hope that the day will not come when I would say their names," he said.

He also said Hezbollah rejected civil war between Lebanon's ethnic or political groups. "We reject any armed clash in the street, and we also reject any kind of confrontation in the street," he said. "Tell the Lebanese and all nations in the region, whoever pushes matters in the direction of civil war, in civil war, everyone is a loser."

But while Sheik Nasrallah said Hezbollah and its allies were open to dialogue to resolve the crisis, those aligned with the government said his remarks were so filled with personal attacks that it appeared that what he was after was to "crush" the so-called March 14 coalition, which is struggling to maintain its control of the government.

"It was a very dangerous speech and very dangerous accusations which will have negative consequences," said Wael Bou Faour, a member of the March 14 coalition and a member of Parliament.

Lebanon has been caught in a tense standoff over the makeup of its government and the direction of the country ever since the end of Hezbollah's 34-day war with Israel in the summer. Hezbollah emerged emboldened after having survived the war — and having bloodied Israel. But it also emerged angry with the American-backed government. Hezbollah says its goal is to form a national unity government and to bring all parties into the cabinet, including the Free Patriotic Movement, led by Michel Aoun, a Christian and a former general. But Hezbollah has also insisted that its alliance have veto power over all government decisions — and a large enough bloc in the cabinet to allow it to bring down the government if Hezbollah's allies were all to resign at once. The governing coalition has offered a compromise formula, which Hezbollah and its allies have so far rejected.

Now Hezbollah is saying that if it does not get its unity government, which would allow the prime minister, Fouad Siniora, to stay in office, it will press for a complete collapse of the government and early elections.

The protests have raised tensions and fears of sectarian violence all over Beirut. On Sunday, a Shiite demonstrator was killed during clashes in a Sunni neighborhood and since then, the army has cautioned that if a political solution is not found, it could lose control of the streets.

Several demonstrators said the main message they took away from Sheik Nasrallah's speech was to avoid clashes.

"If he didn't speak today, maybe things would have deteriorated and we would have started fighting against each other," said Hussein Harfoush, 23. "I think everyone would have got involved in fights because people are very tense."

The outcome of this political battle not only will not only influence Lebanon's domestic politics, but also will affect the balance of power throughout the Middle East. Hezbollah is allied with Iran and Syria, while the governing coalition is aligned with the United States and France. The United States has looked to Lebanon as a bulkhead to thwart growing Iranian influence in the Middle East.

The government has accused Hezbollah of taking this political battle to the streets simply to help Syria try to block the formation of an international tribunal to hear evidence in the assassination of Rafik Hariri, a former Lebanese prime minister. A United Nations Security Council investigation has implicated Syrian officials in the killing.

Lebanon Feels Heat Of Sunni-Shiite Friction (USAT)

By Jeffrey Stinson

USA Today, December 8, 2006

BEIRUT — Lebanon's week-long political crisis is driving a deep and potentially violent wedge between Shiite and Sunni Muslims like this nation hasn't seen before.

"This is the worst ever," Abdo Saad, director of the Beirut Center for Research and Information, says of the rift. "It's very dangerous."

The political crisis reflects the growing influence of Shiites, and as in all matters political in Lebanon, there are religious overtones to the conflict.

"Sectarian tensions are high," says Mohammed Kalhani, a Sunni member of the majority coalition in parliament. "Shiites and Sunnis are opposing each other. That's something we never found in the past."

After decades of fighting in Lebanon that pitted its many groups against each other, clear Sunni-Shiite fault lines have emerged over the past few months as Hezbollah, a militant group, has launched a forceful effort to gain more power for itself and other Shiites and, opponents say, for its key supporters: Syria and Iran.

The crisis is most evident in downtown Beirut. Protesters led by Hezbollah have camped there for a week and vow to stay until the government resigns and gives them greater say over policy. The government, led by Prime Minister Fuad Saniora, a Sunni, refuses to give in.

The divisions can be seen and heard across the capital — in places such as the Shiite neighborhood of Haret Hreyk and the predominantly Sunni district of Tarik el Jdideh.

In Haret Hreyk, Housain Baroud, 35, a Shiite who runs a restaurant that sells sandwiches, says the split with Sunnis is palpable since the political struggle mushroomed.

A cold politeness characterizes even simple transactions among Muslims. "The tension, you see it now," he says after making change for a Sunni who walked in but didn't buy anything.

Baroud supports Hezbollah and its effort to gain greater political power in the government. The reasons, he says, are clear, pointing at the new floor, ceiling, tables and marble counter in his restaurant.

Half of it was paid for by a $3,000 grant from Hezbollah, which offered to help Baroud after the restaurant was badly damaged during the militant group's 34-day fight with Israel in the summer. The government has given him nothing, Baroud says.

Much of Hezbollah's newfound support comes from the conflict that erupted after the group, which is armed and gets financial support from Syria and Iran, staged a cross-border raid and captured two Israeli soldiers July 12. The two soldiers' whereabouts remain unknown. Israel sent forces into Lebanon and launched a bombing campaign aimed at neutralizing Hezbollah.

Israeli airstrikes flattened or damaged dozens of buildings in mainly Shiite southern Beirut, including Haret Hreyk. Buildings, many of them pockmarked from shrapnel, are separated by empty lots where businesses and apartment blocks once stood.

Israel failed to uproot the militant group, which saw its prestige grow among Shiites and other Lebanese as a result of its staying power. A cease-fire declared Aug. 14 halted the fighting. "I'm with Hezbollah 100%," Baroud says. "Hezbollah means to us dignity. They held off Israel."

That support may translate power on the battlefield into political gains for Shiites, who represent at least 32% of Lebanon's population, according to Saad of the Beirut Center.

Baroud is among Lebanon's Shiites who say they have been ignored by Sunni-led governments and the time has come — thanks to Hezbollah — for better representation. "How can you live in harmony and some people feel that others don't exist?" he asks.

The mood is darker in the Tarik el Jdideh area of West Beirut, a mostly Sunni area. It's been tense here since Sunday, when a Shiite youth was killed by gunfire while he passed through the district on his way home from the downtown demonstrations.

Tanks, armored vehicles and troops have set up checkpoints and barricades around Tarik el Jdideh. "Day after day, it is becoming more tense," says Mohamad Housami, 28, who works in a fruit-drink bar.

Housami says the cause of the widening divide between Sunni and Shiite Muslims is clear. "The Shiites have become more radical," he says. "If things keep the way they are going, it could be civil war: Muslims against Muslims."

Support for Saniora's government runs deep here. His governing coalition of Sunnis, Christians and Druse, was elected on an anti-Syrian platform after Damascus ended its nearly 30-year occupation of Lebanon. The withdrawal of Syrian troops was prompted by protests after the assassination of former prime minister Rafik Hariri, a Sunni critic of Syria's presence.

Resentment toward Hezbollah is high here — and not just because some Sunnis fear Syria could regain control of Lebanese affairs if Hezbollah gets the power it seeks.

There's also deep-seated resentment against Hezbollah for inciting the summer war with Israel. The conflict caused $2.8 billion in direct damage to roads, bridges, businesses and housing. "It was an unforgivable mistake," Mustafa Abbass, 63, a candy shop owner, says of the war. "Now, (Hezbollah) is trying to put pressure on the government for more power. This government is legitimate. It has popular support."

Government supporters such as Abbass suspect Hezbollah is staging its protest to derail an international tribunal that would try suspects in Hariri's murder. Hezbollah may also be trying to prevent the implementation of a U.N. resolution demanding that the group disarm.

President Emile Lahoud and parliament Speaker Nabih Berri, both of whom are pro-Syrian, say the Cabinet has lost its legitimacy since five Hezbollah members of the government resigned in October. They say the Cabinet no longer represents Lebanon's religious diversity, as required by the constitution.

The crisis has many worried about the future of Sunni and Shiite relations. Among them is Nouhad Srouji, 42, a Sunni who owns a clothing shop here. A mother of three, she is married to a Shiite. She and her husband no longer talk politics to keep the peace, she says.

"I'm very worried about the situation," she says. "And I'm very worried for my children. I'm telling them that if they grow up to be Shiite, marry a Shiite."

Mahmoud Abbas Weighs Options On Hamas (AP)

By Karin Laub

DOJ_NMG_0103882

AP, December 8, 2006

A panel has advised Palestinian President Mahmoud Abbas to leave the militant Hamas group in power for now, but call new elections after the economic crisis in the Palestinian territories worsens further, a member of the group said Thursday.

In Gaza, meanwhile, some 2,000 supporters of Abbas' Fatah movement marched against the Hamas government Thursday, demanding it move to end the economic boycott imposed by the West for the Islamic group's refusal to renounce violence, recognize Israel and accept existing peace deals.

A leader of the march, identified only as Abu Moussa, said there would be a "revolution of the hungry against this government" if Hamas failed to act.

Abbas had sought to end the economic boycott by pushing Hamas to join Fatah in a coalition government. But talks broke down last week and Abbas has since been weighing three options: leave Hamas in power, dismiss the government or call a referendum on holding new elections.

Abbas declined to discuss the options when speaking to reporters Thursday in Ramallah. Although talks with Hamas have hit an impasse, he said new negotiations were still possible.

"Unfortunately, our dialogue hit a dead end, although we should keep up hope to have a national unity government," he said.

Abbas, who discussed the three options late Wednesday with a panel of PLO members, is expected to announce a decision on how to move forward next week. All three choices have serious drawbacks.

Leaving Hamas in power would mean the international aid boycott would remain in place. If Abbas dismissed the government, the Hamas-dominated parliament could block any attempt to install a new Cabinet. And Fatah would not be guaranteed to win new elections should they be held.

Saleh Raafat, a member of the panel that met with Abbas, said a combination of two options is being considered.

"We have two recommendations," said Raafat, who represents the PLO's small FIDA Party. "The first is leaving Hamas in power while Fatah constitutes the opposition and gives Hamas a chance to solve the crisis. If it can't do so, then we have to resort to the second choice, a referendum on early elections."

"We are going to give Hamas a chance to solve the crisis, but I am sure it will not pass the test. It will not succeed unless it changes (its positions)," he said.

Hamas, however, appears increasingly confident it can keep its government afloat without Western aid, mainly with financial help from the Arab world. Hamas has denounced the idea of early elections and said it would not relinquish power.

"If we won't have a national unity government, we will not abandon our duty," said Deputy Finance Minister Samir Abu Aisha. "We will keep running the government, even with minimal aid."

Labor Minister Mohammed Barghouti of Hamas said donations from Arab countries could keep the government afloat, citing a pledge by Qatar for $40 million a month to cover the salaries of teachers and some health workers.

"Adding to that the local revenues and the decrease in running costs, I think we can manage to keep running the Palestinian Authority," Barghouti said.

Independent economists say the government remains in deep trouble. U.N. groups are asking for a record $450 million in aid to prevent a further economic deterioration in the territories.

According to the U.N., 65 percent of Palestinians are living in poverty and 29 percent are unemployed. The Palestinian health care system is running out of medicine and on the verge of collapse, and nearly half of all Palestinians don't have reliable access to food.

Speaking Frankly About Israel And Palestine (LAT)

By Jimmy Carter

The Los Angeles Times, December 8, 2006

I SIGNED A CONTRACT with Simon & Schuster two years ago to write a book about the Middle East, based on my personal observations as the Carter Center monitored three elections in Palestine and on my consultations with Israeli political leaders and peace activists.

We covered every Palestinian community in 1996, 2005 and 2006, when Yasser Arafat and later Mahmoud Abbas were elected president and members of parliament were chosen. The elections were almost flawless, and turnout was very high — except in East Jerusalem, where, under severe Israeli restraints, only about 2% of registered voters managed to cast ballots.

The many controversial issues concerning Palestine and the path to peace for Israel are intensely debated among Israelis and throughout other nations — but not in the United States. For the last 30 years, I have witnessed and experienced the severe restraints on any free and balanced discussion of the facts. This reluctance to criticize any policies of the Israeli government is because of the extraordinary lobbying efforts of the American-Israel Political Action Committee and the absence of any significant contrary voices.

It would be almost politically suicidal for members of Congress to espouse a balanced position between Israel and Palestine, to suggest that Israel comply with international law or to speak in defense of justice or human rights for Palestinians. Very few would ever deign to visit the Palestinian cities of Ramallah, Nablus, Hebron, Gaza City or even Bethlehem and talk to the beleaguered residents. What is even more difficult to comprehend is why the editorial pages of the major newspapers and magazines in the United States exercise similar self-restraint, quite contrary to private assessments expressed quite forcefully by their correspondents in the Holy Land.

With some degree of reluctance and some uncertainty about the reception my book would receive, I used maps, text and documents to describe the situation accurately and to analyze the only possible path to peace: Israelis and Palestinians living side by side within their own internationally recognized boundaries. These options are consistent with key U.N. resolutions supported by the U.S. and Israel, official American policy since 1967, agreements consummated by Israeli leaders and their governments in 1978 and 1993 (for which they earned Nobel Peace Prizes), the Arab League's offer to recognize Israel in 2002 and the International Quartet's "Roadmap for Peace," which has been accepted by the PLO and largely rejected by Israel.

The book is devoted to circumstances and events in Palestine and not in Israel, where democracy prevails and citizens live together and are legally guaranteed equal status.

Although I have spent only a week or so on a book tour so far, it is already possible to judge public and media reaction. Sales are brisk, and I have had interesting interviews on TV, including "Larry King Live," "Hardball," "Meet the Press," "The NewsHour With Jim Lehrer," the "Charlie Rose" show, C-SPAN and others. But I have seen few news stories in major newspapers about what I have written.

Book reviews in the mainstream media have been written mostly by representatives of Jewish organizations who would be unlikely to visit the occupied territories, and their primary criticism is that the book is anti-Israel. Two members of Congress have been publicly critical. Incoming House Speaker Nancy Pelosi for instance, issued a statement (before the book was published) saying that "he does not speak for the Democratic Party on Israel." Some reviews posted on Amazon.com call me "anti-Semitic," and others accuse the book of "lies" and "distortions." A former Carter Center fellow has taken issue with it, and Alan Dershowitz called the book's title "indecent."

Out in the real world, however, the response has been overwhelmingly positive. I've signed books in five stores, with more than 1,000 buyers at each site. I've had one negative remark — that I should be tried for treason — and one caller on C-SPAN said that I was an anti-Semite. My most troubling experience has been the rejection of my offers to speak, for free, about the book on university campuses with high Jewish enrollment and to answer questions from students and professors. I have been most encouraged by prominent Jewish citizens and members of Congress who have thanked me privately for presenting the facts and some new ideas.

The book describes the abominable oppression and persecution in the occupied Palestinian territories, with a rigid system of required passes and strict segregation between Palestine's citizens and Jewish settlers in the West Bank. An enormous imprisonment wall is now under construction, snaking through what is left of Palestine to encompass more and more land for Israeli settlers. In many ways, this is more oppressive than what blacks lived under in South Africa during apartheid. I have made it clear that the motivation is not racism but the desire of a minority of Israelis to confiscate and colonize choice sites in Palestine, and then to forcefully suppress any objections from the displaced citizens. Obviously, I condemn any acts of terrorism or violence against innocent civilians, and I present information about the terrible casualties on both sides.

The ultimate purpose of my book is to present facts about the Middle East that are largely unknown in America, to precipitate discussion and to help restart peace talks (now absent for six years) that can lead to permanent peace for Israel and its neighbors. Another hope is that Jews and other Americans who share this same goal might be motivated to express their views, even publicly, and perhaps in concert. I would be glad to help with that effort.

Annan Alarmed By Worsening Security In Darfur, Impact On Sudan's Neighbors (AFP)

AFP, December 8, 2006

UN chief Kofi Annan, alarmed by reports of mass rapes and other "gross violations of human rights," expressed deep concern about the worsening security situation in Sudan's Darfur region and its impact on neighboring countries.

UN spokesman Stephane Dujarric said the outgoing UN secretary general was "deeply concerned about the worsening security situation in Darfur and its consequences for the wider region, including Chad and the Central African Republic.

"He is alarmed by the devastating impact the violence is having on the civilian population in the region, and strongly condemns the recent attacks and destruction of dozens of villages in North Darfur," Dujarric said in a statement.

More than 80,000 people have been forced to flee their homes in the past six weeks alone, 50,000 of them in Darfur and 30,000 in Chad, according to the statement.

"Several hundred civilians, including women, children and elderly, have been killed, and there are very disturbing reports of mass rapes and other gross violations of human rights," it added.

Annan, who is to be succeeded as UN chief by South Korea's former foreign minister Ban Ki-Moon, also bemoaned the fact that the escalating violence was cutting off almost one million people across Darfur from desperately needed humanitarian relief.

"In both Darfur and Chad, relief workers are being attacked on a daily basis, and dozens of their vehicles have been hijacked in the last few weeks, threatening the humanitarian lifeline for a total of 4.3 million people in the region," the UN statement said.

"Those violating international humanitarian law by attacking civilians and relief workers must be held accountable, it said, adding that Annan had urged Khartoum to restore law and order in areas under its control and called on "all parties to ensure unimpeded humanitarian access to all those in need."

Monday, a former rebel leader allied with Khartoum said that pro-government Sudanese militias were attacking the key Darfur town of El-Fasher, and he threatened to quit the government if the assault was not halted.

"Even as I am talking to you, we are facing a Janjaweed attack on El-Fasher's cattle market," Sudan Liberation Movement chief Minni Minnawi said in Khartoum.

Minnawi signed a peace agreement in May with President Omar al-Beshir's ruling National Congress Party and was subsequently appointed as his adviser.

Two other rebel factions rejected the deal, however, while pro-government forces and their allied Janjaweed militia continued their attacks in Darfur, a vast western region devastated by almost four years of conflict and famine.

According to the UN, the conflict has claimed 200,000 lives and left some two million people displaced.

Paulson Pressed For Progress On China Devaluation (FT)

By Jeremy Grant

Financial Times, December 8, 2006

Hank Paulson, the US Treasury secretary, came under pressure from the Democratic party yesterday to persuade China's government to revalue its currency.

Christopher Dodd, incoming chairman of the influential senate banking committee, said he wanted Mr Paulson to return from a visit to Beijing with firm progress on the revaluation issue.

"I've listened to previous secretaries [of the Treasury] talk about jawboning on this issue and being patient, 'things are moving in the right direction'," Mr Dodd said. "But it's pretty difficult to explain to the American people day after day that a major competitor of ours, now a member of the WTO, is still fixing its own rates at a great disadvantage to us."

His call is a sign the Democrats, fresh from their capture of both houses of congress, appear ready to exert pressure on the Bush administration over the negotiating tactics used to persuade China to budge on the issue.

This week, Mr Paulson has faced questions from manufacturers who blame China for fuelling a record bilateral trade deficit of more than $200bn (£101bn) by maintaining a cheap currency.

Mr Dodd said he would write to Mr Paulson ahead of his visit next week, "to remind [the delegation] that there are a bunch of us here who care about this and who would like to know what sort of commitments they are getting". The delegation includes top-ranking cabinet officials and Ben Bernanke, Federal Reserve chairman.

"This is a big issue. This better be a topic very near the top of what progress they can report when they come back," Mr Dodd said while outlining his agenda.

Mr Paulson is expected to press for greater currency flexibility from Beijing. He also wants to cultivate an "intimate discourse" about long-term economic goals with the Chinese leadership.

Congressional anger appeared to ebb in September when Senators Charles Schumer and Lindsey Graham withdrew legislation threatening to impose tariffs on Chinese goods if China did not take steps to revalue.

It was abandoned as an early show of confidence in Mr Paulson, who sees himself as a bipartisan figure and believes he has credibility on both sides of politics.

John Frisbie, president of the US-China business council, said Mr Paulson had to be given the time he needs to make his approach work.

Treasury officials, meanwhile, are trying to strike a balance between maintaining moderate expectations of what can be achieved on the trip while hinting that there will be some "deliverables".

Mr Dodd said he might ask some of his Democratic colleagues to join him in the letter to Mr Paulson, "even those who didn't support the Schumer legislation".

Former Spy Buried As Russians Open Separate Investigation (LAT)

By David Holley And Kim Murphy

The Los Angeles Times, December 8, 2006

MOSCOW — A key figure in the poisoning of former KGB agent Alexander Litvinenko has also been contaminated by radiation, authorities said today as they announced they have opened their own investigation into the murder of the dissident.

Litvinenko was buried today in London, where officials believe he was probably infected with polonium-210 last month when he met with several people.

One of those people, Russian businessman Dmitry Kovtun, was questioned at a Moscow hospital Wednesday, where he apparently was undergoing testing for radiation.

The condition of Kovtun, a potential suspect in Litvinenko's murder, was unclear. The Russian news agency Interfax insisted that Kovtun fell into a coma "almost immediately" after talking to investigators. But the state-run news agency RIA Novosti quoted Andrei Romashov, a lawyer involved in the case, as saying that Kovtun's condition was satisfactory and that reports of him falling into a coma "can only be called a provocation."

Kovtun's possible coma raised the question of whether the possible killer would soon be dead, taking with him any secrets he might have about Litvinenko's murder.

In a statement prepared shortly before his death, Litvinenko accused Russian President Vladimir V. Putin of ordering his murder, a charge the Kremlin has dismissed as "nonsense."

The opening of their own investigation appeared to increase Russian authorities' leverage in trying to find out as much as possible about the British probe of the murder.

The case has taken on the air of an international mystery with several proposed solutions.

The most prominent explanations include that Litvinenko's death was the work of Russia's secret services; or that rogue elements within the Russian power structure were responsible; or that exiled opponents of Putin killed one of their own to make Russia and its government look bad.

The first two scenarios have generally been taken more seriously in the West, while the Kremlin and nearly all Russian media have placed emphasis on the third, even accusing self-exiled Russian billionaire Boris Berezovsky. He now lives in London and was a close friend of Litvinenko and a fierce critic of Putin.

As the investigation has progressed, the mystery has deepened, with British police remaining silent on almost all points. However, British authorities have spoken fairly openly about the discovery of traces of polonium-210, or radioactivity presumed to come from polonium-210, at many of the places visited by key players in the drama.

That includes a London restaurant where Litvinenko dined on sushi while meeting one of his contacts, the Italian security consultant Mario Scaramella, who has tested positive for "significant quantities" of polonium but appears in good health. It also includes the Piner Bar in the Millennium Hotel in London, where Litvinenko met Kovtun and another businessman, Andrei Lugovoy, for tea, not long after his lunch with Scaramella.

British officials said they had not yet received any request from Russia for cooperation in a Russian-led investigation.

Litvinenko, who died Nov. 23, was laid to rest after a Muslim prayer service at London's Central Mosque and a private nondenominational gathering at London's Highgate Cemetery, where Karl Marx was buried. Litvinenko reportedly converted to Islam as he was dying, although he apparently did not go through the formal procedures of adopting the faith.

Litvinenko's body was so contaminated that authorities refused to allow it to be displayed at the mosque, where a few dozen mourners gathered for the Muslim funeral prayer.

Later, a much larger group gathered in a private ceremony in a chapel at Highgate to recite eulogies and listen as a choir sang Pitts' "There is a Green Hill Far Away" and a hymn from Rachmaninoff. Berezovsky talked about the "martyrdom" Litvinenko had achieved with the intense suffering that preceded his death.

"I can say that we are not vindictive, but we will not forget," Berezovsky said, according to some present at the ceremony.

Litvinenko's father and a close friend, exiled Chechen separatist Akhmad Zakayev, said Litvinenko had converted to Islam during his final days, but others denied that.

Friends and relatives, determined to have a nondenominational service, were nonplused when a group of Muslims, invited by Zakayev, arrived at the open grave and began conducting Islamic prayers once again.

"They appeared uninvited and were a surprise to everybody," said Alex Goldfarb, a friend of Litvinenko. "So Marina Litvinenko [his widow], who essentially was in deep mourning at that moment, faced a dilemma of whether to make it into a scene or just do nothing. She wisely decided to do nothing."

The confusion over ceremonies reflected the extent to which Litvinenko's death has been seized on by many who, for reasons of their own, have sought to use it as a rallying point in their battles with the Russian government.

Litvinenko lived for years in the North Caucasus near Chechnya, sympathized with the Chechens who were subjected to Russian atrocities, and spent six years researching the Russian government's actions in Chechnya, friends said.

"He wanted to be buried in Chechnya when the war was over," said Vladimir Bukovsky, a well-known Soviet-era dissident who was exiled to Britain three decades ago. "But he wasn't a religious man. It's ridiculous to talk about conversion. His last message from his deathbed was he asked God to forgive his enemies. That's not a Muslim sentiment. That's a Christian sentiment."

Times staff writer Sergei L. Loiko in Moscow contributed to this report.

Suspected Poisoning As Ex-spy Buried (FT)

By Jimmy Burns And Stephen Fidler

Financial Times, December 8, 2006

The former Russian spy Alexander Litvinenko was buried on Thursday in London's Highgate cemetery as Russian prosecutors said they had opened their own investigation into his murder and the attempted killing of another Russian now suffering from radiation poisoning.

The funeral was attended by some 50 close friends and relatives including the film-maker Andrei Nekrasov, and Boris Berezovsky, the exiled Russian billionaire. It followed a gathering in his memory at London's Regent's Park mosque, attended by the Chechen separatist Akhmed Zakayev, that was used as a platform for critics of Russian President Vladimir Putin.

In a separate development, the BBC said that FM radio transmissions of its Russian service had ceased to be transmitted in Moscow since November 23. The reason given, a spokesman said, was unexplained "transmission problems". Other broadcasts on medium wave continue unaffected.

The Russian prosecutor-general's office said that after looking into Litvinenko's death as they were assisting British investigators in Moscow, prosecutors had established that the former security officer had died from radiation poisoning.

It added that Dmitry Kovtun – one of three Russians to meet Litvinenko on November 1 – was suffering from an illness "connected to poisoning by a radioactive nuclide". Litvinenko apparently died from poisoning with polonium-210.

The development came before Russian and British investigators had had the opportunity to question Andrei Lugovoi, a business partner of Mr Kovtun who also met Litvinenko and has found himself at the centre of the murder probe. Mr Lugovoi's lawyer said questioning had been expected to take place on Thursday but had been postponed.

The Russian investigation opens a new front in the complex Litvinenko case. The prosecutor's office said it would allow "more constructive co-operation" between Russian and British investigators.

But it will also strengthen Moscow's insistence that any Russian suspects in the case cannot be extradited to the UK and must be tried in Russia. Yuri Chaika, prosecutor-general, said this week that the Russian constitution did not allow extradition of its citizens.

Prosecutors said the opening of the Russian case might lead to Russian investigators visiting London.

The two articles of the Russian criminal code under which prosecutors opened their case provide for a prison sentence of eight to 20 years for anyone found guilty.

Mr Lugovoi and Mr Kovtun met Litvinenko on November 1 at London's Millennium hotel, before attending a football match between Arsenal and CSKA Moscow at Arsenal's Emirates stadium.

A huge pack of international media was kept outside the gates as the coffin was taken in for Thursday's funeral.

The body is thought to have been laid to rest in a non-denominational service at the cemetery where some of London's most famous exiled dead lie, among them Karl Marx.

Earlier Litvinenko's family and friends, although not Mr Berezovsky, joined about 150 Muslims at the central London Mosque, in Regent's Park.

Mr Zakayev claims to have been instrumental in Litvinenko's alleged conversion to the Muslim faith while he lay dying in a London hospital. "Akhmed [Zakayev] brought an Imam to the hospital to see Alexander [Litvinenko] after he had expressed his wish to die in spiritual brotherhood with the Chechen people and to be buried on Chechen soil once it is fully independent," a Zakayev aide at the mosque told the FT.

Russian Tied To Ex-Spy Also Ill From Radiation (WP)

By Peter Finn And Mary Jordan

MOSCOW, Dec. 7 -- A Russian businessman who met with a former Russian domestic intelligence officer in London the day the man fell ill from radioactive poison has himself become suddenly and seriously sick, Russian news organizations reported Thursday night.

Dmitry Kovtun, a business consultant who met with Alexander Litvinenko on Nov. 1 at a bar in the Millennium Hotel in London, suffered a severe health breakdown from radiation exposure, according to the reports. He had earlier been interviewed by Russian investigators, with detectives from Scotland Yard present as well.

The investigation of Litvinenko's mysterious death has widened with each day, as technicians follow a radioactive trail left by the poison polonium-210 across London and Moscow and in the cabins of jetliners that flew between the two cities.

Critics of Russian President Vladimir Putin have accused his government of orchestrating a covert execution of Litvinenko to silence a detractor; the Kremlin rejects those claims as absurd and says Russia only suffers from the burgeoning international publicity over the death. No one has been formally identified as a suspect in the case, which has strained relations between Russia and Britain.

Kovtun is the second person reported seriously sickened by the radiation, though others have tested positive for low-level exposure to the substance. On Thursday, British health officials added seven people to the exposure list -- employees in the Pine Bar of the Millennium Hotel on Nov. 1.

The Russian prosecutor's office, accused in Britain of dragging its feet in the inquiry, said Thursday it has opened its own criminal investigations. "The examination revealed that Litvinenko died after being poisoned with a radioactive nuclide and Kovtun . . . was also found to have been poisoned with a radioactive nuclide," the prosecutor's statement said. Opening criminal cases could be the first step in pursuing a prosecution here.

Andrei Lugovoy, another Russian who was present at the London meeting Nov. 1, is undergoing tests at a Moscow clinic. He was to speak with British and Russian investigators Thursday, but the meeting was postponed.

"We are on hold," Lugovoy's attorney, Andrei Romashov, said in a brief phone interview. He said his client, a former KGB officer, did not ask for the postponement; Russian news agency RIA Novosti said it was requested by Russian investigators for "technical reasons."

Romashov said Kovtun's attorney told him that his client was sick but not in a coma. Russian media, citing medical sources at Kovtun's hospital, continued to report Thursday night that the businessman had slipped into a coma and was experiencing failure of major organs.

Kovtun has said he first met Litvinenko in October to discuss possible business deals with British companies interested in investing in Russia. He described himself in a recent interview as a longtime resident of Germany who had returned to Moscow to set up a business.

He is the latest person to have tested positive for polonium-210 radiation. Litvinenko's wife, Marina, has been told that small amounts were found in her urine but that risk to her health was low. Mario Scaramella, an Italian who also met with Litvinenko on Nov. 1, in a London sushi restaurant, had more significant amounts of polonium in his system, doctors said, but he is not showing symptoms and was discharged from a London hospital Wednesday.

British officials played down any threat to the seven hotel workers. "There is no health risk in the short term and in the long term the risk is judged to be very small on the basis of initial tests," Britain's Health Protection Agency said in a statement.

In another suspected poisoning case, former Russian prime minister Yegor Gaidar wrote in the Financial Times on Thursday that he believes someone tried to kill him at a conference in Dublin last month. Gaidar became violently ill there, and his daughter immediately raised the specter of poisoning, though Irish police have found no evidence to support that.

"Most likely . . . some obvious or hidden adversaries of the Russian authorities stand behind the scenes of this event, those who are interested in further radical deterioration of relations between Russia and the west," wrote Gaidar, who now heads a research organization in Moscow.

In London, Litvinenko was buried Thursday at historic Highgate Cemetery, which also includes the grave of Karl Marx, whose writings gave rise to the communist movement. Among those at the grave site was exiled Russian billionaire Boris Berezovsky.

The interment followed a memorial service at a central London mosque that was attended by Akhmed Zakayev, a Chechen separatist wanted in Russia.

Litvinenko is reported to have converted to Islam on his deathbed. Alex Goldfarb, a friend of the Litvinenko family, said any conversion "is kind of in the eye of the beholder."

He said Zakayev visited Litvinenko in the hospital just before he died, when he was heavily sedated, and believed that the sick man wanted to convert.

Ex-Russian Spy Buried As Probe Continues (USAT)

By Ellen Tumposky Special For

USA Today, December 8, 2006

LONDON — Alexander Litvinenko, the former Russian spy poisoned by radiation, was buried Thursday with Muslim imams at his graveside after prayers were said for him at a London mosque.

Soon after the funeral, Britain's Health Protection Agency (HPA) announced that seven workers at the Pine Bar of the Millennium Hotel, where Litvinenko met former Russian agents Andrei Lugovoi and Dmitry Kovtun on Nov. 1, showed "low levels" of contamination by polonium-210. It was the first time members of the public without a direct connection to the former Russian spy have tested positive for the substance doctors and investigators say was used to poison Litvinenko, 43. He died Nov. 23.

In Moscow, meanwhile, former agent Kovtun fell into a coma Thursday after being questioned by Russian and British investigators, the Interfax news agency reported.

The prosecutor's office said Kovtun had developed an illness connected with a radioactive substance, possibly polonium-210. Interfax, citing unidentified sources, said Kovtun's condition was critical. The report could not be independently confirmed.

Andrei Romashov, a lawyer for Lugovoi, said media reports that he is in critical condition were wrong.

Italian security expert Mario Scaramella, who met with Litvinenko on Nov. 1, the day he fell ill, and the former spy's widow, Marina, also previously tested positive for exposure to polonium-210, although neither was in danger.

In its statement Thursday, Britain's health agency said the hotel workers faced no immediate health risk and a "very small" long-term risk. They asked staff and members of the public who had been at the bar on Oct. 31 and Nov. 2, to contact authorities for testing.

Scotland Yard said Wednesday that it was investigating Litvinenko's death as a homicide, and that traces of radiation had been found at more than a dozen sites in Britain and on jets that flew between London and Moscow. Russia's prosecutor general's office said Thursday that it had opened a criminal investigation into the attempted killing of Kovtun.

Litvinenko was buried in a sealed oak coffin at London's famous Highgate Cemetery, where communist philosopher Karl Marx is buried. About 50 mourners, including Litvinenko's wife, Marina, his son, Anatoly, 12, his parents, Walter Litvinenko and Nina Belyavskaya, and his first wife, Natalia, arrived in a line of Mercedes and BMWs. Also attending were his friends Alex Goldfarb, exiled Russian tycoon Boris Berezovsky and Akhmed Zakayev, a Chechen dissident.

Earlier, Walter Litvinenko and Zakayev mourned at the Central London mosque in Regents Park. Zakayev joined prayers, where Litvinenko's name was mentioned.

Litvinenko had criticized President Vladimir Putin's policies in the mostly Muslim separatist region of Chechnya. At the time of his death, he was investigating the murder of Russian journalist Anna Politkovskaya, who also was a vocal critic of the situation in Chechnya.

Goldfarb said the former agent was a non-religious man, though he wore a cross until it was removed in the hospital. When three imams arrived unexpectedly to say prayers at the funeral, Litvinenko's widow permitted them to participate, Goldfarb said.

"He said he was a Muslim in the same sense that John Kennedy said, 'I am a Berliner'— in solidarity with the Chechen people," he suggested, to explain Litvinenko's connection with Islam.

7 Test Radioactive At Bar Where Ex-Spy Met Russians (NYT)

By Alan Cowell, Steven Lee Myers

New York Times, December 8, 2006

LONDON, Dec. 7 — Seven bartenders at an upscale hotel in central London have tested positive for radioactive contamination, the British authorities said Thursday, raising new questions about the radiation poisoning death of Alexander V. Litvinenko, a former Russian agent.

In Moscow, Russia said it had opened its own criminal investigation into the death of Mr. Litvinenko, who was buried Thursday, two weeks after he died, in a private ceremony in London. Russian authorities also said a Russian businessman, Dmitri V. Kovtun, who was interviewed by British investigators in Moscow, was found to have signs of radioactive poisoning.

In London, attention swung back to the Pine Bar of the Mayfair Millennium Hotel, in Grosvenor Square, close to the American Embassy, where Mr. Litvinenko was reported to have met both Mr. Kovtun and another Russian contact, Andrei K. Lugovoi, on Nov. 1.

That was the day Mr. Litvinenko complained of feeling ill. He also ate at a sushi bar on the same day, although it is not clear which establishment he visited first. The exposure to the bartenders revived questions about exactly where Mr. Litvinenko had been poisoned, how he was poisoned and who else might have been contaminated.

The British health authorities said they would contact 250 people who called in after Mr. Litvinenko's death to say they had been at the Pine Bar on Nov. 1 and would ask them to take a urine test for radioactive contamination.

Prof. Pat Troop, the chief executive of Britain's Health Protection Agency, said all seven members of the bar staff tested had shown "a low level of contamination" that carried no short-term health risks but a "very small" long-range cancer risk.

She declined to comment on how the members of the bar staff might have been contaminated by polonium 210, a radioactive isotope that is dangerous only when swallowed, breathed in or absorbed through an open wound.

She said it was technically possibly for polonium to be carried in tobacco smoke, where minute traces are routinely found in nature. But, she said, she did not believe that the levels of contamination in the bar workers signified that the toxins had been inhaled in cigarette smoke. The Pine Bar permits smoking. Mr. Litvinenko was not a smoker, according to Alex Goldfarb, a family friend and spokesman.

Dr. Michael Clark, the spokesman for the Health Protection Agency's radiation protection division, said the levels of radiation found in the seven bar workers were less than — but close to — levels in an adult member of Mr. Litvinenko's family.

In Moscow, Mr. Kovtun became the latest among several people showing signs of exposure to the material that ultimately killed Mr. Litvinenko, on Nov. 23. The Prosecutor General's Office did not disclose his condition except to say in a statement that he had "an illness also connected to poisoning by a radioactive nuclide."

By Thursday night, however, Interfax reported that Mr. Kovtun fell into a coma "practically immediately upon completion of the interrogation" by investigators, who questioned him for a third day in connection with Mr. Litvinenko's death. Interfax cited unnamed sources. Later on, Mr. Lugovoi's lawyer, Andrei Romashov, told [a wire news service] that he had spoken to Mr. Kovtun's representatives, and that his health was unchanged and satisfactory.

In a short statement, the prosecutor's office in Moscow suggested that Mr. Kovtun might have been a victim of whoever had killed Mr. Litvinenko, rather than a suspect. The statement said Mr. Kovtun's poisoning was being investigated as an attempted murder.

Mr. Kovtun's apparent contamination could also mean that the Russians had been exposed while meeting Mr. Litvinenko, as was an Italian academic, Mario Scaramella, who met him separately at the Itsu sushi restaurant on the same day. Mr. Scaramella and Mr. Litvinenko's wife tested positive for traces of radioactivity but have developed no signs of illness.

Mr. Lugovoi, who is reported to be in the same hospital as Mr. Kovtun, has also been tested, but no results have been announced officially. He was supposed to be questioned on Thursday by investigators from Russia and Britain, but his lawyer said their meeting had again been postponed.

In the weeks since Mr. Litvinenko's illness first developed, Russian officials have reacted dismissively to accusations that President Vladimir V. Putin or any other official in Russia could be involved, saying the charges amounted to hysteria or deliberate misinformation.

Russia's announcement that it had opened its own criminal investigation came as diplomatic pressure grew for it to take the case seriously. The prosecutor general, Yuri Y. Chaika, said Russia would remain in charge of any detective work in the country — and would try any suspects in Russian courts — but since then investigators have cooperated with British investigators, who arrived Monday.

"Within the framework of provision of assistance to British investigators, the General Prosecutor's Office has carried out a check of a number of circumstances of the death of Alexander Litvinenko, a former employee of the F.S.B. of the Russian Federation," Thursday's statement said, using the Russian initials for the K.G.B.'s domestic successor, the Federal Security Service.

"As the result of the check it was established that Mr. Litvinenko died as the result of poisoning by a radioactive nuclide and Mr. Kovtun, who met with Mr. Litvinenko in London, has an illness also connected to poisoning by a radioactive nuclide."

Mr. Litvinenko, who became an outspoken critic of President Putin, was buried on Thursday in London in a ceremony attended by relatives, friends and others.

Among them were some of the most prominent Russians living in self-exile from Mr. Putin's Russia: Boris A. Berezovsky, an erstwhile ally of Mr. Putin's who fled what he has called politically motivated criminal charges, and Akhmed Zakayev, a leader of Chechnya's foundering separatist movement.

Mr. Goldfarb, Litvinenko family spokesman and an associate of Mr. Berezovsky, said later that the funeral at Highgate Cemetery — the burial place of, among others, Karl Marx — had taken an unexpected turn when, against the wishes of Marina Litvinenko, the widow, a Muslim cleric performed Islamic rites.

"Marina was upset but said it was O.K. for them to do it," he said in a telephone interview.

A question that hung over the funeral was whether Mr. Litvinenko had made a deathbed conversion to Islam. "This will be one of the big mysteries. His Islamic friends said he did convert," Mr. Goldfarb said. "He was heavily sedated at the time, but if there are people who believe he converted, let them believe it."

Radiation Poisoning Case Widens (CHIT)

By Alex Rodriguez

Chicago Tribune, December 8, 2006

MOSCOW -- The mystery of the poisoning death of former Russian spy Alexander Litvinenko deepened Thursday, as authorities in Moscow announced that one of the Russians Litvinenko met the day he became ill also has fallen prey to radiation poisoning.

The Russian prosecutor general's office said it has opened an investigation into the attempted murder of Dmitry Kovtun, a Russian businessman who together with a colleague, Andrei Lugovoi, met Litvinenko in London the day he fell ill, Nov. 1, and earlier in London, on Oct. 16.

In a prepared statement, Russian prosecutors said they had determined that Litvinenko "died as a result of radioactive nuclide poisoning, and Kovtun, who met Litvinenko in October 2006, developed the same kind of disease also associated with radioactive nuclide poisoning."

The statement by Russian prosecutors did not mention the Nov. 1 meeting, though Kovtun and Lugovoi gave a radio interview in Moscow on Nov. 24 in which they confirmed they met Litvinenko on Nov. 1 at the Millennium Hotel in London.

Russian prosecutors also announced they have opened an investigation into the death of Litvinenko, who died Nov. 23 after ingesting polonium-210, a radioactive isotope that can kill in minute amounts.

Investigations moving

That investigation will proceed alongside a probe by a team of British investigators, who arrived in Moscow on Monday. On Wednesday, British authorities announced they now regard his death as a murder.

British investigators interviewed Kovtun on Tuesday and Wednesday at a Moscow clinic where he has been undergoing radiation checks. The exact nature of his symptoms had yet to be disclosed as of late Thursday. Russian authorities' announcement of Kovtun's illness makes him the fourth person to test positive for the presence of a radioactive substance in his body.

Litvinenko's wife, Marina, tested positive for radiation, but doctors said the level was a trace amount that posed no harm.

Doctors also announced that Mario Scaramella, an Italian security expert who met Litvinenko on Nov. 1 at a London sushi bar, tested positive for traces of radioactivity in his body, though he has shown no signs of illness. He was released from a hospital Wednesday in London.

Litvinenko had been investigating the Oct. 7 slaying of Kremlin critic and investigative journalist Anna Politkovskaya, and at that Nov. 1 meeting at the sushi bar, Scaramella showed him documents related to the journalist's death.

Litvinenko, who like Lugovoi once worked for the KGB and its successor agency, the FSB, had also been a harsh critic of the Kremlin and Russian President Vladimir Putin. Before he died, Litvinenko issued a statement blaming Putin for his poisoning, a charge Putin denied.

The 43-year-old former Russian agent was buried Thursday at Highgate cemetery in northern London. The non-denominational funeral was preceded by a memorial at a London mosque; before he died, Litvinenko told his father he had thought about converting to Islam and wanted to be buried according to Muslim tradition, the Russian newspaper Kommersant reported.

The disclosure by Russian authorities that Kovtun had radiation poisoning and his rapid decline in health marked a bizarre, new twist in a case that has captivated both London and Moscow.

Trail of radiation

British media had reported that Scotland Yard investigators wanted to question Lugovoi, Kovtun and another colleague, Vyacheslav Sokolenko, during their trip to Moscow. Both Lugovoi and Kovtun met Litvinenko in London on Oct. 16 and again Nov. 1. Lugovoi met Litvinenko alone on Oct. 26.

Sokolenko said during the Nov. 24 radio interview on Ekho Moskvy that he briefly exchanged greetings with Litvinenko in the hotel lobby Nov. 1 but did not sit in on the conversation.

Traces of radioactivity were found at the hotel where Litvinenko met the Russians on Nov. 1, as well as at the British Embassy in Moscow, where Lugovoi appeared upon his return to Moscow to deny his involvement in the poisoning.

The New York Times reported that radioactivity was also detected at the London soccer stadium that Lugovoi, Kovtun and Sokolenko attended after the Millennium Hotel meeting. And Lugovoi flew on British Airways flights traveling the London-Moscow route that tested positive for radioactivity.

Lugovoi is in a Moscow hospital undergoing radiation checks. British investigators were supposed to question him Thursday, but that meeting was postponed, the Russian news agency RIA Novosti reported.

Lugovoi told Ekho Moskvy he had known Litvinenko for 10 years. Lugovoi worked at Russia's intelligence agency from 1987 to 1996. He now owns a company that produces wine and soft drinks.

Litvinenko became a KGB agent in 1988. He rose through the ranks at the intelligence agency until the fall of 1998, when he appeared at a news conference and accused the agency of asking him to help assassinate Boris Berezovsky, an exiled Russian oligarch who has become one of Putin's staunchest critics and is wanted by Russia on fraud charges.

Litvinenko and Berezovsky became close allies. Litvinenko later was arrested on charges of abuse of office and spent nine months in a Russian jail before he won an acquittal in 2000. Later he fled to Britain and was granted political asylum in 2001. He became a British citizen earlier this fall.

Kovtun told the radio station he is a longtime friend of Lugovoi and said he operates a consulting firm that advises Western businesses wishing to enter the Russian market. Sokolenko heads up the bodyguard unit of a Moscow security company called the 9th Degree.

Lugovoi has told Russian media that he believes he and his colleagues are being framed for Litvinenko's murder.

"As for the hullabaloo about me that has been stirred up by Western media, in my view good theatrical directing is traceable here," Lugovoi told the Russian news agency Interfax. "I've stopped watching television and reading papers. I'm fed up with all this."

That Murder In London (WP)

By Charles Krauthammer

The Washington Post, December 8, 2006

The poisoning of Alexander Litvinenko, renegade Russian spy and fierce critic of Vladimir Putin's government, is everywhere being called a mystery. There is dark speculation about unnamed "rogue elements" either in the Russian secret services or among ultranationalists acting independently of the government. There are whispers about the indeterminacy of things in the shadowy netherworld of Russian exile politics, crime and espionage.

Well, you can believe in indeterminacy. Or you can believe the testimony delivered on the only reliable lie detector ever invented -- the deathbed -- by the victim himself. Litvinenko directly accused Putin of killing him.

Litvinenko knew more about his circumstances than anyone else. And on their deathbeds, people don't lie. As Machiavelli said (some attribute this to Voltaire), after thrice refusing the entreaties of a priest to repent his sins and renounce Satan, "At a time like this, Father, one tries not to make new enemies."

In science, there is a principle called Occam's razor. When presented with competing theories for explaining a natural phenomenon, one adopts the least elaborate. Nature prefers simplicity. Scientists do not indulge in grassy-knoll theories. You don't need a convoluted device to explain Litvinenko's demise.

Do you think Anna Politkovskaya, the journalist who was investigating the war in Chechnya, was shot dead in her elevator by rogue elements? What about Viktor Yushchenko, the presidential candidate in Ukraine and eventual winner, poisoned with dioxin during the campaign, leaving him alive but disfigured? Ultranationalist Russians?

Opponents of Putin have been falling like flies. Some jailed, some exiled, some killed. True, Litvinenko's murder will never be traced directly to Putin, no matter how dogged the British police investigation. State-sponsored assassinations are almost never traceable to the source. Too many cutouts. Too many layers of protection between the don and the hit man.

Moreover, Russia has a long and distinguished history of state-sponsored assassination, of which the ice-pick murder of Leon Trotsky was but the most notorious. Does anyone believe that Pope John Paul II, then shaking the foundations of the Soviet empire, was shot by a crazed Turk acting on behalf of only Bulgaria?

If we were not mourning a brave man who has just died a horrible death, one would almost have to admire the Russians, not just for audacity but for technique in Litvinenko's polonium-210 murder. Assassination by poisoning evokes the great classical era of raison d'etat rub-outs by the Borgias and the Medicis. But the futurist twist of (to paraphrase Peter D. Zimmerman in the Wall Street Journal) the first reported radiological assassination in history adds an element of the baroque of which a world-class thug outfit such as the KGB (now given new initials) should be proud.

Some say that the Litvinenko murder was so obvious, so bold, so messy -- five airplanes contaminated, 30,000 people alerted, dozens of places in London radioactive -- that it could not possibly have been the KGB.

But that's the beauty of it. Do it obvious, do it brazen, and count on those too-clever-by-half Westerners to find that exonerating. As the president of the Central Anarchist Council (in G.K. Chesterton's "The Man Who Was Thursday") advised: "You want a safe disguise, do you? . . . A dress in which no one would ever look for a bomb? Why, then, dress up as an anarchist, you fool!"

The other reason for making it obvious and brazen is to send a message. This is a warning to all the future Litvinenkos of what awaits them if they continue to go after the Russian government. They'll get you even in London, where there is the rule of law. And they'll get you even if it makes negative headlines for a month.

Some people say that the KGB would not have gone to such great lengths to get so small a fry as Litvinenko. Well, he might have been a small fry, but his investigations were not. He was looking into the Kremlin roots of Politkovskaya's shooting. And Litvinenko claimed that the Russian government itself blew up apartment buildings in Moscow and elsewhere in 1999, killing hundreds of innocent civilians, in order to blame it on the Chechens and provoke the second Chechen war. Pretty damning stuff.

But even Litvinenko's personal smallness serves the KGB's purposes precisely. If they go to such lengths and such messiness and such risk to kill someone as small as Litvinenko, then no critic of the Putin dictatorship is safe. It is the ultimate in deterrence.

The prosecution rests. We await definitive confirmation in Putin's memoirs. Working title: "If I Did It."

Written Off As Journalists Die, A Russian Paper Faces Grim Future (WSJ)

By Guy Chazan

The Wall Street Journal, December 8, 2006

MOSCOW -- In mid-October, a few days after his star reporter was murdered, Dmitry Muratov summoned his senior staff for an urgent meeting.

"I told them I wanted to close the paper," recalls Mr. Muratov, editor in chief of the Russian newspaper Novaya Gazeta. "I felt no profession was worth dying for."

Russia is one of the most dangerous places in the world to be a journalist. And the most dangerous place to be a journalist in Russia is Novaya Gazeta. It has lost three reporters in the past six years. One was bludgeoned to death with a hammer. Another died of an allergic reaction relatives suspect was caused by poisoning. A third, Anna Politkovskaya, was shot dead two months ago in the elevator of her apartment block.

A muckraking tabloid, Novaya Gazeta specializes in shining a light into the murky corners of Vladimir Putin's Russia. For years it has exposed government sleaze, corporate crime and abuses of human rights. In the freewheeling 1990s, that was staple fare for the Russian press. But with the Kremlin and its allies now in control of much of the media, such themes have become taboo -- and writing about them a risky business.

Other Putin critics have also met mysterious ends. Last month, Alexander Litvinenko, a former KGB agent and strident Kremlin critic who was investigating Ms. Politkovskaya's death, died in London of suspected poisoning by the rare radioactive element polonium-210. In a deathbed statement, he accused Mr. Putin of killing him. The Russian ruler swiftly rejected the charge. There is no evidence that the Kremlin was involved in the Litvinenko case or in the deaths of the three Novaya Gazeta reporters.

As opposition voices are slain, exiled or intimidated into silence, Novaya is one of the last outposts of free speech left in Russia -- a status that has earned it influential friends in the West. On a trip to Moscow in October, U.S. Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice pointedly invited the paper's editors to her hotel. "I want to stress that you are not alone in your struggle," she told them.

Novaya Gazeta's past isn't free of taint. Like the vast majority of Russian newspapers, it has printed articles paid for by influential politicians and businessmen, former Novaya journalists say. Today, one of its biggest fears, in an overwhelmingly pro-Putin nation, is irrelevance. The paper's strident antigovernment line puts it out of touch with the masses and the wealthy a like, leaving it to drift increasingly to the margins of Russian life.

Stressed-out and chain-smoking, the 45-year-old Mr. Muratov is the public face of Novaya Gazeta and its idealistic but battle-hardened staff of 100 journalists. He says colleagues rejected his idea of closing the paper in the wake of Ms. Politkovskaya's death. But he remains fearful for the lives of his staff. "I keep thinking: Who's next?" he says. Just 11 days ago, Novaya announced two of its senior reporters had received death threats, one of them sent as a text message to his mobile phone.

Novaya Gazeta, or New Newspaper, was formed in 1993 by a group of about 30 journalists who broke away from Komsomolskaya Pravda, then and now Russia's highest-circulation newspaper.

Some of Novaya's early success came because of former Soviet leader Mikhail Gorbachev's patronage. He donated part of his Nobel Peace Prize winnings to buy Novaya's first newsroom computers and gave another $200,000 to pay for staff salaries. In 1994 his wife, Raisa, bought Mr. Muratov his first cellphone, a clunky Motorola. However, advertisers were put off by Novaya's low circulation and its readers, mainly down-at-the-heels intellectuals. In 1995 the paper briefly closed down due to lack of funds.

From the start, Novaya had a uniquely independent stance. It condemned President Boris Yeltsin's shelling of the hard-line Russian parliament in 1993, when all other liberal media backed him. In 1996, an election year, the rest of the Russian press sided with Mr. Yeltsin, but Novaya remained neutral. That earned it respect in journalistic circles, and it was able to poach some of Russia's top reporters. Circulation rose from 10,000 to 70,000 by the end of 1996 as the paper ran scoop after scoop about graft in the Yeltsin administration.

A series of campaigns also raised its profile and boosted its moral authority. Between 1997 and 1999, its defense correspondent, a Russian army major and decorated Afghan war veteran named Vyacheslav Izmailov, helped free 171 Russian prisoners of war and hostages held by warlords in the rebel region of Chechnya.

However, journalists say that to keep afloat, Novaya Gazeta resorted to a practice endemic in the Russian media -- publishing paid-for articles masquerading as news. Mr. Muratov declines to discuss what his paper did but says the entire Russian press engaged in the practice. He insists he "never printed anything that went against the paper's editorial policy."

The hodgepodge of styles was often jarring. An issue in November 1998 featured a hard-hitting account of the murder of Galina Starovoitova, a liberal lawmaker; a feature about the ties between local politics and organized crime in the port of Novorossiisk; and alongside them, an upbeat story about a Moscow bank that funded a memorial in London to Soviet war dead. The head of the bank, billionaire businessman Alexander Lebedev, was one of Novaya's informal sponsors. Mr. Lebedev denies paying for that particular article but says, "It's true that I did support them financially, and that their coverage was generally favorable to us."

Alexei Pankin, a former op-ed editor of the newspaper Izvestia and a friend of Mr. Muratov, says paid articles may have made it possible for Novaya Gazeta journalists to cover the stories that mattered most to them -- such as the war in Chechnya -- but the practice "no doubt harmed the paper's reputation." Novaya Gazeta and other papers were also left vulnerable to allegations of corruption when Mr. Putin began his crackdown on the independent media.

And Novaya's political coverage was getting it into hot water with the authorities. In the fall of 1999, a series of explosions ripped through apartment blocks in Moscow and two other Russian cities, killing 300 people. The authorities blamed Chechen militants and Mr. Putin sent troops to restore Russian rule in Chechnya. Novaya ran a series of stories describing what it said was evidence the blasts were orchestrated by Russia's security services. The late Mr. Litvinenko made the same claim -- vigorously denied by the Kremlin -- after he won political asylum in Britain in 2000.

Novaya also dug into Mr. Putin's stint as deputy mayor of St. Petersburg in the early 1990s, alleging fraud in his handling of a humanitarian-aid program. The president also rejected that claim. "From that point, our relations with the Putin administration were ruined," says Mr. Muratov. Businessmen who had donated funds to the paper stopped doing so.

Mr. Muratov scrounged money from business contacts and received $100,000 from financier George Soros's Open Society Institute, which promotes democracy in the region. But the climate for independent media kept worsening. OAO Gazprom, the state natural-gas monopoly, took over NTV, a TV channel owned by tycoon and Putin critic Vladimir Gusinsky. Mr. Gusinsky fled into exile. Novaya managed to survive only because it was owned by its own journalists.

In 2002 the paper was almost forced to close after losing a string of libel suits that critics said were evidence of sloppy reporting. Mr. Muratov calls it a government-sanctioned campaign of "judicial strangulation."

More alarming, the paper's journalists were coming under physical attack. In May 2000, Igor Domnikov, whose articles alleged corruption in the southern region of Lipetsk, was beaten with a hammer in the entrance of his apartment block. Two months later he died of his injuries. His accused killers are currently on trial in central Russia, but authorities haven't said who ordered the killing.

Later that year, Ms. Politkovskaya, whose reports from Chechnya exposing atrocities committed by Russian troops led to a slew of criminal investigations, had to be placed under armed guard after receiving death threats. She was then sent into hiding abroad.

In 2003, Yuri Shchekochikhin, Novaya's deputy editor, fell ill with a mysterious ailment. A liberal lawmaker, Mr. Shchekochikhin had been investigating tax-evasion allegations against two Moscow furniture stores with links to senior figures in Russia's security services. In June, he was admitted to the hospital with an "extreme allergic syndrome." Ten days later he was dead. To this day, authorities have refused to divulge details of the autopsy, designating them a "medical secret." Family and friends insist Mr. Shchekochikhin was poisoned.

Strange incidents continued to dog Novaya's staff, especially Ms. Politkovskaya. No longer just a reporter, she was emerging as a human-rights advocate, often volunteering to help ordinary Chechens whose relatives had gone missing. That earned her enemies in Russia's security apparatus, according to colleagues. In the fall of 2004, she became violently ill and had to be hospitalized after drinking tea on a plane to southern Russia, where she was traveling to cover the Beslan hostage crisis. She claimed she had been poisoned.

Then in October this year, Ms. Politkovskaya was shot dead in the elevator of her apartment building. Before her death, she had been investigating cases of torture allegedly committed by the pro-Kremlin authorities in Chechnya.

The death reverberated around the world. Ms. Politkovskaya, 48, was the 13th reporter to be slain in a contract-style killing since Mr. Putin came to power in 2000, according to the New York-based Committee to Protect Journalists.

At this time, the last remnants of Russia's free press were being scooped up by Kremlin-friendly business groups. Gazprom bought Izvestia and later Komsomolskaya Pravda. A steel magnate loyal to Mr. Putin acquired Kommersant, one of Russia's last big independent newspapers.

Novaya, too, realized it couldn't go on as before. By June of this year, reporters hadn't been paid for two months, and free-lancers for a year. The paper owed $430,000 to its printer. In June, Mr. Muratov persuaded the staff to sell a 49% stake in the paper to its old friends Mikhail Gorbachev and Mr. Lebedev, the banker.

Mr. Lebedev says that in an exchange for a pledge from Novaya not to publish paid articles, he agreed to invest $3.6 million in the paper by the end of next year and to pay $1.5 million in bonuses to its staff of 170. The money will help Novaya raise wages, upgrade facilities, publish five times a week instead of twice and create a new Web site.

A suave, elegantly dressed tycoon, Mr. Lebedev says he bought Novaya because he liked its oppositional tone. "They're the only ones who stick to the principle that a newspaper's job is not just to report the news but to criticize the bureaucracy," he says.

His arrival at the paper was controversial. Some journalists there wonder why Mr. Lebedev -- a member of the pro-Kremlin United Russia party and, like Mr. Putin, a former KGB spy -- wants a paper that's so disparaging of the president. When Mr. Lebedev dropped in at the newsroom this summer, one reporter said the journalists felt intimidated by the businessman's habit of publishing letters in the paper criticizing articles he disliked.

Mr. Lebedev reassured reporters he shared their core democratic values and would not interfere in editorial policy. But in October, when a fiercely anti-Western opinion piece he submitted was substantially cut, he complained in his blog that the editing was "insolent."

With the protection of Mr. Gorbachev, a figure still much admired in the West and respected by Mr. Putin, observers say there's little likelihood Novaya Gazeta will be shut down. But for some of the staff, the newspaper faces an even worse fate: irrelevance.

Novaya's stories could once cause a stir, prompting parliamentary hearings and even high-level resignations. They hardly ever do now. Reporters continue to turn out hard-hitting exposés, but they have little reach. With three of its most prominent journalists dead, national circulation stagnant at only 172,000 -- compared to more than two million for its old rival, Komsomolskaya Pravda -- and the rest of the independent press moribund or dead, Novaya risks a slow decline into oblivion.

Tired of politics, Russians increasingly want lighthearted stories and more reporting on celebrities -- the kind of news Novaya's journalists disdain, although the paper does have plenty of sports coverage and a television guide. Mr. Pankin, the former Izvestia op-ed editor, says that in a country where Mr. Putin regularly scores approval ratings of over 70%, there simply aren't that many people who want to read every day about their leader's flaws.

It was a point Mr. Putin made in commenting on Anna Politkovskaya's slaying. "Her influence on Russia's political life was minimal," he said.

Says Roman Shleinov, the paper's chief investigative reporter: "Even if we were to publish pictures of Putin receiving suitcases of money at the Kremlin door, no one would care."

The Persistently Poor (WP)

By Peter S. Goodman

The Washington Post, December 8, 2006

NEW YORK, Dec. 7 -- Despite an intensified campaign against poverty, World Bank programs have failed to lift incomes in many poor countries over the past decade, leaving tens of millions of people suffering stagnating or declining living standards, according to a report released Thursday by the bank's autonomous assessment arm.

Among 25 poor countries probed in detail by the bank's Independent Evaluation Group, only 11 experienced reductions in poverty from the mid-1990s to the early 2000s, while 14 had the same or worsening rates over that term. The group said the sample was representative of the global picture.

"Achievement of sustained increases in per capita income, essential for poverty reduction, continues to elude a considerable number of countries," the report declared, singling out programs aimed at the rural poor as particularly ineffective. Roughly half of such efforts from 2001 to 2005 "did not lead to satisfactory results." During that period, new World Bank loans and credits aimed directly at rural development totaled $9.6 billion, or about one-tenth of total bank lending, according to the group.

In a statement distributed with the report, World Bank management rejected its assessment as "overly bleak," arguing that the overall trend is improving in every region except Africa. Bank administrators noted that reducing poverty requires economic growth, something they said the world has been enjoying: Over the past two years, developing countries collectively grew by about 5 to 6 percent a year, excluding swiftly developing China and India. Even sub-Saharan Africa has grown by more than 4 percent annually over the past five years.

But the study found that growth has rarely been sustained, exposing the most vulnerable people -- the rural poor -- to volatile shifts in their economic fortunes. Per capita income rose continuously from 2000 to 2005 in only two in five of the countries that borrowed from the World Bank, the study reported, and it increased for the full decade, from 1995 to 2005, in only one in five.

The study emphasized that economic growth is, by itself, no fix: How the gains are distributed is just as important. In China, Romania, Sri Lanka and many Latin American countries, swiftly expanding economies have improved incomes for many, but the benefits have been limited by a simultaneous increase in economic inequality, putting most of the spoils into the hands of the rich and not enough into poor households, the study concluded.

In Georgia, the bank has helped foster growth by lending in support of the oil industry, but this has created few jobs and had a negligible impact on poverty, the study found. In Brazil, on the other hand, there has been little growth but significant advances against poverty because wealth has been distributed more evenly.

"For a sustained reduction in poverty over a period of time, it really pays to worry about both growth and distribution," said Vinod Thomas, director-general of the Independent Evaluation Group. "It has been a mistaken notion that you can grow first and worry about the distribution later."

Overall, from 1990 to 2002, the percentage of the world's people who subsist on less than $1 per day declined from 28 to 19, according to World Bank research. But officials with the evaluation group noted that much of the advance was registered in China, which has rejected many of the tenets of the development model advocated by the West and barely relied on the largesse of the World Bank.

"If you take out China, the numbers would be unfavorable," Thomas said. "The sheer numbers of people living under the $1-a-day definition of poverty has been stubbornly high." By the bank's reckoning, 1.1 billion people subsisted at that level in 2001.

Some of the report reads like an amalgam of the criticisms that have been leveled against the World Bank for years by outside activists. The report chides the bank for failing to help cushion poor people against price and currency liberalizations, for focusing on the fiscal sustainability of pension systems to the detriment of the poor and for promoting the privatization of power industries without thinking enough about wiring up the indigent.

It criticizes the bank for failing to tailor projects to local conditions and for sometimes attempting to accomplish more than national governments can handle. In Uganda, the bank assisted the government with an ambitious effort to increase school enrollments but failed to plan for sufficient teacher hiring or classroom construction. By last year, Uganda's schools had an average of 94 students per classroom, and each book was being shared by three pupils.

Critics of the bank used the report to claim vindication and call for change in the institution's policies -- in particular, loan conditions that sometimes force poor countries to slash spending on social services and reduce price controls on food. "At a certain point, you have to say, 'This is policy failure,' " said Mark Weisbrot, an economist and co-director of the Center for Economic and Policy Research, who has long argued that the bank's emphasis on austerity and privatization has increased poverty.

World Bank administrators said it would be simplistic to view rising poverty rates as a sign that their projects do not work, noting that the worst-off borrowing countries are grappling with war, famine and natural catastrophes.

"There's a lot that has to go right for country-wide incomes to improve other than just good projects financed by the World Bank," said Vikram Nehru, director of the bank's economic policy and debt department. "These countries are in very difficult circumstances."

Still, Nehru said the bank could benefit from greater consideration of what is actually possible in any given country.

"We need to be much more sober in our assessments," he said.

U.N. To Renovate Secretary General's Residence (WP)

By Colum Lynch

The Washington Post, December 8, 2006

UNITED NATIONS, Dec. 7 -- After stalling efforts to renovate the United Nations' Manhattan headquarters, the Bush administration joined other U.N. members this week in approving $4.9 million to work on incoming Secretary General Ban Ki

Moon's East Side residence, including a new $2.1 million central heating and air-conditioning system and a $200,000 kitchen upgrade.

The decision by the U.N. General Assembly's chief budget committee comes as the United States and other member nations are pressing Ban to assign high-level jobs to their nominees. The renovation is necessary because the 85-year-old neo-Georgian townhouse is plagued by power outages, leaky plumbing, an unsafe elevator and an obsolete kitchen exhaust system that poses a "potential fire hazard," according to a U.N. report.

"It does need refurbishing," said Kofi Annan, who will leave the Sutton Place house after his 10-year term ends at the end of the month. Although the house, built in 1921, has not had a major renovation since 1950, he said, "I'm happy that they did not do that to me and I didn't have to spend a year or so in a hotel."

The 14,000-square-foot residence on the East River was built for Anne Morgan, the daughter of the New York financier J.P. Morgan. The United States rejected the site as a possible residence for its ambassador to the world body, instead setting up a residence for the top U.S. diplomat in a penthouse apartment at the Waldorf-Astoria Towers.

The Sutton Place residence was donated to the United Nations in 1972 and has housed every U.N. secretary general since Kurt Waldheim. It has served as a meeting place for scores of kings, presidents, prime ministers and foreign ministers.

Ban will be housed in a hotel for at least nine months as workers rip out antiquated air-conditioning, plumbing and electrical systems that require $60,000 and 1,100 hours to repair each year. They will spend $650,000 on a new security system and another $100,000 to renovate two small bathrooms in the entryway.

While U.N. delegates acknowledge the renovation is costly, they say it is essential for the world's top diplomat to entertain other leaders in style -- though some noted that the home's main reception areas show few signs of the wear and tear described in the U.N. report. "It's a very nice place," said Pakistan's U.N. ambassador, Munir Akram.

"I do not call it dilapidated," said Japan's ambassador, Kenzo Oshima, whose government recently poured tens of millions of dollars into renovating a new residence for its top envoy. But he said he agrees it is time for an overhaul. "My own residence looks fine from the outside, but inside there are lots of things -- water, piping, air conditioning, a lot of problems."

The Iraqi government, meanwhile, has appealed to Annan to transfer $40 million in U.N.-controlled Iraqi funds to upgrade its Upper East Side residence and mission and to build a new mission near U.N. headquarters. The new U.S. mission being built across from the United Nations will cost $50 million to $60 million, according to U.S. government estimates.

Iraqi Foreign Minster Hoshyar Zebari appealed to Annan last month to shift the funds from a $113 million account controlled by the U.N. weapons inspection team, which has not been allowed into Iraq since the U.S.-led invasion in 2003. "Iraq plans to purchase a new building close to United Nations headquarters to serve as the permanent mission to the United Nations," he wrote. "It also plans to perform major renovations on the mission's current building and the residence of the permanent representative, which has been neglected for over ten years."

The Security Council's sole Arab member government, Qatar, proposed that the council authorize the transfer of funds. Britain, however, asked that the council be given more time to consider the request. But Britain's ambassador, Emyr Jones Parry, said he did not question Iraq's need for a new mission.

"How much do you need for new building? I just don't know," he said. "Have you been in their present building? I've been there lots of times. They do need a new one."

Mr. ChÃ¡vez's Victory (WP)

The Washington Post, December 8, 2006

HUGO CHÃVEZ'S victory in Venezuela's presidential election Sunday was unsurprising, given the campaign that led up to it. The would-be "Bolivarian" revolutionary flooded the country with petrodollars in the months before the vote, decreeing a pay bonus for all government workers. He dominated the media, receiving by one count 22 times as much airtime as his opponent. He also freely employed intimidation, endorsing a declaration by the director of the powerful state oil company that its 40,000 workers would be mobilized for the president and that anyone who opposed this would be guilty of "a crime." Such tactics, along with the fact that many people who signed petitions in a campaign to recall Mr. ChÃ¡vez two years ago have been subject to government sanctions, clearly had an effect: A poll conducted for the Associated Press showed that 57 percent of Venezuelans believed that voters who did not support the president might suffer from retaliation.

The real news of the election was the reappearance of a credible Venezuelan opposition. Manuel Rosales, a state governor, managed to unite the anti-ChÃ¡vez forces and energetically barnstormed the country, drawing hundreds of thousands to rallies in Caracas. In the end he received 38 percent in the official count, preventing Mr. ChÃ¡vez from getting anywhere close to the 10 million votes he set as his goal. On Sunday night Mr. Rosales formally conceded -- an important signal for an opposition that too often has resorted to self-destructive boycotts or other anti-democratic tactics. Though Mr. ChÃ¡vez controls the judiciary and every seat in the national legislature, Mr. Rosales is now positioned to represent the millions of Venezuelans who oppose the president's drive to monopolize power.

A strong opposition will be needed. Mr. ChÃ¡vez has announced plans to follow his reelection by removing the constitutional barrier that would limit his tenure to six more years. He has also threatened to shut down private television stations sympathetic to the opposition, and his congressional followers say they plan to give him far-reaching decree power, so that he can personally order the seizure of private property. For those who trust that political pluralism will remain intact, Mr. ChÃ¡vez had a message. "There is no room in Venezuela for any project other than the Bolivarian revolution," he declared last week.

In fact, Mr. ChÃ¡vez's rule contains the seeds of its own destruction. His wild use of oil revenue -- government spending has grown eightfold during his eight years in office -- has gone mainly for consumption or foolish foreign adventures. Investment in the economy, and even in the oil industry itself, is paltry, and most experts believe Venezuela's petroleum production has declined. Crime and corruption are soaring: Murders are up 67 percent during the ChÃ¡vez era. If oil prices continue to drop, Mr. ChÃ¡vez's revolution eventually will be revealed for what it is: a populist fraud.

The Best Election Money Could Buy (WSJ)

By Mary Anastasia O'Grady

The Wall Street Journal, December 8, 2006

CARACAS -- As midday Mass at the Cathedral on Plaza Bolivar drew to a close on Sunday, the celebrant issued a plea for peace: The winner of the presidential election must be respected, he told the congregation, but so too the loser, who is also a Venezuelan in this land blessed by God.

I gazed at the crucifix behind the altar and pondered the admonition. It was only 1 p.m., far too early to call a winner in the race between President Hugo Chávez and the challenger, Zulia Governor Manuel Rosales. But the Church was already signaling concern -- as it has been for the past eight years under the Chávez government -- about the end of tolerance in a nation that is supposed to be a democracy. There was good reason.

The words from the pulpit echoed in my mind that evening, when some 20 loudly rumbling motorcycles passed in front of the car in which I was riding near Plaza Altimira, where anti-Chávez Venezuelans have been known to gather. Each bike carried two helmeted men in military garb, armed with riot shields and long rifles.

It was nearly 6:30 p.m. and darkness had fallen. I remembered that Chávez supporters had more than once shot and killed unarmed civilians with impunity and I thought about heading back to my hotel. But I wanted to see whether the opposition would rally on its own turf. So I continued around the square. What I saw next was truly frightening.

The flowers growing in the plaza were drooping under a tropical shower as members of Mr. Chávez's feared National Guard poured out of a military vehicle on one side of the street and armies of informal government enforcers known as chavistas gathered on the other. A red truck was blaring revolutionary music. A bus carrying about 10 chavistas, their heads wrapped in the signature red of the Chávez campaign, drove menacingly up and down the street. It honked its horn and pulled wild U-turns as its passengers, at least one of whom was naked from the waist up, leaned out the door and windows pumping their fists and shouting angrily into the evening air.

Mr. Chávez's metropolitan police and the military ignored their lawlessness. A 23-year-old woman driving past the plaza later that night says she was set upon by chavistas wielding baseball bats and that her car windows were smashed. I wondered why, if the president had won re-election, he needed to turn his goons on the civilian population.

I never believed that Fidel Castro's Venezuelan "mini-me" would be defeated on Sunday even though there is scant evidence that a majority of Venezuelans back his socialist revolution. Instead, I expected that a Chávez victory could be had "legally" through a combination of coercion, manipulation and the liberal use of state funds.

This seems to be what happened. The National Electoral Council (CNE) says that Mr. Chávez got about 61% of the vote versus 37% for Mr. Rosales; no one in the opposition is challenging his victory. Nevertheless, it is difficult to judge the race fair.

Among the irrefutable complaints from the independent electoral watchdog group known as Súmate (literally "Join Up") is the charge that the government would not allow an independent and reliable audit of the electoral registry; in the two years and three months since the recall referendum, voter rolls grew more than 30%. This left a lot of Venezuelans wondering who these new voters were but the government refused to release the full registry (including addresses) or post local lists at polling stations, as required by law.

Economic intimidation also played a role. It may be true that the poorest voted heavily Chávez. I don't know. But one economic step up from the most destitute, I have found palpable distrust of this president. In the struggling municipality called Caricuao, 30 tiny medical clinics and a number of larger ones have opened in the past year. I visited three clinics there on Monday, all of which are staffed by Cubans and decorated with anti-American propaganda. Yet this huge state effort to ideologically capture a barrio seems to have delivered only mediocre results.

A local woman I interviewed told me that her neighborhood was politically divided. Many dislike Mr. Chávez greatly, she said, but believed that the electronic voting machines and the fingerprint tracking machines at the polls would allow the government to know how they voted and that they would lose their government jobs if they went against him. Such fears are not irrational. It is well documented that the government has created enemies lists and fires dissidents.

Perhaps the working poor dismiss Mr. Chávez because they see so many apparatchiks getting fat off corruption while they get only crumbs. A new report by former Venezuelan oil company director Gustavo Coronel, published by the Cato Institute's Center for Global Liberty and Prosperity, finds that during the past eight years government oil revenues and revenue from issuing new debt total at least $175 billion and that this windfall has been accompanied by a sharp drop in transparency. "For example," Mr. Coronel writes, "the state-owned oil company ceased publishing its consolidated annual financial statements in 2003, and Chávez has created new state-run financial institutions, whose operations are also opaque, that spend funds at the discretion of the executive."

Unaccounted for state funds could have been used to finance Mr. Chávez's re-election in more than one way. According to Goldman Sachs emerging-market analyst Alberto Ramos, "if you include imports, car sales are expected to almost double this year to about 300,000, many of them luxury models." If you have the right politics, you too might join the fun.

Yet trouble is looming as expectations rise and delivering on promises becomes more difficult. Mr. Ramos notes that "serious macro imbalances are emerging in the economy," including "accelerating inflation, sharply depreciated black market exchange rate. . . and the gradual atrophy of the non-oil sector." It is worth worrying about what Mr. Chávez will do to maintain power when the money runs out. The Church may have some reasonable fears.

Scot Free (WSJ)

By Quentin Letts

The Wall Street Journal, December 8, 2006

LONDON -- Back in 1707 the neighboring kingdoms of England and Scotland swallowed their historical differences and agreed to create the United Kingdom. Three-hundred years on a majority of Britons seem to want to undo it all.

Scottish independence is suddenly on the political radar. At present it is only a faint blip but if it becomes more serious the U.S. could find one of its more reliable allies suddenly looking distinctly bifurcated. If Scotland and England go their separate ways the British would probably disappear as international diplomatic players.

In medieval times the English and the Scots had little time for each other. Occasionally we English would send an army north of the border to beat up a few of the hairy-kneed, kilt-wearing "Jocks." The chief hazard in these engagements, apart from being gored by a skean-dhu dagger, was the terrible, blood-curdling skirl of Scottish bagpipes, as fiendish a noise as man has ever contrived to fashion. In retaliation the Scots, most of whom had remained loyal to the pope when Henry VIII spurned Roman Catholicism, would from time to time engage in a little light sedition against the Protestant Crown of England. Scotland's long-fingered lochs and heather-clad Highlands were good places to conceal papist pretenders to the English throne.

The Act of Union was meant to put a stop to all that -- and for about 275 years, it did. The United Kingdom was a success. Scottish probity, discipline and scientific know-how combined with English brute force to create the British Empire. Scots Highland Regiments became a valued part of the British Army. English money flowed northwards to make Edinburgh and Glasgow two of the greatest cities of 19th-century Europe. The Scots sent representatives down to Parliament in London, but they felt no sense of grievance or loss of self-esteem. Indeed, they played the political game well and bagged more than their share of Britain's public money. A few bad habits formed. The Scots, once notorious for their financial parsimony, became slightly hooked on welfare.

Football always showed that the "auld enemies" had never quite become one country. When England's soccer team loses no one celebrates quite as hard as the Scottish. Even so, things might have bumbled along in an amiable manner had it not been for Margaret Thatcher's election as British Prime Minister in 1979. Mrs. T had many qualities but diplomatic "sensitivity" was not among them. Scottish voters, wary of her anti-welfare instincts, detected a threat.

When Tony Blair became prime minister in 1997 his Labour Party agreed to give Scotland its own parliament. The place has limited powers, has cost a fortune and is full of monumental windbags, but it has become a symbol, an assertion, of renewed Scottish nationalism. This was also boosted in 1995 by "Braveheart," Hollywood's ludicrously romanticized film about 14th-century Scots fighting the wicked English.

Next May Scottish voters face elections in which Mr. Blair's Labour may be run close by, or even lose to, the left-wing, anti-American, pro-independence Scottish Nationalist Party. Alongside this prospect comes an opinion poll published by the Sunday Telegraph that found 52% of Scots now want independence. More surprisingly, 59% of the English would be happy to see the Scots go; and some 69% also seem to want a separate parliament of their own. In other words, significant numbers of British voters no longer care about "the union."

On one level this can be dismissed as neighborly peevishness run out of control, of Caledonian chest-beaters trying to build a separate state on little more than national machismo. However, when Mr. Blair steps down next summer, he is almost certain to be replaced by Gordon Brown, at present his finance minister. Mr. Brown is a Scot. Many of his friends and allies are, too. In this climate it is not too hard to see the greater danger -- English nationalism -- rising up and breaking the historical union which was created three action-packed centuries ago.

Mr. Letts writes for London's Daily Mail.

Blood, Toil, Tears And Nukes (NYT)

When Tony Blair asked Parliament this week to approve a new generation of nuclear-armed submarines, he was asking the lawmakers to reaffirm Britain as a nuclear power far into the 21st century.

The prime minister argued that Britain needs its nuclear weapons to deter new threats from terrorists and rogue states. But we suspect that what is really driving Mr. Blair and his military planners is concern about old threats: the thousands of nuclear weapons still in Russia's arsenal and the hundreds in China's. The fact that France is holding on to its nukes — and its seat at the table of "world powers" — is likely encouraging him as well.

Frankly, we would like to see more from Mr. Blair, who has shown a flair for defining new-think issues, as he did with his government's global-warming report and its call to reduce poverty.

Mr. Blair could burnish that legacy if he challenged all the world's nuclear powers to reduce their arsenals. To soothe critics in his party, Mr. Blair also said this week that Britain would reduce its small arsenal from fewer than 200 operational warheads to fewer than 160. He should challenge others to follow.

Deep cuts — leading to zero — is what all the original nuclear powers pledged when they signed the Nuclear Nonproliferation Treaty. But that effort has stalled. Russia and the United States — with the world's two largest arsenals — agreed in 2002 to cut down to some 2,000 deployed warheads. But there have been no negotiations since.

The major powers would have a far stronger case for their calls to restrain the nuclear ambitions of countries like Iran and North Korea if they showed they were willing to reduce their own arsenals. That is the stuff that legacies are made of.

TERRORISM NEWS:

U.S. Prosecutors Move To Block Padilla's Questioning Of Pentagon (WP/AP)

The Washington Post, December 8, 2006

MIAMI, Dec. 7 -- Federal prosecutors asked a judge Thursday to prevent Jose Padilla's defense attorneys from questioning Defense Department officials or obtaining documents about his treatment during 3 1/2 years in military custody as an "enemy combatant."

Defense attorneys have issued subpoenas for at least four military officials, including a security officer and technical official at the Navy brig in Charleston, S.C., where Padilla was jailed. They have also subpoenaed Maj. Gen. D.D. Thiessen, commander of U.S. Marine forces in Japan, about treatment of other enemy combatants, according to court documents.

The subpoenas also seek records of "special procedures and communications" related to Padilla, as well as medical records and visitation logs.

Prosecutors said in a motion filed Thursday that the subpoenas are an improper "fishing expedition" because Padilla's allegations of mistreatment during his time in military custody have no bearing on the terrorism support case against him in Miami.

"These subpoenas seek information that has nothing to do with the offenses charged in the indictment, which predate Padilla's confinement and arise out of the defendants' support for groups committed to violent jihad," Assistant U.S. Attorney Russell Killinger and other prosecutors said in their motion.

Padilla's attorneys did not immediately respond to e-mail messages seeking comment.

Padilla, a 36-year-old U.S. citizen, is scheduled to stand trial Jan. 22 along with two others in the terrorism support case. He was added to that case late last year amid an intense legal battle over the extent of President Bush's wartime powers to detain U.S. citizens.

When Padilla was originally arrested in 2002, administration officials alleged that he was on an al-Qaeda mission to detonate a radioactive "dirty bomb" in a major U.S. city, but the Miami indictment does not mention those allegations.

Padilla's attorneys have asked U.S. District Judge Marcia Cooke to dismiss the case against Padilla because of what they allege is "outrageous government conduct," including torture, during his years at the Navy brig. They allege Padilla was abused so severely it has hurt his ability to aid in his own defense, but Pentagon officials and prosecutors assert that Padilla was treated humanely.

Last week, Padilla's lawyers sought to buttress their case by filing with the court still video images showing Padilla being led out of his cell in blacked-out goggles, noise-muffling headphones and chains. Padilla also alleges he was hooded and forced to stand in stress positions, subjected to bright lights and total darkness, given mind-altering drugs, and made to endure sleep deprivation.

Prosecutors have urged Cooke not to consider those allegations or schedule a hearing on them.

New York Judge: Terror Defendants' Pre-trial Prison Solitary OK (AP)

By Larry Neumeister, Associated Press Writer

AP, December 8, 2006

NEW YORK -- A judge on Thursday refused to order a terrorism suspect _ a jazz musician who also is a martial arts expert _ moved out of solitary confinement after prosecutors claimed he was so dangerous he suggested using prayer beads as a strangulation tool.

U.S. District Judge Loretta A. Preska denied the request by lawyers for Tarik Shah and his co-defendants that they be moved from special housing in the Metropolitan Correctional Center in lower Manhattan that leaves them isolated while they await trial.

She said the government had offered tape recordings to support that Shah was an accomplished martial arts practitioner who had tried to recruit others to join al-Qaida and that he had offered to train them.

She said some evidence indicated that "his prayer beads have been or in the past were fashioned as a strangulation device" and noted that the Bureau of Prisons had a duty to protect other inmates.

The judge ruled from the bench after listening to oral arguments on a subject that had been debated in court papers for months.

DOJ_NMG_0103907

Shah, of New York, Dr. Rafiq Abdus Sabir, of Boca Raton, Fla., Abdulrahman Farhane, a Brooklyn bookstore owner, and Mahmud Faruq Brent, of Gwynn Oak, Md., are awaiting trial on charges that they conspired to help a terrorist organization.

They each could face up to 30 years in prison if convicted. They have pleaded not guilty.

A lawyer for Shah, Renita K. Thukral, asked the judge to order the Bureau of Prisons to permit her client to be released from solitary confinement or to give sufficient reasons why the confinement was necessary.

In court papers, the government said trial evidence will prove Shah is a martial arts expert and trainer who has studied extensively in jujitsu, which he has described in a government-recorded conversation as the Japanese art of hand-to-hand combat and knife and stick fighting.

Assistant U.S. Attorney Jennifer Rodgers wrote that Shah had offered to help train al-Qaida operatives for hand-to-hand combat and in the use of weapons, including swords and machetes, and had shown an undercover agent how he had fixed his prayer beads to be used as a weapon.

She said he had looked at a warehouse facility where he could conduct martial arts training locally, had expressed willingness to go overseas to train fighters and had discussed his desire to obtain training in explosives, firearms and hand grenades.

She said evidence against him included proof that he and Sabir were kicked out of a mosque for attempting to teach urban warfare to interested Muslims and proof that Shah had pledged his allegiance to al-Qaida and Osama bin Laden with a person he believed was an al-Qaida recruiter.

In a declaration to the court signed Tuesday, Shah said he had been held in solitary confinement since the day after his May 28, 2005, arrest. He said strict rules requiring his handlers to videotape his conversations have prevented him from exercising his attorney-client privilege.

He said his isolation has blocked him from practicing his faith or receiving proper medical care and had left him in "inhumane conditions," unable to access the library, educational programs, religious services, family visits, outdoor recreation or news publications.

In another document in the court record, Shah writes: "I am an American with well over 10 generations of family who were also American, so why is it that I cannot get a meaningful and impartial review of my status?"

In a document he wrote nearly a year ago, Shah asked for contact visits with family members, saying non-contact visits "are torture!"

"The only time that I am touched is for a movement from my cell to some designated area, being cuffed and sometimes fully shackled with leg irons," he said. "This isolation is inhumane and has caused me a great deal of stress and mental anguish."

He accused the prison staff of having "condemned and convicted me."

Guantanamo Detainees Going To New Prison (AP)

By Michael Melia

AP, December 8, 2006

The U.S. military transferred the first group of detainees on Thursday to a new maximum-security prison at Guantanamo Bay designed to restrict contact among the prisoners and prevent attacks on guards.

More than 40 detainees were brought to the $37 million prison perched on a plateau overlooking the Caribbean Sea from another maximum-security facility at the U.S. naval base in eastern Cuba, said Navy Cmdr. Robert Durand.

The 178-cell prison, constructed beside another maximum-security prison built in 2004, will allow the base to phase out an older facility, Durand said.

U.N. human rights investigators and foreign governments have called on the United States to close the entire detention center because of widespread allegations of abuse of detainees by guards. The United States labels Guantanamo detainees "enemy combatants," which accords them fewer rights than other prisoners.

About 430 men are currently held at Guantanamo on suspicion of links to al-Qaida or the Taliban, including about 100 who have been cleared for release and are awaiting transfer to another country. Fewer than a dozen inmates have been charged with crimes.

The new prison was originally designed as a medium-security facility. But the military made several modifications, citing concerns raised by three suicides in June and a clash in May between guards and detainees armed with makeshift weapons.

It is now one of two facilities reserved for prisoners who are least compliant — an assessment the military says it bases on detainees' adherence to base rules rather than their cooperation with interrogators.

Detainees will be confined in individual cells with long, narrow windows overlooking areas with metal tables and stools that were meant to be shared spaces but will now be off-limits.

An open-air recreation area has been divided into smaller spaces, which will hold only one detainee at a time. Shower doors were redesigned to allow guards to shackle prisoners' hands and feet before they leave the stalls, and fencing was installed on second-tier catwalks to prevent detainees from jumping over the sides.

The new prison also has air conditioning, an onsite medical center and two rooms that will allow detainees to meet privately with their lawyers, Durand said.

Air conditioning has not been available at all the camps despite sweltering tropical heat. But the military is now installing it some prisons after detainees used broken fan blades as weapons in the melee in May.

U.S. Navy Cmdr. Kris Winter said the modifications will help make guards safer. In the last year and a half, the military has recorded more than 430 incidents in which detainees have thrown "cocktails" of bodily excretions at guards, as well as 225 physical assaults.

"As a commander, I don't like my folks being in danger every day," Winter said this week while leading journalists on a tour of the prison.

Guantanamo officials said the inability of the detainees to communicate with one another will also improve safety. Officials have said the May 18 ambush inside another facility on the base resulted from a plot hatched by detainees as word spread that guards were searching cells for contraband medication following two suicide attempts.

A defense attorney said the melee was sparked when guards tried to search prisoners' Qurans.

Navy Rear Adm. Harry Harris, commander of the jail, has also described June 10 suicides at a minimum-security facility at the base as a coordinated protest. Lawyers and human rights activists called the suicides an act of desperation.

Suit By Iraqis And Afghans Claims Rumsfeld Ordered Torture (CSM)

By Warren Richey

The Christian Science Monitor, December 8, 2006

WASHINGTON

As Donald Rumsfeld prepares to leave his job as secretary of Defense, the American Civil Liberties Union (ACLU) is seeking to hold him responsible for what it says was widespread torture carried out at his direction. [Editor's Note: The original version was changed because the American Civil Liberties Union says its civil suit is not intended to prove a war crime.]

Lawyers representing Mr. Rumsfeld and three US Army commanders are set to appear in federal court here Friday in response to a lawsuit charging that the Defense secretary authorized torture and other illegal abuse of military detainees in Afghanistan and Iraq - including at the infamous Abu Ghraib prison.

The case is important because it represents an attempt to hold US officials accountable for alleged illegal abuse of Iraqi and Afghan civilians who were never detained as enemy combatants or charged with any crime. But some legal analysts say the suit may be aimed more at shaping public opinion than winning in court because such cases are difficult to pursue.

The Justice Department lawyers representing Rumsfeld have not responded directly to the torture charges. Instead, they are asking Chief US District Court Judge Thomas Hogan to throw the suit out because Rumsfeld is entitled to immunity from lawsuits challenging his official actions as Defense secretary. Chief Judge Hogan has scheduled two hours of argument on the dismissal request.

The five Iraqi citizens and four Afghan citizens identified in the suit claim that they were subject to beatings, cutting with knives, sexual humiliation, confinement in a wooden box, sleep deprivation, mock executions, and stress positions, the suit says.

"The secretary of Defense personally issued orders and authorized illegal interrogation techniques and caused torture," says ACLU lawyer Lucas Guttentag. "[Rumsfeld] was directly and personally involved."

Mr. Guttentag says that Rumsfeld also "failed to take the required actions to stop abuse in the face of overwhelming uncontroverted evidence that he received and was aware of."

The Defense secretary had been notified of the abuses via Red Cross reports, human rights organization reports, military internal reports, and FBI reports, according to documents obtained by the ACLU under the Freedom of Information Act, Guttentag says.

In addition to Rumsfeld, the suit names Lt. Gen. Ricardo Sanchez, commander of coalition forces in Iraq in 2003 and 2004, Col. Janis Karpinski, commander of the military unit that ran detention facilities in Iraq, and Col. Thomas Pappas, commander of the military unit that gathered intelligence in Iraq.

The civil suit was filed by lawyers with the ACLU and Human Rights First. It says Rumsfeld and the officers violated constitutional protections, international law, and the Geneva Conventions. The suit seeks compensatory damages and a judicial declaration that the legal rights of the detainees were violated under the Constitution, the Geneva accords, and other international law.

Government lawyers counter that Iraqi and Afghan citizens do not enjoy rights under the US Constitution or the Geneva Conventions to sue senior US officials for official actions taken overseas.

"I think it is a very uphill battle for the litigants here. I don't think this case is going to go very far," says Scott Silliman, a Duke University law professor and director of the Center on Law, Ethics and National Security.

"When you are dealing with the secretary of Defense what you have got to do is show that he was so far outside the scope of his duties as to be culpable," Professor Silliman says. "That is a hard standard to meet."

What makes it a particularly hard standard, Silliman and other legal analysts say, is that Rumsfeld was authorizing new interrogation techniques at the same time Justice Department lawyers were issuing legal memos justifying harsh, coercive interrogation tactics.

To prevail, ACLU lawyers must show that Rumsfeld knew what the law required and intentionally ignored those clearly established requirements. Short of that, Rumsfeld is entitled to immunity, says Richard Samp, a national security and constitutional law expert at the Washington Legal Foundation. "I've seen no document that says 'I hereby command you to inflict the following torture on individuals.' "

Others say immunity is not warranted in Rumsfeld's case. "Accountability, not immunity, for the conduct of military personnel within defendants' command is fundamental to military law, discipline and the law of war," writes Sidney Rosdeitcher in a friend-of-the-court brief filed on behalf of a group of military law experts.

Although allegations in the suit are the equivalent of war crimes, it is a civil case, not a criminal one. Only the US government is empowered to prosecute war crimes in criminal court or before a military court. Various commissions identified command-level problems as contributing to interrogation abuses, but government prosecution has focused on punishing "rogue individuals."

Australia PM Presses US On Guantanamo Bay Detainee (AP)

AP, December 8, 2006

CANBERRA (AP)--Prime Minister John Howard said Friday he was unhappy that an Australian terror suspect remained in U.S. custody at Guantanamo Bay in Cuba without charges.

But Howard said he was hopeful that David Hicks, an alleged Taliban fighter who was taken prisoner by the Northern Alliance in Afghanistan five years ago, will be charged by the Pentagon early next year.

Hicks, 31, had pleaded not guilty to charges of attempted murder, conspiracy to commit war crimes and aiding the enemy and had faced a preliminary hearing before a U.S. military commission.

But those charges were withdrawn when the U.S. Supreme Court ruled the military commissions were illegal in June. Congress has since passed laws to overhaul the military commission system.

On the eve of Hicks' fifth anniversary in custody, Howard said Friday his defense and foreign ministers would raise the delay with their U.S. counterparts when they attend annual bilateral ministerial talks in Washington next week.

"I'm not happy about it having taken so long and we are on a very regular basis pressing the Americans for a commitment that he be formally charged under the new military commission," Howard told Southern Cross Radio in Melbourne.

Howard said he pressed the issue with U.S. President George W. Bush when they attended an Asia-Pacific leaders forum in Vietnam last month and Attorney General Philip Ruddock raised Hicks again with U.S. Attorney General Alberto Gonzales this week.

More than 200 judges, lawyers and their supporters gathered in Melbourne's court precinct Friday to demonstrate against Hicks' detention.

"I don't think there's been a period since the 1950s and the McCarthyist era when we've seen such a sustained attack and disdain on fundamental notions of justice," lawyer and former state attorney general Jim Kennan told the protesters, referring to Communist-hunting former U.S. Senator Joseph McCarthy.

Terror Attacks Feared In Philippines (AP)

By Jim Gomez

AP, December 8, 2006

The U.S., Britain and Australia warned Thursday that terrorists may be plotting attacks in the central Philippines, the site of next week's summit of Asian leaders.

Australian and British officials used identical language in separate advisories, saying they believed "terrorists are in the final stages of planning attacks."

All three countries warned their citizens to avoid travel to Cebu province, a tourism and industrial hub 350 miles southeast of the capital, Manila. Australia upgraded its warning for Cebu to the highest level.

"We continue to receive reports that terrorist groups are planning further attacks and believe that they have the capacity and the intent to carry out attacks at any time and anywhere in the country," the British advisory said.

Leaders of the 10-member Association of Southeast Asian Nations will hold their annual summit Dec. 11-13 in Cebu along with heads of state from six other nations, including Chinese Premier Wen Jiabao and Japanese Prime Minister Shinzo Abe.

Philippine security officials said they have not discovered any specific terror threats against the summit, but that they could not discount them.

"We have received information, but these are not validated threats," military spokesman Lt. Col. Bartolome Bacarro said.

"We are not discounting the possibility that some ... threat groups would take advantage of the ASEAN summit," he said, adding that security forces were prepared and "all contingencies have been taken into consideration."

A confidential government threat assessment report, seen by The Associated Press, cited several groups that could pose a threat to the summit, including Jemaah Islamiyah, the Indonesian-based group accused of carrying out the 2002 nightclub bombings that killed 202 people in Bali.

It also cited two Philippine groups — the Muslim separatist Moro Islamic Liberation Front and al-Qaida linked Abu Sayyaf, blamed for a 2004 ferry bombing that killed 116 people near Manila.

The report said intelligence agencies have not monitored any specific plots against the ASEAN events by al-Qaida-linked groups, but added such possibilities were not far-fetched. Philippine officials said more than 10,000 troops and police were securing Cebu venues.

The U.S., British and Australian embassies said civilians in public places, including those frequented by foreigners, were potential targets. The U.S. Embassy warned Americans in Cebu "to re-assess their personal security and to keep a low profile."

The government's confidential report said a small group of Christian converts to Islam, the Rajah Solaiman Movement, may be planning to attack two financial districts in Manila, but the report did not say if that was linked to an effort to disrupt the summit.

Reacting to the British advisory, Chief Superintendant Silverio Alarcio, the regional police chief, said he did not know the basis for it but said security forces were prepared to deal with any plot.

In addition to Islamic militants, communist guerrillas could launch attacks against poorly guarded police stations and telecommunication towers to try to project an image of mayhem, he said.

Police have stepped up security in Cebu with random road checkpoints and car searches. Authorities have banned civilians from carrying guns in summit venues and restricted flights over the sites.

Philippine navy SEALs aboard speedboats have been checking coastal areas and a river, where anti-government protesters were planning a boat parade.

Terror Suspects Expelled From Egypt (AP)

By Nadia Abou El-magd

AP, December 8, 2006

Authorities expelled two Belgians and eight French terrorist suspects Thursday, but an American and another French citizen remained in Egyptian custody, officials said.

The 12, along with an unknown number of Egyptians and Arabs from other countries, were arrested late last month for allegedly belonging to an Islamist terror cell plotting attacks.

The two Belgians and eight French suspects left Cairo International Airport amid tight security on a charter flight for Brussels, an airport official said. The official spoke on condition of anonymity because he was not authorized to speak to the media.

The chartered plane flew first to Luxor, southern Egypt, where it picked up a group of tourists and then headed to Belgium, the official said. It was not immediately clear why the authorities chose to put the 10 suspects on a plane carrying tourists.

French Foreign Ministry spokesman Jean-Baptiste Mattei said his embassy in Cairo had told him of the expulsions and that the eight French suspects would be sent to France. Earlier this week that French officials had been allowed to visit the suspects while in Egypt's custody, he said.

There was no immediate word from Belgian officials on the expulsions, which come after Egyptian President Hosni Mubarak left Wednesday for a five-day trip to Europe.

Authorities have not provided details about the American, the remaining French citizen, the Egyptians and other Arabs still in custody in Egypt, and they have not released their identities.

The U.S. Embassy said it had not had consulate access to the American.

Earlier this week, the State Department criticized Egypt for refusing to grant U.S. officials timely access to the arrested American. Egyptian authorities told U.S. officials that no access will be granted until the investigation is completed, a state department spokesman said.

The Interior Minister said the suspects were allegedly living in Egypt under the guise of studying Arabic and had formed a militant cell that was plotting attacks.

Security officials said the suspects had a relationship with Omar Abdullah Hamra, the leader of the Islamic militant group Tawhid and Jihad, who killed himself by detonating an explosives belt while trying to cross into Lebanon from Syria. The officials spoke on condition of anonymity because of the sensitivity of the issue.

Egypt has seen a series of suicide attacks in recent years at Sinai Peninsula tourist resorts.

The country operates under emergency laws that give the government wide powers to detain suspects without charging them. The laws have been in place since the assassination of President Anwar Sadat in 1981, despite a growing chorus of opposition from both inside and outside the country.

Jordanian Court Convicts 4 Of Terrorism (AP)

By Shafika Mattar

AP, December 8, 2006

A Jordanian military court convicted three Syrians and one Iraqi Thursday and sentenced them to death for firing rockets at two U.S. warships in August 2005.

One of the Syrians, Mohammed Hassan Abdullah al-Sihly, is in police custody, but the other two Syrians, Abdul-Rahman al-Sihly and Abdullah al-Sihly, and the Iraqi, Amar al-Samera'i, remain at large and were tried in absentia.

The court acquitted Mohammed al-Sihly's three sons, who also were in police custody, and sentenced five others to various jail terms ranging from two to 10 years.

The rockets missed, but the Aqaba Bay incident was the most serious attack on the U.S. Navy since the 2000 bombing in Yemen of the destroyer USS Cole, which killed 17 sailors.

Fired from a warehouse on the outskirts of the Red Sea resort of Aqaba, one rocket landed outside a Jordanian military hospital on the far side of the bay and killed a Jordanian soldier. Another fell across the border in Israel. It did not explode, but slightly wounded an Israeli taxi driver.

HOMELAND RESPONSE:

Pakistani Student At HCC Charged In Taliban Plot (HC)

By Cindy George, Houston Chronicle

Houston Chronicle, December 8, 2006

FBI agent links 4-man conspiracy to a 2005 camping trip to Willis

A Pakistani student living in southwest Houston was taken into custody last week because of what he did and overheard on a weekend camping trip in Willis last year, an FBI agent said Thursday.

But Shiraz Syed Qazi's relatives, who also have another family member charged on suspicion of supporting the Taliban, said they were misled about the circumstances under which investigators obtained information from Qazi.

Qazi, 25, has pleaded not guilty to a charge of possession of a firearm by an alien. His cousin, Adnan Mirza, and Kobie Williams are charged with conspiracy in what prosecutors say was a plan to aid the Taliban by training to engage coalition forces overseas. Williams has pleaded guilty.

Syed Maaz Shah, 19, a student at the University of Texas at Dallas, also was charged with possession of a firearm by an alien. All four men are Muslims.

U.S. Magistrate Judge Frances Stacy denied bail Thursday, pending Qazi's scheduled Feb. 5 trial. Assistant U.S. Attorney Shelley Hicks argued against bail, saying Qazi was "with someone who has admitted to being a jihadist."

Federal public defender Brent Newton said the three dozen relatives and supporters who attended Thursday's hearing, some willing to post bail, proved that Qazi should be released while awaiting trial.

A July 2005 camping trip in Willis, north of Conroe, was part of the conspiracy, FBI Special Agent Jamaal King testified. Agents used Qazi's acknowledgment that "he overheard statements over that weekend" to help connect him to the terrorist plot, King said.

Qazi's older brother, Izzat Qazi, said FBI agents misled the family the night Qazi was arrested at his condo in the 9700 block of Richmond. He said the agent assured them that Qazi would not be interrogated, "just asked booking questions."

The brother said he believes that interview was conducted illegally, without an attorney present. He added that Qazi, a student at Houston Community College, would not have taken part in illegal acts.

Prosecutors have produced photos showing the four men on the weekend outing, which authorities say involved paramilitary training.

On Thursday, Hicks showed King four photographs. Two show Qazi holding an AR-15 rifle, one shows Qazi and Williams together and the fourth photo shows two targets with bullet holes, King testified.

Qazi's wife, who is three months pregnant, attended the hearing.

Newton told the judge Qazi has had difficulty contacting him while in solitary confinement. Hicks replied that solitary confinement is the policy for suspects awaiting trial on terrorism charges.

If convicted, Qazi faces up to 10 years in prison, a $250,000 fine and deportation.

Mirza, 29, a Houston Community College student, faces three weapons counts in addition to the conspiracy charge.

Williams, 33, also known as Abdul Kabeer and Abdul Kabir, is scheduled for sentencing in February.

Plan For Mosque Roils Houston Suburb (AP)

By Rasha Madkour

AP, December 8, 2006

KATY, TEXAS - A plan to build a mosque in this Houston suburb has triggered a neighborhood dispute, with community members warning the place will become a terrorist hotbed and one man threatening to hold pig races on Fridays just to offend the Muslims.

Many residents claim they have nothing against Muslims and are more concerned about property values and traffic.

But one resident has set up an anti-Islamic website with a counter that keeps track of terrorist attacks since Sept. 11. A committee has formed to buy another property and offer to trade it for the Muslims' land.

"The neighbors have created havoc for us, and we didn't expect that," said engineer Kamel Fotouh, president of the 500-member Katy Islamic Association.

He vowed to press ahead with plans for a mosque on the 11-acre site, as well as a community center that would offer after-school activities, housing for senior citizens, a fitness center and an Islamic school.

Katy, population 13,000, is a mix of middle-class bedroom-community neighborhoods and small farms on Houston's western edge and boasts of being the hometown of Oscar-winning actress Renee Zellweger. It is 70 percent white and 24 percent Hispanic.

The Houston metropolitan area has about 170,000 Muslims, said the Islamic Society of Greater Houston, and among their many mosques is one built in Houston by former NBA star Hakeem Olajuwon.

The Islamic association bought the land in Katy in September for $1.1 million. The dispute began when the group asked next-door neighbor Craig Baker to remove his cattle from their land. Baker agreed but mistakenly thought the Muslims also wanted him off the land that his family has lived on for more than 100 years. The rumor spread.

Baker said he got so mad he put up a sign about the pig races on the Muslim holy day. (But the offense missed its mark, Fotouh said. He said Muslims do not hate pigs, they just don't eat them.)

As for the website, the address is virtually identical to that of the Katy Islamic Association. The site claims the neighbors will have to hear the Muslim call to prayer from the minaret five times a day -- the Islamic group denies that. It also provides home addresses of some association members and advises people who see anything suspicious to contact the FBI. Many people have sent anti-Islamic e-mails to the site.

The reaction has not been all negative. Fotouh said one man came to the mosque and apologized for his neighbors. "He moved me, really," Fotouh said. "The sense of fairness, the sense of standing by the underdog."

U.S.-Bound Cargo To Be Screened At Six Ports (WP)

By Spencer S. Hsu

Washington Post, December 8, 2006

U.S.-bound cargo will be scanned for nuclear and radiological material at six foreign ports starting in February under a pact with host governments announced by U.S. officials yesterday, including a port operated by an Arab-owned company that ignited a political storm in Congress.

The Homeland Security and Energy departments next year will begin scanning all U.S.-bound containers at Puerto Cortes, Honduras; Qasim, Pakistan; and Southampton, England, officials said.

Limited scanning will also be done at Salalah, Oman; Singapore; and Busan, Korea, on a trial basis. The program will cover more than 7 percent of 11 million containers annually shipped to the United States.

DOJ_NMG_0103913

The Southampton facility is operated by Dubai Ports World, the United Arab Emirates company whose purchase of U.S. port operations was approved by the Bush administration, but which the company was pressured earlier this year to spin off by Congress because of security concerns over foreign ownership.

The company also has operations elsewhere at the Qasim and Busan port complexes, U.S. officials said.

In this case, Congress ordered the container-scanning program, Homeland Security Secretary Michael Chertoff said.

"If you want to do security overseas," Chertoff said, "you got to work with foreign governments and foreign companies, because they own the ports."

Congress passed legislation in September ordering pilot scanning at three overseas ports. U.S. officials will decide what containers to load or inspect. The host nation -- in Southampton's case, Britain -- exercises authority to inspect.

Democrats have called for screening of 100 percent of cargo at its point of departure.

"I don't think it's possible, for example, to reasonably say 100 percent," Chertoff said, in announcing $60 million to phase in the Secure Freight Initiative. "But if we could do 30 percent at some point, and then 70 percent here in the United States, that would still be a significant step forward."

U.S. To Expand Cargo Scans To Detect Nuclear Material (NYT)

By Eric Lipton

New York Times, December 8, 2006

WASHINGTON, Dec. 7 — All cargo sent by container ships to the United States from three ports — in Pakistan, Honduras and Southampton, England — will be scanned for hidden nuclear weapons or components starting next year under a federal antiterrorist program that some in Congress want to see mandated worldwide.

The program, called the Secure Freight Initiative, will require United States-bound containers before departure to pass through both a radiation detection machine and an X-ray device, a combination intended to find bomb-making materials that have intentionally been shielded.

It will cost a total of $60 million to set up the system in Pakistan, Honduras and Southampton, as well to begin scanning at least some United States-bound traffic from Korea, Singapore and Oman, officials said. The cost will be split by the Departments of Homeland Security and Energy, they said.

“There’s no weapon of mass destruction that is more formidable than a nuclear or a dirty bomb,” Homeland Security Secretary Michael Chertoff said Thursday in announcing the plan.

Yet even as officials introduced the new effort, some antiterrorism experts were openly asking if it made sense. Some noted that the screening would take place only on container ships, not on ships that carry millions of tons of other cargo, including cars, fuel or goods placed on pallets.

The equipment to be used — while better than no screening at all — is prone to triggering false alarms and is unable to see through many items that might be inside a container, including frozen food.

And if the equipment is installed in only a small number of ports, terrorists could simply choose to send a bomb by container from somewhere else, they said.

“The good news is we will only waste $60 million,” said James Jay Carafano, a senior fellow at the Heritage Foundation in Washington.

Mr. Chertoff and other department officials acknowledged that they did not know how well the system would work, or whether it would cause unacceptable bottlenecks.

The radiation scan and X-ray image of each container will be transmitted electronically to the United States or to customs officials elsewhere, who will then be able to ask foreign officials at the ports to do more comprehensive searches.

“When in doubt, we pull it out and then we open it up and look at it,” Mr. Chertoff said.

But officials said that not all of the X-ray images would be checked — meaning that a shielded bomb could still get through.

Already at about 50 ports worldwide, at the request of the United States, governments are doing limited checks of suspicious containers before they are loaded onto ships bound for the United States. Also, as containers arrive in the United States, about 80 percent of them are screened for radioactive substances once they are off-loaded. But this will be the first time, at the request of the United States government, that all cargo headed to the United State is sent through both an X-ray machine and a radiation detection monitor.

Democrats in Congress want to mandate that all cargo be screened for radioactive material overseas before departing. Ultimately, Congress ordered that the program be tested at a small number of ports.

Homeland Security Department officials said they wanted to expand the program beyond the six ports, eventually covering about 30 percent of United States-bound cargo, compared with the approximately 7 percent that will now be screened. But Mr.

Chertoff said he did not think it was realistic to mandate it globally. “If somebody says you have to make it 100 percent, and the foreign county does not agree, that is not a mandate that can be carried out,” he said.

Senator Charles E. Schumer, Democrat of New York, one of the leaders of the effort to impose the multipart screening, said that Democrats would probably give the Homeland Security Department some time to see how this test worked.

“The jury is out if this is a real turnaround,” he said.

U.S. To Check For Radiation In 6 Ports Overseas (AP)

By Devlin Barrett

AP, December 8, 2006

WASHINGTON – U.S.-bound cargo at six overseas ports will be screened for nuclear and radiological material in an expanded effort to prevent terrorist bombs from entering American waters, federal officials said Thursday.

The Homeland Security Department said it would scan all containers bound for the United States in the ports of Qasim, Pakistan; Puerto Cortes, Honduras; and Southampton, England.

Radiological scanning will also be done at Port Salaleh in Oman, the Port of Singapore, and the Gamman Terminal at Port Busan in Korea, though not every container will be screened, officials said. Officials said the examinations would begin early next year at all six ports.

When fully operational, the program will screen about 8 percent of the 11 million cargo containers that reach U.S. shores each year.

The Southampton facility is operated by Dubai Ports World, the same company whose planned purchase of U.S. port operations caused an uproar earlier this year. One of the chief opponents of that deal said the company had undergone closer scrutiny this time.

Homeland Security Secretary Michael Chertoff called the effort part of a strategy to “secure the global supply chain and cut off any possibility of exploitation by terrorists.”

The program was created by Congress in September, but the agency said it was going beyond the legislation's requirement of screening in three foreign ports.

The Homeland Security and Energy departments will split the nearly $60 million cost of the detection equipment, ranging from large portals to handheld scanners.

The screening will be done by local port officials, but data from the sensors will be given instantly to U.S. Customs and Border Protection officers working in the overseas ports.

Sen. Charles Schumer, D-N.Y., whose amendment to ports legislation created the program, said he wants the program to grow to further ports.

“It makes sense to focus this program on the ports that present the greatest risks, and we'll continue to fight to expand this program to ports around the world,” Schumer said.

As for the agreement with Dubai Ports World, Schumer said “they have undergone significant scrutiny to join this program, unlike what we experienced in the first episode.”

Six Foreign Ports To Scan Cargo For Nuclear Devices (GovExec/TD)

By Chris Strohm

Government Executive/Technology Daily, December 7, 2006

The Energy and Homeland Security departments on Thursday announced that new cargo-detection equipment will be installed at six foreign seaports to scan U.S.-bound containers for weapons of mass destruction. The goal is to meet, and even exceed, congressional requirements.

Under the Secure Freight Initiative, detection equipment will be installed at Puerto Cortes in Honduras, Port Qasim in Pakistan, and Southampton in the United Kingdom. All U.S.-bound cargo originating from those ports will be scanned by a radiation-detection system and X-ray machine, and have their identification numbers read by an optical character reader.

Homeland Security Secretary Michael Chertoff said doing so will meet a mandate from Congress in a port security bill cleared two months ago. It requires that all U.S.-bound cargo at three foreign ports be scanned.

"Our highest priority and greatest sense of urgency has to be aimed at preventing a nuclear weapon or dirty-bomb attack against the homeland," Chertoff said. "This initiative advances a comprehensive strategy to secure the global supply chain and cut off any possibility of exploitation by terrorists." A dirty bomb is a small, nontraditional nuclear device.

Chertoff said the department would go beyond the congressional mandate by also installing radiation detection and X-ray scanners at three other ports: the Gamman Terminal at Port Busan in South Korea, Port Salalah in Oman, and the Port of Singapore. Only a portion of containers at those three ports will be run through some screening lanes equipped with the technology.

The new detection equipment will become operational at the ports in Honduras and Pakistan in February, followed by Southhampton in June or July. Equipment will be deployed to the remaining three ports late in 2007.

Chertoff said the data on each container will be sent electronically to U.S. Customs and Border Protection officials, who will decide whether it needs to be inspected further. "We will not outsource our security," he said. "In the end, the go-no decision rests with our guys sitting in a CBP office."

Local law enforcement at each port would be responsible for doing further inspections. The two departments plan to spend $60 million for deploying the equipment to the six ports.

Once the scanning equipment is deployed at all six ports, a total of 7 percent of all U.S.-bound cargo will be scanned for weapons of mass destruction, Chertoff said.

Some Democrats in Congress have supported a mandate that would require Homeland Security to ensure that all U.S.-bound cargo is scanned for weapons of mass destruction within five years. Chertoff said meeting any such mandate would require reaching agreements with foreign governments.

"It's going to take foreign governments to agree to this," he said. "I certainly don't want to have the United States appear to be bullies."

It was not immediately clear how the Energy and Homeland Security departments would select which companies provide technology under the initiative.

Diversity Of Opinion On Imams' Dispute With Airline (WP)

By Kari Lydersen

The Washington Post, December 8, 2006

MINNEAPOLIS, Dec. 7 -- For years, the Minneapolis-St. Paul area has been known for its liberalism and tolerance, especially when it comes to religion. Many Muslims, including the largest population of Somalis outside of Mogadishu, make their home in the Twin Cities. The area just elected the nation's first Muslim congressman, Keith Ellison (D).

"We are well known for acceptance at a period in time when much of America feels like an unwelcome place" for Muslims, said Minneapolis Mayor R.T. Rybak. "This is a place where Muslims are succeeding and thriving in leadership positions."

So, last month's removal of six imams from a Phoenix-bound US Airways flight at the Minneapolis-St. Paul International Airport has prompted hand-wringing, finger-pointing, calls for greater sensitivity to religious diversity and more communication between non-Muslims and Muslims.

Police and airline officials say the imams, who attended a national conference of Muslim clerics, were removed after exhibiting suspicious behavior, including uttering anti-American statements, changing their seat assignments so that they would be scattered around the airplane and asking for seat-belt extenders, which could be used as weapons. Valerie Wunder, a spokeswoman for US Airways, said yesterday that the airline has completed its investigation of the incident and has concluded that the flight crew was justified in its actions.

But the imams say the behavior in question was merely quiet prayers before boarding the flight.

Local Muslims of various ethnicities are united in their anger over the imams' treatment. The Metropolitan Airports Commission met last week with local imams who are calling for a prayer room to be created at the airport, where many Somali Muslims are employed.

"They say there is freedom of speech and freedom of religion here," said Mahammed Osman, 35, a vendor at the Karmel Square Somali Mall in Minneapolis. "I'm a Muslim, but I respect other religions. Christian people pray everywhere, like in the Mall of America, and no one says anything."

Many non-Muslim residents agree that Muslims should be able to practice their religion. But many also think that the imams should have been more discreet and sensitive to fears about terrorism.

"It seemed like they were trying to make a point rather than exercise their religious freedom," said Erika Smith, 40, a Minneapolis scientist with General Mills Inc. "They did it in a way that was insensitive to people in the airport."

"I think they staged it," Jerry Church, 43, a computer programmer from Gainesville, Fla., said at the airport on Saturday. "It seems like they wanted to create a ruckus to make a point."

Smith said the airport should provide a place where Muslims can pray.

Ellison, who has created a controversy of his own by pledging to use the Koran for his swearing-in ceremony, has called for a meeting with representatives of US Airways and the airport commission; it is being set up, according to his campaign manager, Dave Colling.

Metropolitan Airports Commission spokesman Patrick Hogan said that, while the commission has no say in a pilot's decision to take someone off a plane, the commission is supportive of Muslims' right to pray in the airport. Officials said they are considering a "meditation room" where people of various faiths can pray, and they will visit a mosque at the request of local imams.

"Muslims fly through this airport all the time, and we don't have incidents of this kind," Hogan said. "I have Muslims asking me where they can pray in the airport, and I direct them to a quiet place and tell them which way is east."

But Sumbal Mahmud, a Minneapolis lawyer and spokeswoman for the Islamic Center of Minnesota, thinks local residents still have a lot to learn about Muslims. She is concerned that passengers felt threatened by the imams' alleged repetition of the word "Allah," he said.

"There are words like 'Inshallah' -- God willing -- or 'Mashallah' that come out of my mouth all the time," she said. "How uneducated are people that they can't differentiate prayer from nefarious activity? This really could have been my brother or dad -- anyone with a beard who looks brown or Arab."

Omar Shahin, one of the imams removed from the plane, said they were not praying loudly. He thinks US Airways and the media have been misrepresenting the incident. "The rumor that we were chanting Allah, making anti-American comments -- this never happened," Shahin said. "We teach at universities, we are Americans, we live in this country and love this country. Everybody who knows me knows I am the first one to do fundraising for the victims of 9/11, Katrina, the tsunami. This broke my heart."

Nihad Awad, executive director of the Council on American-Islamic Relations, is angry that false rumors were circulated, including that the imams had one-way tickets and paid in cash. The group has called for an investigation and is considering a lawsuit, Awad said.

"We believe these allegations have been aired to justify the actions of US Airways," he said. "We believe it's shameful to smear them after subjecting them to this treatment," he added, referring to the imams.

TSA May Let Non-fliers Go To Gates (USAT)

By Thomas Frank

USA Today, December 8, 2006

The Transportation Security Administration is testing whether it can ease a post-9/11 policy that bars people from meeting relatives and friends at airports as they come off flights.

A test program at Dallas/Fort Worth and Detroit airports could pave the way for other airports to allow non-travelers through checkpoints to meet passengers or shop at stores and restaurants.

"There are a lot of airports that would like people without boarding passes to have access to concessions," said Michael Conway, a spokesman for Detroit Metro Airport, which starts its test next week. Dallas' test started last week.

The TSA began requiring boarding passes at checkpoints after it took over airport security in 2002 — largely to reduce the number of people getting screened and ease lines, said Steve Martin of the Airports Council International.

Letting non-travelers back in security lines "adds to the congestion and the difficulty of screening," said aviation security consultant Billie Vincent.

The TSA says it won't waive boarding-pass requirements if it would lengthen lines or weaken security, and notes that the test is small. Only guests at hotels inside the Dallas and Detroit airport terminals can go through security without boarding passes, and they must be checked against terrorist watch lists.

"We are interested to evaluate how limited expansion. .. would work," TSA spokeswoman Amy Kudwa said.

Pittsburgh International Airport is watching. The TSA blocked the airport's 2003 bid to let non-passengers beyond checkpoints. If TSA's pilot program "is a success," airport spokeswoman JoAnn Jenny said, "we might be able to persuade them to let us try it with the public."

Steven Brill, whose company Verified Identity Pass speeds up security for travelers who pass background checks, said his non-flying customers also should be allowed through checkpoints. The TSA pilot "establishes the concept that people who aren't boarding planes can go through and use the shops," Brill said.

Airlines currently can give airline club members and parents of young children "gate passes" that allow them through checkpoints.

The Dallas and Detroit airports say their waiver will let people at the airports' terminal hotels patronize dozens of shops and restaurants beyond security checkpoints. That helps attract tourists and conferences, said Jim Crites of the Dallas airport.

"For airports, it provides additional non-aeronautical revenue and passenger service," said aviation consultant Stephen Van Beek.

Martin of the Airports Council doesn't expect a major expansion of the test program because airports fear that non-travelers would back up security lines.

"I don't think we're going back to where it was" before 9/11, Martin said.

Securing Common Sense (WP)

IF THE FIRST step to recovery is admitting you have a problem, then Homeland Security Secretary Michael Chertoff's comments to a conference of state and local preparedness officials last week should be welcomed. His lieutenants spent the summer defending a grants scheme that cut anti-terrorism funding for the District and New York City in favor of places such as Sacramento, Tampa and Omaha, insisting, counterintuitively, that the formulation was based on a rational assessment of risk. But on Tuesday Mr. Chertoff said, "We've come to the conclusion that perhaps there was a little too much bean counting and a little less standing back and applying common sense to look at the total picture."

In fact, the Department of Homeland Security's clumsy efforts to set priorities this year bordered on the farcical. Washington and New York lost 40 percent of their money while Louisville was granted a 70 percent increase. A DHS risk assessment claimed that New York had no national monuments or icons while Indiana led the country in potential targets of terrorism, according to a list the department compiled. Homeland Security put Washington in a low-risk category of terrorist attack or catastrophe while 75 percent of states scored higher.

It's obvious these results lack "common sense," and it shouldn't have taken Mr. Chertoff six months to admit as much. Now that he has, though, we expect that less "bean counting" will mean that next year a greater share of Homeland Security money will come back to the places most attractive to terrorists aiming to disrupt Americans' lives and create a spectacle -- Washington and New York.

The department might also get a nudge from congressional Democrats, who had promised to enact all of the Sept. 11 commission's recommendations in their first 100 hours of controlling Congress in January. These include making Homeland Security funding formulas more risk-based instead of distributing large amounts of money to every state, a proposal that has stalled in the Senate. Democratic leaders have already tabled consideration of one of the commission's better recommendations -- restructuring congressional supervision of the nation's intelligence operations. We hope they keep risk-based funding prominent on their agenda.

WAR NEWS:

Bush Appears Cool To Key Points Of Report On Iraq (WP)

By Peter Baker, Robin Wright

The Washington Post, December 8, 2006

President Bush vowed yesterday to come up with "a new strategy" in Iraq but expressed little enthusiasm for the central ideas of a bipartisan commission that advised him to ratchet back the U.S. military commitment in Iraq and launch an aggressive new diplomatic effort in the region.

On the day after the congressionally chartered Iraq Study Group released its widely anticipated report, much of Washington maneuvered to pick out the parts they like and pick apart those they do not. The report's authors were greeted with skepticism on Capitol Hill, and Democratic leaders used the occasion to press Bush to change course without embracing the commission's particular recipe themselves.

The group's 96-page report roiled some in the Middle East, particularly Israel, which rejected proposals for concessions to Syria. And it drew fire from current and former U.S. officials who called its diplomacy ideas unrealistic, unattainable and even misguided. The U.S. ground commander in Iraq, while welcoming the report's broad principles, warned that meeting its goal of withdrawing combat units by early 2008 could prove to "be very problematic."

The emerging debate over the report sets a baseline for the administration's own internal review of Iraq policy, which officials hope to complete in time for Bush to give a speech to the nation before Christmas announcing his new plan for Iraq. At a news conference with visiting British Prime Minister Tony Blair, Bush called himself "disappointed by the pace of success" and said that "we'll change it if we want to succeed."

"The American people expect us to come up with a new strategy to achieve the objective which I've been talking about," Bush said.

Yet, while the president called the Iraq Study Group's ideas "worthy of serious study," he seemed to dismiss the most significant ones point by point. He noted that Blair is heading to the Middle East to promote Arab-Israeli peace, but he gave no indication that he plans an aggressive new push of his own as proposed by the commission. Bush said he, too, wants to bring U.S. troops home but noted that the group qualified its 2008 goal by linking it to security on the ground.

And he repeated his refusal to talk with Iran and Syria unless Tehran suspends its uranium-enrichment program, Damascus stops interfering in Lebanon and both drop their support for terrorist groups. "The truth of the matter is that these countries have now got the choice to make," Bush said. "If they want to sit down at the table with the United States, it's easy: Just make some decisions that will lead to peace, not to conflict."

With the commission -- led by former secretary of state James A. Baker III and former congressman Lee H. Hamilton (D-Ind.) -- having advanced 79 recommendations, Bush made clear that he intends to cherry-pick some and ignore others. "I don't think Jim Baker and Lee Hamilton expect us to accept every recommendation," Bush said. "I think they expect us to consider every recommendation."

Actually, Baker and Hamilton said on Wednesday that they do want the president to accept the commission's plan as a whole, not simply pieces of it. But they lowered their expectations yesterday and welcomed Bush's comments. "Every single statement the president has made that I have seen . . . has been positive," Hamilton told reporters. "Now, he didn't jump and embrace the report and say 'I'm going to enact all 79 recommendations.' We didn't have that expectation."

Baker and Hamilton did offer a forceful defense of their call for a more robust Middle East diplomacy as critical to helping stabilize Iraq -- perhaps the most controversial part of their report. "In order for Iraq to succeed, the neighbors are going to have to come together to reinforce and take steps to reinforce the positive steps which we hope will take place in Iraq," Hamilton said. "These problems in the Middle East are interconnected with one another."

The report, for example, lays out an elaborate plan to solve the Arab-Israeli conflict by getting Israel to return the Golan Heights in exchange for Syria recognizing Israel, dropping ties to extremists and leaving Lebanon alone. U.S. officials think that this approach is outdated, that Syria is less interested today in the Golan Heights than on winning back influence over Lebanon and terminating U.N. efforts to hold Syria to account for the assassination of Lebanese reformers.

Baker rejected the idea, advanced by some in the administration, that the Middle East has changed so dramatically in the 15 years since he was in office that engaging Syria will not work. "So don't try because it's going to be tough? Come on!" Baker said. "Don't say 'Because it isn't going to happen' that you ought not to try."

"How do you solve problems without talking to people?" Hamilton asked. The panel, he added, "flat out" rejects the idea that talks should depend on good behavior.

Still, Baker said, "the last thing in the world" he is interested in is "backing the president into any corner" on Iraq. "That's not the purpose of this," he said. Unlike the commission that investigated the Sept. 11, 2001, terrorist attacks, Baker said his panel does not intend to stay around to monitor the implementation of its recommendations. After appearing on Sunday talk shows, he said, "I'm finished."

Former senior officials also questioned the focus on Iran and Syria. "They can be spoilers in Iraq, but they're not the fixers," said Dennis Ross, former chief Middle East negotiator for two administrations. "Even if Iran and Syria did exactly what we want, we'd still have an insurgency in Anbar province and we'd still have sectarian warfare driven in no small part by the Shiite militias. Ultimately, the problems we face today come from within Iraq, not outside it."

The plan would not work without a committed effort, which the Bush administration has never demonstrated, others said. "Cherry-picking ideas and sending them into the bowels of the stovepiped bureaucracy to execute will result in more of the same uncoordinated, differing priorities, mess," said retired Marine Gen. Anthony C. Zinni, a former Middle East mediator for the Bush administration.

Other military officers expressed caution about the Iraq Study Group's proposal to pull out combat units by the first quarter of 2008 while leaving behind tens of thousands of troops to train, advise and embed with Iraqi forces.

Army Lt. Gen. Peter W. Chiarelli, the top U.S. field commander in Iraq, said in a telephone interview that he has read the report's executive summary and found many recommendations "very, very valuable." He added: "I dare say I believe if we had applied some of these principles a little bit earlier on in our time over here, many of the issues we're facing here today might not in fact be, and we might not have the level of violence here."

Chiarelli said that he agrees it makes sense to shift the mission to a supporting role as Iraqi forces take responsibility for security, but that it could be difficult to remove combat forces by early 2008. "I think that date may be a date we could meet . . . if we would harness all the power we have as a nation," he said, referring to diplomatic and economic efforts as well as military. "If all you do is rely on what is the easy part for us" -- meaning the military effort -- and "if we don't get buy-in in the other areas the study group has pointed to, I think that's going to be very problematic."

At his news conference, Bush brushed past the 2008 goal and said troop withdrawals would depend on conditions on the ground. "I've always said we'd like our troops out as fast as possible," he said. "I think that's an important goal."

In his opening remarks, Bush focused on the broader aspirations of the Iraq war: the "spread of freedom" and the attempt to build "societies based on liberty" in the Middle East -- concepts implicitly rejected by the Baker-Hamilton commission as unrealistic and naive. "The only way to secure a lasting peace for our children and grandchildren is to defeat the extremist ideologies and help the ideology of hope, democracy, prevail," he said.

But just days after his new defense secretary, Robert M. Gates, and his close friend Blair both said that they believe the United States and Britain are not winning the war, Bush bristled when asked if he was "still in denial about how bad things are in Iraq."

"It's bad in Iraq," Bush replied sharply, glaring at the reporter. "Does that help?"

The president added: "In all due respect, I've been saying it a lot. I understand how tough it is, and I've been telling the American people how tough it is . . . I also believe we're going to succeed. I believe we'll prevail."

Bush Rejects Iraq Report's Key Recommendations (AFP)

By Olivier Knox

AFP, December 7, 2006

US President George W. Bush rebuffed key recommendations from the Iraq Study Group but announced a new Middle East peace push after talks with British Prime Minister Tony Blair.

On day after receiving the heavyweight Iraq commission's report, Bush said that Blair would soon travel to the region for talks with Israel and the Palestinians, and promised "concerted efforts to advance the cause of peace."

The prime minister's visit was to set the stage for US Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice, in early 2007, to make her eighth trip in two years to Israel and the Palestinian territories, her spokesman said.

Bush, giving a cool reception to two key commission proposals, kept tight conditions on any talks with Iran and Syria and refused to endorse the panel's call for withdrawing most US combat troops by early 2008.

"I've always said we'd like our troops out as fast as possible," he said, while insisting on the need to be "flexible and realistic" and tying any change in troop level to advice from US military commanders, as he has in the past.

Bush initially described soaring violence in Iraq, which the report warned may spiral into a regional war even with a US strategic overhaul, as merely "unsettling" -- but revised his diagnosis when a reporter challenged him.

"It's bad in Iraq. That help?" he countered. "You want frankness? I thought we would succeed quicker than we did. And I am disappointed by the pace of success."

Bush lavished praise on the Iraq Study Group, calling it "worthy of serious study," declaring that "the American people expect us to come up with a new strategy to achieve the objective," and stressing: "We need a new approach."

But he cautioned that the review, led by former secretary of state James Baker and former representative Lee Hamilton, was one of many, citing pending reviews by the Pentagon, US State Department, and national security council.

Bush said he would make a speech outlining his strategy "after I get the reports," a move the White House says will come in weeks.

"I don't think Jim Baker and Lee Hamilton expect us to accept every recommendation," he said. "I know they expect us to consider every recommendation; that we ought to pay close attention to what they advise."

The report, which warns that the situation in Iraq is "grave and deteriorating," called for most US combat troops to be withdrawn by early 2008, for more talks with Iran and Syria, and for a new Middle East peace effort.

Bush said Damascus and Tehran might be welcome if they renounce support for extremists and pledge support for Baghdad's fledgling government, otherwise "they shouldn't bother to show up."

Bush also reiterated his longstanding condition that Iran freeze sensitive nuclear work before any direct talks.

"Should they agree to verifiably suspend their (uranium) enrichment, the United States will be at the table with our partners," he said, telling Tehran: "There's no need to continue this obstinance."

Bush and Blair had also been expected to discuss efforts to boost NATO troop levels in Afghanistan, plans to shore up an international peacekeeping force in Sudan's Darfur province and trans-Atlantic relations, US officials said.

The meeting followed the November 7 US legislative elections, in which Bush's Republican Party lost control of Congress to the opposition Democrats, and the departures of Defense Secretary Donald Rumsfeld and UN Ambassador John Bolton -- both Iraq war hawks.

It also came one week after a dispute inside the State Department, triggered when a senior analyst said he was "ashamed" of the way Bush treated Blair and that US-British relations were "totally one-sided" in Washington's favor.

"Britain and America are old allies, and the prime minister and I are strong friends," said Bush. "We're standing together because our two nations face an unprecedented threat to civilization."

Bush Backs Away From 2 Key Ideas Of Panel On Iraq (NYT)

By Sheryl Gay Stolberg, Kate Zernike

WASHINGTON, Dec. 7 — President Bush moved quickly to distance himself on Thursday from the central recommendations of the bipartisan Iraq Study Group, even as the panel's co-chairmen opened an intensive lobbying effort on Capitol Hill to press Mr. Bush to adopt their report wholesale.

One day after the study group rattled Washington with its bleak assessment of conditions in Iraq, its Republican co-chairman, James A. Baker III, said the White House must not treat the report "like a fruit salad," while the Democratic co-chairman, Lee H. Hamilton, called on Congress to abandon its "extremely timid" approach to overseeing the war.

But Mr. Bush, making his first extended comments on the study, seemed to push back against two of its most fundamental recommendations: pulling back American combat brigades from Iraq over the next 15 months, and engaging in direct talks with Iran and Syria. He said he needed to be "flexible and realistic" in making decisions about troop movements, and he set conditions for talks with Iran and Syria that neither country was likely to accept.

The president addressed reporters after meeting in the White House with his closest ally in the war, Prime Minister Tony Blair of Britain. In light of the report's stark warning that the situation in Iraq was "grave and deteriorating," Mr. Bush came close to acknowledging mistakes. "You wanted frankness — I thought we would succeed quicker than we did," the president said to a British reporter who asked for candor. "And I am disappointed by the pace of success."

But Mr. Bush, and to a lesser extent, Mr. Blair, continued to talk about the war in the kind of sweeping, ideological terms the Iraq Study Group avoided in its report. While the commission settled on stability as a realistic American goal for Iraq, Mr. Bush cast the conflict as part of a broader struggle between good and evil, totalitarianism and democracy.

If extremists emerge triumphant in the Middle East, Mr. Bush warned, "History will look back on our time with unforgiving clarity and demand to know, what happened? How come free nations did not act to preserve the peace?"

While the president said he would give the report serious consideration, he said he did not intend to accept all 79 recommendations. "Congress isn't going to accept every recommendation in the report," Mr. Bush said, "and neither will the administration."

Three other reviews — one by the Pentagon, one by the State Department and one by the National Security Council — are under way, and Mr. Bush reiterated Thursday that while he believed that the nation needed "a new approach" in Iraq, he would make no decision until he received those reports. The current White House plan is for Mr. Bush to receive them over the next week to 10 days, then make a decision about what both he and the Baker-Hamilton commission are calling "the way forward" in Iraq. He intends to announce his plans in a speech before the end of the year, probably before Christmas, according to administration officials.

Pentagon officials are scheduled to brief Mr. Bush soon on the department's recommendations for a strategy shift in Iraq. The department's recommendations are likely to differ in some respects from the ideas presented by the Iraq Study Group, particularly over the role to be played by American combat troops over the next 12 to 18 months.

Mr. Bush and Mr. Blair have long stood side by side on the war in Iraq. The White House insisted that Mr. Blair's appearance on Thursday was not timed to coincide with the release of the report, but it did help them underscore — as Tony Snow, the White House press secretary, put it — that "the president isn't standing alone."

The Pentagon recommendations, which are still being completed, are the product of discussions in recent weeks among ground commanders, the Joint Chiefs of Staff and civilian officials in the department. While department officials are likely to present Mr. Bush with one set of recommendations, differences remain.

Some officials still back the idea of a temporary surge in American troops, though the top commander in the Middle East, Gen. John P. Abizaid, has been urging recently that any troop shortfall to restore security in Baghdad should be filled by more Iraqi forces or by repositioning American forces now in Iraq.

Military officials are also concerned about the Iraq Study Group's call for pulling back all American combat brigades over the next 15 months, a goal that some uniformed officials see as desirable but possibly unrealistic. Pentagon officials remain skeptical about the timetable, and they are leaning toward an approach that pulls back some combat brigades but keeps others in Baghdad and other violence-ridden areas of Iraq until Iraqi units can better handle the fight on their own.

Though the Iraq Study Group also called for keeping enough American troops in place to provide protection to expanded teams of American advisers attached to Iraqi Army units, Pentagon officials fear that the panel's recommendations, if adopted, could lead to withdrawals of substantial American troops before the Iraqi units can stand on their own.

The study group said combat brigades could withdraw from Iraq by the first quarter of 2008 if conditions on the ground permitted. Some analysts say that phrasing gives Mr. Bush wiggle room to ignore the call for withdrawal, and on Thursday Mr.

Bush seized on that "qualifier," as he called it. "I thought that made a lot of sense. I've always said we'd like our troops out as fast as possible."

Mr. Bush was sensitive about commenting on the military recommendations put forth by the Iraq Study Group until he heard from his own commanders, according to a senior administration official, who was authorized to discuss the president's point of view. "When you have your military leadership who are tasked with fighting this war, who are in the process of giving him military advice, you also have to be deferential to that," this official said.

On Iran and Syria, Mr. Bush stuck to the conditions he set long ago for talks: Iran must abandon its nuclear program, and Syria must give up its support for the Lebanese militant group Hezbollah. "If they want to sit down at the table with the United States, it's easy — just make some decisions that will lead to peace, not to conflict," he said.

The Baker-Hamilton panel — five Republicans and five Democrats — made an intense plea for a bipartisan consensus, and Mr. Bush's aides say the president has taken at least that part of their effort to heart. He met Wednesday with leaders of committees that oversee foreign affairs, defense and intelligence, and plans to meet with Republican and Democratic leaders on Friday.

The Wednesday meeting opened with Mr. Bush making an overture to Democrats, the senior official said, and telling them that although they may believe he has made the wrong decisions, they needed to work together. "The president started by saying that, you know, there's a lot of water under the bridge, but that while we may not share all the views of this report, we ought to use it as an opportunity to work together," the official said, adding, "I've been through a lot of those meetings, and sometimes you feel like people are going through the motions. And I felt yesterday that there was really a sincere effort, both Republican and Democrat, to say this could provide us an opportunity to find common ground."

On Capitol Hill on Thursday, Republican and Democratic senators pressed Mr. Baker and Mr. Hamilton for ways that Congress could be involved in shaping the president's response to the report — noting that the original impetus for the study group had come from Capitol Hill. "We've now heard from the Iraq Study Group, but we need the White House to become the Iraq Results Group," said Senator Hillary Rodham Clinton, Democrat of New York.

Mr. Baker replied by asking Congress to accept the report, saying that would put pressure on the administration to do the same. "If the Congress could come together behind supporting, let's say, utopianly, all of the recommendations of this report, that would do a lot toward moving things downtown, in my opinion," he said. Both he and Mr. Hamilton argued that cherry-picking the suggestions would not work.

"I hope we don't treat this like a fruit salad and say, 'I like this but I don't like that. I like this, but I don't like that,' " Mr. Baker said. "This is a comprehensive strategy designed to deal with this problem we're facing in Iraq, but also designed to deal with other problems that we face in the region, and to restore America's standing and credibility in that part of the world."

Bush, Blair Vow To Weigh Panel's Iraq Findings (LAT)

By Johanna Neuman

The Los Angeles Times, December 8, 2006

WASHINGTON — President Bush, calling the increased violence in Baghdad "unsettling," said today that he was "disappointed by the pace of success" in Iraq but expected to prevail.

One day after the Iraq Study Group issued a stinging critique of U.S. strategy in Iraq, Bush said during a press conference with British Prime Minister Tony Blair that he and Blair had both read the report and discussed its recommendations.

"I don't think Jim Baker and Lee Hamilton expect us to accept every recommendation," Bush said of the study group's co-chairmen. "We will spend a lot of time on it."

The president did not discuss any of the report's specific recommendations, saying that he had asked the Pentagon to also study "a way forward" to achieve U.S. goals — a stable and democratic Iraq that can be an ally in the war on terror.

The president said he would take the recommendations seriously. But he noted, "Congress is not going to accept every recommendation in the report and neither is the administration."

Asked specifically whether U.S. combat troops will be withdrawn from Iraq by 2008, Bush said that "we'd like our troops out as fast as possible," but that "our commanders will be making recommendations based upon whether we can achieve our objectives."

Asked bluntly if he was still in denial about the situation in Iraq, Bush grew emotional. "I talk to the families who die," he said. "I also understand how brave our men and women who wear the uniform are. I understand how hard it is on wives and families, especially as we come into the holiday season." Still, Bush said, he believes U.S. and British forces will prevail.

"Our job is to help the forces of moderation," he said. Calling Sept. 11 "a wake-up call for the American people," he said that "a threat overseas can come home to hurt us here.… I wouldn't have our troops in harm's way if didn't believe that."

Blair, who leaves office next year after a tumble in public opinion over the Iraq war, agreed. "The vision is the right vision," he said.

Blair said he welcomed the Baker-Hamilton report and that he was open to the idea of increasing diplomacy with Iraq's neighbors to achieve peace. But he warned that such an effort will require Iran to stop financing terrorists and help the fledgling democracy in Iraq.

Bush agreed, saying, that "if Syria and Iran are not committed to that concept, they shouldn't show up."

Blair, who leaves soon for a diplomatic mission to the Middle East to kick-start the stalled peace process, said a solution to the Israeli-Palestinian conflict could have enormous positive impact on the region.

Blair said he was frustrated by the fact that all parties had agreed to a two-state solution for Israel and Palestine but were having trouble implementing it.

"There's no way you ever succeed in these things unless you keep on trying," he said, calling his mission an attempt to "get the door unlocked."

On the 65th anniversary of the Japanese attack on Pearl Harbor that launched U.S. involvement in World War II, Bush talked about the dangers of isolationism.

"Sixty-five years ago this day, America was jolted out of our isolationism and plunged into a global war that Britain had been fighting for two years," he said.

Of the Iraq war, the president added: "This is a good cause.…We will prevail."

A Skirmish Over Report On War (NSDY)

By Craig Gordon

Newsday, December 8, 2006

President George W. Bush squared off Thursday with a blue-ribbon Iraq panel over some of its key goals, rebuffing a call for unconditional U.S. talks with Iran and Syria and refusing to back a troop withdrawal by early 2008.

A day after the bipartisan group slammed his policy and warned of a slide toward anarchy, Bush said he stood by his determination to prevail but also recognized the difficulties ahead.

"It's bad in Iraq. That help?" he said sharply when pressed on whether he was in denial about the situation there.

"I thought we would succeed quicker than we did," Bush said. "And I am disappointed by the pace of success."

Bush said he would lay out a new strategy for the nearly four-year-old war in a coming speech, probably before the end of the year, but offered no hints of what that strategy might be.

And with British Prime Minister Tony Blair at his side, Bush called the group's report "very constructive" but also made clear that he still viewed Iraq as central to his goal of a worldwide fight against terrorism and was defiant in his desire to see it through, despite the difficulties. "I believe we'll prevail," he said.

Bush's comments came as the the Iraq Study Group saw one of its key recommendations -- U.S. talks with key rivals in the Middle East "without preconditions" -- come under fire from Bush, members of both parties in Congress and even the Israeli government.

Bush gave general support to the group's idea of linking improvements in the overall Arab-Israeli crisis to improvements in Iraq, and Blair announced he would travel to the region soon. Bush also called the panel's idea for an international conference with Iraq's neighbors an "interesting idea."

But when it came to talking to Iran and Syria without conditions, Bush appeared to dig in, saying both nations had to change their ways.

"If people come to the table to discuss Iraq, they need to come understanding their responsibilities to not fund terrorists, to help this young democracy survive, to help with the economics of the country," Bush said.

If Iran and Syria won't do that, "then they shouldn't bother to show up," Bush said.

The panel's co-chairman, however, said the recommendation on Iran and Syria was meant to "flat-out reject" Bush's long-standing refusal not to speak to enemies like those for fear of rewarding bad behavior.

"Talking is not a reward," said former Rep. Lee Hamilton. "Look, we've got problems to solve, and you've got to talk to people to solve problems."

Panel co-chairman James Baker said that Iran already has been helpful to the United States on Afghanistan, and that Bush authorized Baker to speak to Iran in preparing the report.

"We're not naive enough to think that in this case they may want to help. They probably don't," said Baker, who was secretary of state when Bush's father was president. "Fine. What do we lose by saying we're getting all of Iraq's neighbors together, we want you to come?"

Hamilton and Baker also drew fire in Congress for the recommendation to shift the U.S. military mission in Iraq to one of training and advising Iraqi forces while pulling out combat forces by early 2008.

Senators charged that would leave the 15,000 to 20,000 advisers left behind in grave danger, which Hamilton didn't dispute.

Sen. John McCain (R-Ariz.), a presidential hopeful, was the most blunt in his assessment, calling that and other parts of the report "a recipe that will lead to, sooner or later, our defeat in Iraq."

Sen. Hillary Rodham Clinton (D-N.Y.), another presidential contender, said the panel now has put the onus on Bush: "We've now heard from the Iraq Study Group, but we need the White House to become the Iraq Results Group."

As the White House continued to digest the report, Bush and the panel's co-chairs engaged in something of dance Thursday.

Bush made clear there were parts of the report he didn't like, but Baker warned that Bush shouldn't treat the report like a "fruit salad" and only pick the parts he likes. Hamilton was more direct, saying Bush has just "weeks and maybe days" to act.

"Forward" - Bush's New Favorite Word? (AP)

By Deb Riechmann

AP, December 7, 2006

When he received his own copy of the Iraq Study Group report, President Bush praised the subtitle, "The way forward — a new approach." On Thursday, it was clear he had added the phrase to his lexicon. Bush and British Prime Minister Tony Blair used "forward" or "way forward" about two dozen times during their news conference about the war and problems in the Middle East.

Some of the main points about the report and what Bush said about them:

Iran and Syria:

Report: The United States should speak directly to Iran and Syria under the sponsorship of a new group made up of Iraq's neighbors and other nations wanting to help strengthen the Iraqi government.

Bush: The U.S. has made it clear to the Iranians that if they want to engage America, they must verifiably suspend their uranium enrichment program. Syria must stop destabilizing the Western-backed government in Lebanon, allowing arms and money cross its border into Iraq and providing safe haven to terrorist groups.

"If people come to the table to discuss Iraq, they need to come understanding their responsibilities to not fund terrorists, to help this young democracy survive, to help with the economics of the country," Bush said. "And if people are not committed, if Syria and Iran is not committed to that concept, then they shouldn't bother to show up."

U.S. policy and diplomacy:

Report: The U.S. immediately should seek the creation of a group of countries that would work to strengthen Iraq's sovereignty. The group would include Iraq; Iran, Syria and other neighbors; regional states such as Egypt and the Gulf States; the five permanent members of the U.N. Security Council; and the European Union.

Bush: "The idea of having an international group is an interesting idea."

U.S. troops:

Report: Increase the number of U.S. trainers bolstering Iraqi security forces to as many as 20.000 — up from 3,000 to 4,000 — with the goal of withdrawing the bulk of U.S. combat troops. By the first quarter of 2008 — "subject to unexpected developments in the security situation on the ground" — all combat brigades not necessary for force protection should be out of Iraq. At that time, U.S. combat forces in Iraq could be deployed only in units embedded with Iraqi forces or in missions, such as special operations or search and rescue.

Bush: "We want the Iraqis taking the fight, but it's very important ... as we design programs, to be flexible and realistic and — as the report said — ... depending upon conditions," Bush said. "I thought that made a lot of sense. I've always said we'd like our troops out as fast as possible."

"Our commanders will be making recommendations based upon whether or not we're achieving our stated objective," Bush said. "And the objective, I repeat, is a government which can sustain, govern, and defend itself."

Israelis and Palestinians:

Report: There must be a renewed and sustained commitment by the U.S. to a comprehensive Arab-Israeli peace on all fronts, including Bush's commitment to a two-state solution for Israel and Palestine.

Bush: "One of the reasons why there hasn't been instant success is because radicals and extremists are trying to stop the advance of a Palestinian state. Why? Because democracy is a defeat for them. That's what I strongly believe.

"And so, no question progress has been spotty. But it's important for people to understand one of the reasons why is, is because radicals are trying to prevent it, and they're willing to kill innocent people to prevent progress. Now, our goal is to help the (Palestinian Authority President Mahmoud) Abbas government strengthen its security forces, and we're doing that."

Blair Echoes Call For U.S. To Aid Mideast Peace Talks (USAT)

By David Jackson

USA Today, December 8, 2006

WASHINGTON — Standing alongside President Bush Thursday, British Prime Minister Tony Blair embraced the Iraq Study Group's call for more U.S. involvement in Israeli-Palestinian peace talks — a position he has long endorsed.

"It is important that we do everything we can in the wider Middle East," Blair said after meeting with the president at the White House.

Bush, whose staff is reviewing the Iraq Study Group's 79 recommendations, said he wants to see a democratic Palestinian state, but the parties "must accept responsibility and must sign off on an agreement."

The two leaders met a day after release of the report, which echoed some of Blair's long-held positions. The group was led by former secretary of State James Baker and former congressman Lee Hamilton.

The prime minister has been pushing Middle East settlement talks in connection with Iraq since the war's inception — he pressed the issue at a Camp David meeting with Bush shortly after the invasion in March 2003. And in an interview last month with British broadcaster David Frost, Blair also expressed willingness to work with Iran and Syria, provided they "are prepared to be part of the solution."

"The irony is almost overwhelming," said Julianne Smith, a Europe specialist with the Center for Strategic and International Studies. "Here's a guy who's been making some of the same recommendations as the (Iraq Study Group) … after having witnessed many of his suggestions fall on deaf ears on this side of Atlantic."

While expressing optimism about the fate of Iraq's fledgling democracy, Bush said, "it's a tough time, and it's a difficult moment for America and Great Britain."

The president rejected a British reporter's suggestion he is "in denial about how bad things are in Iraq."

"It's bad in Iraq," Bush said. "Does that help?"

He later added, "I thought we would succeed quicker than we did, and I am disappointed by the pace of success."

Some of the commission's recommendations are things the administration would like to see, Bush said. He noted that while the commission called for withdrawal of combat troops by early 2008, it did so only "if conditions so allow."

Bush expressed skepticism about another proposal, direct engagement with Iraqi neighbors Iran and Syria. Bush said Iran must suspend uranium enrichment, while Syria must stop interfering with new young democracies in Iraq and Lebanon.

Blair, who is traveling to the region soon, said there are "tricky issues" involved in the Israeli-Palestinian matter, but Iran, Syria, and other nations could be useful "if they wanted to help with it."

The two leaders also sat down less than a month after a State Department official, Kendall Myers, disputed the long-standing notion of a "special relationship" between the United States and Great Britain.

In a speech in Washington, Myers said the relationship is now "totally one-sided" and that the Bush administration routinely ignored Blair's advice. The State Department disavowed the comments, which got big play in Britain but did not surface during the 53-minute Bush-Blair news conference.

First elected in 1997, Blair plans to step down as prime minister next year after losing public and Labor Party support over the Iraq war. According to a recent Guardian/ICM poll in Great Britain, 63% said they believe Blair has tied their country "too closely to the U.S."

No bad feelings surfaced Thursday, as the leaders paid tribute to each other. Bush called the two nations "strong friends" who are confronting "an unprecedented threat to civilization" in the form of terrorists and extremists.

Blair told Bush "we will work closely with you" in the future.

Blair Plans Mideast Visit After Iraq Report (FT)

By Caroline Daniel, Demetri Sevastopulo

Financial Times, December 8, 2006

Tony Blair announced a personal mission to the Middle East on Thursday as he tried to use the damning Iraq Study Group report to drive President George W. Bush into a new peace initiative for the region.

At the end of a visit to Washington to meet Mr Bush, the British prime minister said he would be travelling to the Middle East to meet both Israelis and Palestinians. The trip represents a final attempt by Mr Blair to move forward a peace process during his premiership.

Although Mr Bush gave the visit his support, his comments at the leaders' joint press conference on Thursday fell short of the ISG's call for a "sustained commitment by the US" to a comprehensive settlement.

Although Mr Blair has used the report to support his peace efforts, neither leader showed many public signs of accepting the repudiation of their Iraq policies by the group led by James Baker, former US secretary of state. Mr Bush indicated that he was more interested in other internal reviews – including a Pentagon study – that have yet to be completed.

Although the group had called the situation in Iraq "grave and deteriorating", Mr Bush used less pessimistic language, conceding that the death toll in Baghdad was "unsettling". Asked if his response that events were "unsettling" meant he was still in denial, Mr Bush responded: "It's bad in Iraq. That help?"

Both leaders sought to frame the debate about Iraq as a long-term ideological struggle between Islamic extremists and moderates, and emphasised the need to defend fledgling democracies in Lebanon, Iraq and Afghanistan. Mr Bush said: "We agree that victory in Iraq is important...it is important for the civilised world."

The ISG, however, was dismissive of administration efforts to promote democracy in the region. Nor did it use the rhetoric of victory, instead warning there was no guarantee that any course of action would stop sectarian violence.

The group's conclusions on the need to resolve the Israeli-Palestinian situation echoed those of Mr Blair, who has stressed that the road to peace in Iraq passes through Jerusalem. On Thursday he said addressing the issue was vital to showing "that we are even-handed and just in the application of our values".

Mr Blair offered warmer support for the report, saying: "It offers a strong way forward." Mr Bush called it "constructive", but said the chairmen of the study group had not expected him to "accept every conclusion".

Mr Baker disagreed. "I hope we don't treat this like a fruit salad and say 'I like this, but I don't like that'," he told the Senate armed services committee. "This is a comprehensive strategy designed to deal with this problem we're facing in Iraq."

Lawmakers offered a divided response to the report. Some of the strongest criticism came from Senator John McCain, the Republican frontrunner for the 2008 presidential election who wants an increase in troops, not a drawdown. "There's only one thing worse than an overstressed Army and Marine Corps, and that's a defeated Army and Marine Corps. We saw that in 1973. And I believe that this is a recipe that will lead to, sooner or later, our defeat in Iraq."

Bush: New Approach Needed In Iraq (CHIT)

By Mark Silva

Chicago Tribune, December 8, 2006

WASHINGTON -- In the course of a day, the Iraq Study Group's assessment of a "grave and deteriorating" situation in Iraq elicited a most blunt characterization of the war from President Bush.

"It's bad in Iraq. ... Does that help?" Bush responded to a British reporter's question about how the president might convince people that he is not "in denial about how bad things are in Iraq" and is sincere about "changing course."

Moments later, huddled with reporters a few blocks from the White House, Lee Hamilton, co-chairman of the study group, was asked if Bush now shares the group's grim assessment.

"Well," Hamilton deadpanned, "he's getting closer."

On a day when Hamilton and his co-chairman, former Secretary of State James Baker, pressed their campaign to sell the report's recommendations to Congress, the public and ultimately the Bush administration, it became clear they had yet to convince the president.

Their challenge was evident when Bush, appearing with British Prime Minister Tony Blair, his principal ally in the invasion of Iraq in 2003, expressed resistance to several key ideas in the report and said he would not act until he also receives reports from the Pentagon and State Department.

In a hearing before the Senate, Baker and Hamilton urged Congress to end its "extremely timid" oversight of the war and embrace the report to help pressure Bush into quickly adopting their recommendations as a comprehensive shift in strategy.

"I hope we don't treat this like a fruit salad, saying, `I like this, but I don't like that,' " Baker said.

Hamilton and Baker are pushing their ideas as both inside players and mass media marketers. They are backed by a 40-person media team operating out of a downtown Washington public relations firm and a paperback edition of their report that in just a day soared to near the top of Amazon.com's best-seller list.

Their dawn-to-dark parade of interviews, always appearing as a pair to underscore the bipartisan appeal of their advice, will culminate with a run of the Sunday morning television news shows.

"We've been spinning like a top," Baker said Thursday, ushered into a paneled conference room with 14 news reporters at Edelman, a Chicago-based public relations firm that has detailed 40 members of its 200-person Washington office to manage the media blitz for the commission.

Yet, while Hamilton holds a number of invitations to testify before congressional committees when the new Democratic-controlled Congress convenes in January, Baker and the PR firm say the TV engagements will end Sunday. For all the fervor with which they are pitching the report, Baker and Hamilton know that pressing too hard runs the risk of pushing the president into an embarrassing corner at a time when Bush is promising a new course in Iraq.

"The last thing in the world I want to do ... is to have any part in backing the president into any corner," said Baker, describing himself as "a private citizen living in Houston, Texas." He added: "Sunday, after we've done the Sunday shows, as far as I'm concerned, I'm finished."

Yet, in short order, Baker and Hamilton may be having a profound impact on the national debate over the war. Bush, appearing alongside Blair at a press conference following a private meeting in the White House, said he has read the report in full and is weighing its recommendations carefully.

"I believe we need a new approach," said Bush, who has refrained from endorsing or rejecting the group's principal ideas: A possible draw-down of U.S. combat forces by early 2008 coupled with a dramatic ramp-up of U.S. diplomacy throughout the Middle East.

As "bad" as things are in Iraq—"and I have made it abundantly clear how tough it is," Bush said—the president vowed that he will succeed in making Iraq capable of sustaining, governing and defending itself.

"I want you to know, sir, that I believe we'll prevail," Bush defiantly told the reporter who questioned his sincerity in charting a new course. "We have to adjust to prevail, but I wouldn't have our troops in harm's way if I didn't believe that, one, it was important, and, two, we'll succeed."

Blair also made it clear that he is impressed with the study group's work, noting that its "analysis of the situation is not really in dispute. The question is, how do we find the right way forward. ... And I think the Baker-Hamilton report allows us to, as the situation has evolved in Iraq, to evolve our strategy."

The bipartisan composition of the 10-member study group carries an added advantage for Bush because embracing any of its findings should enhance his chances of finding approval in the Democratic-run Congress that he faces for the remaining two years of his presidency.

And Edelman, a PR firm with $300 million in annual billings, has capitalized on both the media skills and bipartisan appeal of the Baker-Hamilton team.

"They have been doing a wide variety of interviews in pairs—in bipartisan pairs," said Rob Rehg, president of Edelman's Washington office. "In addition to the ideas themselves, one of the strongest things about their work is that it is bipartisan.... They felt, and we agreed, that they should be seen talking together, side by side, every time they appear."

That started with a Washington news conference Wednesday, arranged by Edelman. That was followed by "round-robin" interviews with the anchors of five major broadcast and cable TV networks, interviews with National Public Radio and personal or telephone meetings with the editorial boards of the Washington Post, Wall Street Journal and New York Times, an interview with Associated Press TV reaching 120 nations, a meeting with foreign ambassadors and finally a joint appearance on CNN's Larry King Live in which Hamilton acknowledged of his report: "It's a tough sell."

Baker, arriving at Edelman on Thursday afternoon for another media interview, explained: "When you have a first-rate media organization working for you, you get really good coverage." Then, with a wide grin, he held up the front page of the New York Post, featuring a doctored photograph of monkeys bearing the faces of Baker and Hamilton, and the headline: "Surrender Monkeys."

The public-relations effort is being paid for from funds appropriated by Congress for the study group.

If the personal media campaign of Baker and Hamilton is reaching a crescendo, their work will carry on in the coat pocket-sized red, white and blue Vintage Books paperback edition of "The Iraq Study Group Report," a Random House offering listing at $10.95 but going for $6.75 on Amazon.

On Thursday, its second day on sale, the report had reached No. 2 on Amazon.com's top-seller list, edging out Illinois Sen. Barack Obama's "The Audacity of Hope" and creeping up on "You on a Diet, The Owner's Manual for Waist Management."

With a portion of the study group report's proceeds going to the National Military Family Association, Vintage Books had started with two printings and on Thursday ordered a third--with 250,000 copies now in print and book stores around the country demanding them.

Bush Says New Approach Needed In Iraq (AP)

By Terence Hunt

AP, December 7, 2006

President Bush, admitting that "it's bad in Iraq," acknowledged Thursday that the United States needs a new approach in the unpopular war and promised to unveil details in an upcoming speech.

Bush said he was disappointed in the progress in Iraq, but continued to oppose direct U.S. talks with Iran or Syria and remained steadfastly committed to spreading democracy across the Middle East.

"I do know that we have not succeeded as fast as we wanted to succeed," Bush said, standing alongside British Prime Minister Tony Blair, his chief ally in the war. "I do understand that process is not as rapid as I had hoped."

Bush's meeting with Blair came a day after the Iraq Study Group headed by former Secretary of State James A. Baker III and former Democratic Rep. Lee Hamilton issued a stinging report saying the Bush policies in Iraq had failed and a major course correction was needed, including beginning to withdraw combat troops.

Bush said the study group's report would be an important part of his considerations. He said he was awaiting results of internal reviews being done at the Pentagon, State Department and the White House and would deliver a speech to the nation on Iraq in coming weeks after he decides on a new course.

The study group concluded that a stable, democratic Iraq was still possible, but Baker said: "We do not know if it can be turned around."

Bush was more upbeat, but gave no hints about whether he was contemplating a major policy shift. At the same time, Bush said that he didn't think Baker and Hamilton "expect us to accept every recommendation."

"It makes sense to analyze the situation and to devise a set of tactics and strategies to achieve the objective that I have stated," Bush said. "And so, if the present situation needs to be changed, it follows that we'll change it if we want to succeed."

The report, which warns that the situation in Iraq is "grave and deteriorating," contains 79 separate recommendations. They call for a gradual withdrawal of U.S. combat forces during the next year to ramp up the training of Iraqi security forces. There are currently some 135,000 US soldiers and 7,100 British soldiers serving in Iraq.

Both Bush and Blair said that supporting the government of Iraqi Prime Minister Nouri al-Maliki was central to efforts to help Iraq defend, govern and sustain itself. They both urged al-Maliki to do more to assert control and quell violence.

Bush was asked whether he thought the study group suggested that he did not appreciate the extent of the violence in Iraq.

"It's bad in Iraq. That help?" retorted Bush.

"You know, in all due respect, I've been saying it a lot," Bush continued. "I understand how tough it is and have been telling the American people how tough it is. And they know how tough it is."

Another recommendation from the study group calls for enlisting diplomatic help from Iraq's neighbors, including Iran and Syria — not only to resolve problems in Iraq but to find an end to the long-running conflict between Israel and the Palestinians.

One of the study group's central recommendations was for the administration to reach out to Syria and Iran for help in stabilizing Iraq, a course Bush has rejected in the past and confronted skeptically on Thursday.

"Countries that participate in talks must not fund terrorism, must help the young democracy survive, must help with the economics of the country," Bush said. "If people are not committed, if Syria and Iran is not committed to that concept, then they shouldn't bother to show up."

For his part, Blair suggested that Iran's support for Shiite militants in southern Iraq presented a problem. "Iran has been ... basically arming, supporting, financing terrorism," the visiting British leader said.

Blair said he welcomed the Baker-Hamilton report despite its depiction of a failed policy that both he and Bush had previously embraced.

"It offers a strong way forward. I think it is important now we concentrate on the elements that are necessary to make sure that we succeed — because the consequences of failure are severe," Blair said.

Bush appeared to endorse the bipartisan panel's conclusion that any resolution of the Iraq conflict is tied to reducing tensions between Israel and the Palestinians and across the broader Middle East — a position Blair has long held.

"It's a tough time and its a difficult moment for America and Great Britain and the task before us is daunting," Bush said as members of the bipartisan commission testified about their report on Capitol Hill.

Blair said the terrorists' threat in Iraq is part of an old pattern that is region-wide. Terrorism "has basically come out of the Middle East" and must be addressed in a way that includes a solution to the Palestinian-Israeli conflict, he said.

Bush: "It's Bad In Iraq" (NYDN)

New York Daily News, December 8, 2006

WASHINGTON — President Bush said Thursday that a bipartisan panel's call for a major course change in Iraq was an important document, but just one of several reports he will consider as he charts a new strategy.

Standing alongside chief Iraq war ally Tony Blair of Britain, the president acknowledged that, "It's bad in Iraq."

Both Bush and Blair agreed that success in Iraq may depend on victory over extremists across the broader Middle East. The two leaders met a day after the Iraq Study Group headed by former Secretary of State James A. Baker III and former Democratic Rep. Lee Hamilton issued a report saying their war policies had failed and a major course correction was needed, including beginning to withdraw combat troops.

Asked at a joint news conference when the president would start to carry out recommendations for a change, Bush noted that other studies were still under way by the Pentagon, the State Department and the White House National Security Council. He said he would make major policy decisions "after I get the reports"

He called the Baker-Hamilton report "certainly an important part of our deliberations and an important part of our discussions this morning."

At the same time, Bush said, "I don't think Jim Baker and Lee Hamilton expect us to accept every recommendation." Baker did say, earlier Thursday, he believes the study "is probably the only bipartisan report he's going to get and it's extremely important that we approach this issue in a bipartisan way."

The report, which contains 79 separate recommendations, says that Bush's Iraq policy is not working, warns the situation in Iraq is "grave and deteriorating" and calls for most US combat troops to be withdrawn by early 2008. Bush said he is planning to deliver a major speech to outline his decision for a new way forward.

"I think you're probably going to have to pay attention to my speech coming up here when I get all the recommendations," Bush said in a joint news conference with the British prime minister. "I do know that we have not succeeded as fast as we wanted to succeed. I do understand that progress is not as rapid as I had hoped. And therefore it makes sense to analyze the situation and to devise a set of tactics and strategies to achieve the objective that I have stated," the president said.

"It's a tough time and its a difficult moment for America and Great Britain and the task before us is daunting," Bush said, even as members of the bipartisan commission were testifying on their report on Capitol Hill. Bush asserted that success in Iraq depends on victory over extremists across the "broader Middle East," apparently subscribing to one of the conclusions of the Baker-Hamilton report.

Blair, who has stood shoulder to shoulder with Bush since the March 2003 invasion of Iraq, said he welcomed the conclusions of the Iraq Study Group despite its criticism of past policies that both he and Bush advanced. It "offers a strong way forward," Blair said. "The consequences of failure are severe," he added.

Bush appeared to endorse the panel's conclusion that any resolution of the Iraq conflict is tied to reducing tensions between Israel and the Palestinians and across the broader Middle East — a position Blair has long held.

But in Tel Aviv, Israeli Prime Minister Ehud Olmert said he disagreed with the advisory group's linkage. He told a news conference that conditions were not ripe to reopen long-dormant talks with Syria. "I appreciate your clear view that we are confronted with a struggle between moderation and extremism and this is particularly evident in the broader Middle East," Bush told Blair. Both Bush and Blair said that supporting the government of Iraqi Prime Minister Nouri al-Maliki was central to efforts to help Iraq defend, govern and sustain itself.

"The American people expect us to come up with a new strategy," Bush said. "I believe we need a new approach and that's why I've tasked the Pentagon to analyze the way forward," he said.

In addition to the Iraq Study Group, studies are under way at the Pentagon, State Department and National Security Council on next steps. The response made it clear that Bush did not intend to be influenced only by the bipartisan panel's report, which contained 79 specific recommendations, but by the other studies as well.

One of the study group's central recommendations was for the administration to reach out to Syria and Iran for help in stabilizing Iraq, a course Bush has rejected in the past. "Countries that participate in talks must not fund terrorism, must help the young democracy survive, must help with the economics of the country," Bush said.

"If people are not committed, if Syria and Iran is not committed to that concept, then they shouldn't bother to show up." For his part, Blair suggested that Iran's support for Shiite militants in southern Iraq presented a problem. "Iran has been...basically arming, supporting, financing terrorism," the visiting British leader said.

Blair said the terrorists' threat in Iraq is part of an old pattern that is region-wide. Terrorism "has basically come out of the Middle East" and must be addressed in a way that includes a solution to the Palestinian-Israeli conflict, he said.

Report Enrages The Right (LAT)

By Greg Miller

The Los Angeles Times, December 8, 2006

WASHINGTON — Right-wing radio host Rush Limbaugh called it "The Iraq Surrender Group."

And conservative commentator William J. Bennett vented in volcanic fashion. "In all my time in Washington I've never seen such smugness, arrogance, or such insufferable moral superiority," Bennett wrote on the National Review website. "Self-congratulatory. Full of itself. Horrible."

Howls of protest echoed across the right side of the political spectrum as conservatives voiced dismay with the findings of the bipartisan Iraq panel, released Wednesday.

The commission's report depicts Iraq as a country sliding into chaos, saying conditions are "grave and deteriorating."

Many conservatives agree with that assessment. But the report's other findings and recommendations, which declare the approach they have backed for nearly four years all but bankrupt, clearly struck a nerve with the most ardent supporters of the war.

That diagnosis has compounded the pain for conservatives who saw voters turn control of both chambers of Congress over to Democrats last month, largely because of mounting frustration with the war in Iraq.

Conservatives were particularly incensed at the study group's recommendation that the United States engage Iraq's neighbors, including Iran and Syria, as part of a broad new diplomatic push to enlist other countries, even those that see themselves as enemies of the United States, to try to solve the Iraq problem.

That advice is particularly difficult to swallow for neoconservatives and others who believe U.S. diplomacy should be grounded in a moralistic view of the world, as opposed to the more pragmatic and compromising "realist" approach championed by the Iraq Study Group's most prominent members. The group's chairmen are Republican former Secretary of State James A. Baker III and former Democratic Rep. Lee H. Hamilton of Indiana.

Conservative bloggers pounded away at this point.

"We are fighting the spread of radical Islamist terrorism, and the two major production centers for that very problem are Tehran and Damascus," read a posting on the conservative site captainsquartersblog.com. "Holding a regional conference with them to determine anything but their surrender in that war only encourages the spread of the terrorism that we seek to end."

Others, including influential conservative editorialist William Kristol, accused the Study Group of focusing its nine months of study on how to extricate the United States from Iraq, rather than how to win.

"They do not engage that debate, and I think that's deeply irresponsible," Kristol said. "If they think the war cannot now be won, they need to explain that."

There was heated rhetoric from the left as well. Democrats generally praised the group's findings but took advantage of the report's release to renew their criticism of the Bush administration.

In discussing the report, former Vice President Al Gore called the invasion of Iraq the "worst strategic mistake in the entire history of the United States." He made his comment during an appearance on NBC's "Today Show."

But conservatives were especially riled by the report's seemingly deliberate omission of any reference to Bush administration ideals, such as spreading democracy across the Islamic world.

"It was about as interesting as a small-town phone book," said Danielle Pletka, a vice president of the American Enterprise Institute, a conservative Washington think tank, on Fox News. "I was amazed by the report. There were very few concrete suggestions. There were very few deep ideas. And there were very, very few plans for victory."

They also chafed at public praise that the commission's 10 members — five Democrats and five Republicans — overcame political pressure to reach agreement.

"Does history really give a hoot about bipartisanship? Who cares whether they are getting along?" asked Limbaugh on his radio show Thursday. "Show me the book in the library, 'Great Bipartisanship in American History.' "

Arab World Welcomes Iraq Study Group Report (CSM)

By Dan Murphy, Josh Mitnick

The Christian Science Monitor, December 8, 2006

The Iraq Study Group (ISG) recommendations are making far more waves outside Iraq than inside that troubled country.

To average Iraqis, the report seems to be an abstract exercise unlikely to end the war there anytime soon. But it is being eagerly read elsewhere in the region, with a number of Arab states welcoming the report as a sign that their advice is starting to be heeded. In Israel, however, it's being viewed with apprehension because of its calls for direct US engagement with Syria and Iran.

The Jordan Times - a paper with ties to the state, a US ally - hailed the recent ouster of Defense Secretary Donald Rumsfeld and the ISG's report as a "return to common sense" in its lead editorial. "All of a sudden Washington appears to be heading towards a less bellicose and more cooperative stand on Middle East issues," it wrote, praising the report's recommendations to engage Iran and Syria and start a "gradual pullout of its troops to end the occupation."

Nabil Amr, a top adviser to Palestinian President Mahmoud Abbas, described the report as "excellent," saying he read it as an acknowledgement of Bush administration failures in Iraq and the region.

"The administration must wake up and see the reality on the ground in the Middle East requires a different policy," he says.

In Israel, though, reaction to the report ranged from muted to outright anger.

The ISG report states bluntly that the "US does its ally Israel no favors in avoiding direct involvement to solve the Arab-Israeli conflict." It says that there is "no military solution" and that "political engagement and dialogue are essential ... because it is an axiom that when the political process breaks down there will be violence on the ground."

Zbulun Orlev of Israel's right-wing National Religious Party labeled the report "unfriendly" to Israel, particularly in its advocacy for engaging Iran and calling for a "land for peace" approach to the problems in the Palestinian territories, which it says are inflaming regional problems.

"We thought after six years of Bush, the policies which Baker represents had died," Mr. Orlev says, referring to ISG co-chair James Baker, who was the secretary of State under President George H. W. Bush, during which time he pushed for a peace deal with the Palestinians.

Israeli Prime Minister Ehud Olmert made a point at a press conference Thursday to say that the report does not necessarily reflect Bush administration policy.

"Israelis know Baker's determination quite well," says Gershon Baskin, co-chair of the Israel-Palestine center for research and information. "If Bush accepts the recommendations, Israelis are going to face pressure they're not used to."

Elsewhere, the report's recommendations on Iran and Syria were seen as puzzling, as many analysts say the conflict in Iraq is the result of internal sectarian competition for power.

Iran's power to help could be limited. "Iran has an interest in stabilizing Iraq, but its influence has been exaggerated," says foreign policy analyst Davoud Hermidas Barvand. "It cannot even direct the political situation there among the Shiites."

The price of Iranian assistance is not yet clear. Analysts say it might seek a softer line over its nuclear program, an end to sanctions, and a guarantee against military strikes. It has proved a hard negotiator on the nuclear issue and the Baker recommendations have increased confidence in Iranian government circles.

One demand has already been articulated. Supreme Leader Ayatollah Ali Khamenei, who makes the final decisions in foreign policy, said US troops must pull out of Iraq before Iran would help reduce the violence: "The occupation of Iraq is not a morsel that the US can swallow," Mr. Khamenei said during a visit by Iraq's president in late November. "The first step to resolve the instability in Iraq is the withdrawal of occupiers from this country and the transfer of security responsibilities to the popular Iraqi government."

The ISG calls for a negotiated settlement with Syria to stop shipping weapons to Hizbullah, the Shiite militant group, and stop allowing Iran to transport weapons across the country to Hizbullah in Lebanon. It calls for Syria's full cooperation in investigating all political assassinations in Lebanon, and to encourage Hamas to recognize Israel's right to exist.

In exchange, the ISG recommends that Israel return the Golan Heights to Syria, with an international force on the border that could include US troops, if both countries agree.

"Sure, Iran and Syria may be allowing people to come across their border and providing some arms or money, but the conflict is overwhelmingly about sectarian enmity inside Iraq," says Andrew Garfield, a former British military intelligence officer who spent most of last year as an adviser in Iraq and is now a senior fellow at the Foreign Policy Research Institute in Washington.

Mr. Garfield says peacemaking will have to done inside Iraq, by Iraqis, and that he doubts any outside power has much influence there anymore.

He's also skeptical about the ISG's calls for more trainers embedded with Iraqi units. He argues the US military simply doesn't have enough trainers with the cultural sophistication to get the job done. At any rate, he says, the Iraqi Army would have to be dramatically expanded just to take up the role of the US and other coalition forces on the ground now.

"You'd have to replace the roughly 160,000 coalition forces with new Iraqi forces, and in reality that probably isn't enough either," he says. "Realistically, Iraq probably needs 300,000 to 400,000 more troops, and they'd have to be as good or better than the American troops they replace."

Arab States Seize On Call For Peace Drive (FT)

By William Wallis, Andrew England, Gareth Smyth

Financial Times, December 8, 2006

Arab officials seized on the Iraq Study Group recommendations on Thursday to highlight the need for greater US commitment to a revived peace process between Israel and the Palestinians.

But there was also concern in some Arab states that any early scale-back of the American troop presence in Iraq could lead to an escalation in sectarian conflict that might spill over into neighbouring states.

The report said: “The US cannot achieve its goals in the Middle East unless it deals directly with the Arab-Israeli conflict and regional instability. There must be a renewed and sustained commitment by the US to a comprehensive Arab-Israeli peace on all fronts.”

It also recommended that the US engage constructively with Syria and Iran to influence their behaviour in Iraq. Syria welcomed the recommendation, saying it was pleased that the report tied the situation in the Iraq with the rest of the region.

Manouchehr Mottaki, Iran’s foreign minister, said Iran would be “in the position of [providing] help” if Washington found “a good end for the Iraq crisis”. But he reiterated Tehran’s position that US troops should leave. While some in Tehran fear the dangers for Iran of growing violence in Iraq, others say it has no pressing reason to ease the US plight. Ali Larijani, the top security official, said on Wednesday that the US was at a “strategic dead-end” in Iraq and the wider Middle East.

One official recently told the FT that Iran could “live with” any likely scenario in Iraq, “including riots, federalism, popular government or disintegration”.

“A mess in Iraq means Iran would not be next [to be invaded by the US], while security and democracy in Iraq would mean Iran’s friends were in power, whether in a unified Iraq or a federal one,” he added. “Iran is now strong in the region, and has won the game in Iraq.”

Any signs of Iranian triumphalism are likely to add to fears within Arab states, of spreading Iranian and radical influence in the region. Some commentators sniffed a sense of US defeatism in the Baker-Hamilton report, which said the conditions in Iraq were “grave and deteriorating” and recommended that by the first quarter of 2008 all US combat brigades should be out of the country, if training of Iraqi forces were stepped up.

Abdel Monem Said, the director of Al Ahram centre for political and strategic studies, said this idea could be seized on by militant Islamists in the region and likened the situation to that prior to the US withdrawal from Vietnam in the early 1970s. He also questioned what incentives the US would be able to use to draw the Iranians and Syrians into constructive dialogue.

“We are coming back to 1974 once more, when the US was internationally demoralised and got out of south- east Asia and for the next seven to eight years we got a communist sweep into Vietnam, into Laos, into Cambodia,” he said. Lebanese officials welcomed calls for greater US efforts to pursue peace between Israel and the Arabs. But one senior Beirut official said that Lebanon should not become a pawn in negotiations with neighbouring Syria and should not “be made the reward for Syria’s good behaviour”.

There was little immediate prospect in any case of an advance on the wider Arab- Israeli conflict. Ehud Olmert, the Israeli prime minister, rejected links between the Israeli-Palestinian conflict and Iraq and ruled out talks with Syria. Some Iraqis themselves doubted that changes in US policy could make much difference.

“The situation is a hurricane: no one has the power to calm it, not Americans and not Iraqis,” said Hussein, a Shia teacher in Baghdad.

At State, The News Needs No Muse (WP)

By Al Kamen

The Washington Post, December 8, 2006

The Iraq Study Group report rocketed through town Wednesday, setting thousands of reporters off in search of foreign policy experts to opine about what it all meant.

Some agencies tried to make sure none of their people was caught talking out of school about the report, which, as White House spokesman Tony Snow gamely spun, was not in any way a "rebuke" of President Bush's policies.

Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice laid down the rules early Wednesday. An e-mail "Watch Alert" from the department's operations center went out at 11:07 a.m., announcing that the report "has been released and is now available" at various Web sites.

Within minutes, all the folks in Assistant Secretary John C. Rood's Bureau of International Security and Nonproliferation got this e-mail:

All -- Strict guidance this a.m. from the Secretary that she does not want any public "musing" by State officers on the Iraq Study Group report. All public comments will be handled by PA[Public Affairs].

So be sure to keep your "musing" private -- or at least on background.There's No Mess, but Clean It Up Anyway

Meanwhile, over at "PA," they were focusing like laser beams on the most important parts of the Iraq report, summarized by this topic headline in yesterday's press briefing: "Iraq Study Group Report is Not a Criticism of Rice's Efforts."

Study Group member Vernon Jordan couldn't agree more: "We don't look at how the house got put on fire," he told The Washington Post when asked about the report. "This is about how do we go forward from there" -- and put it out.Gates: Gone Missing

How quickly they forget. A reporter asked a study group aide if incoming Defense Secretary Robert Gates, a study group member until he was nominated in early November, had been sent a copy of the report.

"No," the aide said. "We didn't know how to reach him anymore."Billionaires for Blue Dogs?

All the political oddsmakers are looking to see which political candidates will generate that all- important "bandwagon effect," so the money, staff and endorsements will flood in and assure the candidate's nomination.

The same effect might apply to organizations. So we find that on Nov. 8, the day after the midterm elections, multibillionaire Bill Gates dropped $1,000 on the Blue Dog Political Action Committee. Sure, Microsoft's PAC has been a regular donor, but the chairman himself does not appear to have given before from his own wallet to that group of moderate and conservative House Democrats.

Time to jump on?Holiday Cheer and Rumsfeld Don't Mix

So everyone in the Joint Chiefs' directorates (J-1 to J-8) at the Pentagon was planning on holding Christmas parties on Friday, Dec. 15 -- the most obvious day since, after that, folks might start drifting out of town. But buzz is that someone, apparently in the office of the chairman, Gen. Peter Pace, had fretted that it might look as if all the hootin' and hollerin' that would be spilling out into the hallways was in celebration of Defense Secretary Donald Rumsfeld's departure that same day. (Leaving on that day, by the way, Rumsfeld will apparently fail to realize his dream of surpassing Robert McNamara's length-of-service record as secretary.)

So word came down last week to change the dates of the Christmas parties. Done.Opening the Door Wider for Iraqis

Meanwhile, the State Department has approached the U.N. High Commissioner for Refugees office to see about having more Iraqi refugees screened for admission to this country. Back in the '90s, when Saddam was in charge and oppressing and killing people, Washington admitted as many 4,980 Iraqi refugees a year.

Since the U.S. invasion, however, the numbers have plummeted to 298 in 2003, 66 in 2004, and about 200 in each of the past two years.

But with as many as 2 million Iraqis having fled the chaos and sectarian violence since the invasion -- and an estimated 100,000 a month coming out these days -- the United States is talking to the United Nations about boosting its intake. The focus, we're told, appears to be on helping Chaldean Christians, who are getting pounded by everyone over there. There's a U.S. ceiling of 5,500 refugees for this fiscal year for all the Middle East, plus a few thousand more "unallocated" slots that might be used.

One major problem is that the United Nations is grossly underfunded and understaffed, the refugee folks say, so they don't have enough people to process the huge numbers of Iraqis.

Still, it shouldn't be hard to boost the numbers just a little. Eight were resettled in October and nine in November. Well, that's an upward trend.

Howard Says Rapid Coalition Exit From Iraq Would Leave Chaos (BLOOM)

By Fergus Maguire

Bloomberg, December 8, 2006

Dec. 8 (Bloomberg) -- The rapid exit of coalition forces from Iraq would increase instability in the region, Australian Prime Minister John Howard said, after a U.S. report recommended the withdrawal of most combat troops by early 2008.

``A precipitous American withdrawal would create a real bloodbath and total chaos," Howard said in an interview on Melbourne radio station 3AW. ``I would like to be out of Iraq as soon as possible but I'm not going to make myself in any way a hostage to a particular date."

The U.S. bipartisan Iraq Study Group released a report Dec. 6 that concluded the U.S. should aim to withdraw most of its troops from Iraq by early 2008 and begin diplomatic talks with Iran and Syria.

Australia's Defense Department has drawn up plans for a phased withdrawal of troops in case there is a change of coalition policy, the Australian Financial Review said today, citing unnamed government officials.

The government rejected a U.S. request for Australian soldiers to serve in Iraqi units, the Australian newspaper said today.

At Least He Read It (LAT)

The Los Angeles Times, December 8, 2006

Bush acknowledges that the Iraq Study Group's report is 'important.' But will he take its advice?

IF THE IRAQ STUDY GROUP is worried that its recommendations will not be taken seriously, then Thursday's news conference with President Bush and British Prime Minister Tony Blair is cause for concern. "A lot of reports in Washington are never read by anybody," Bush said. "To show you how important this one is, I read it." A moment later he added, as if for emphasis, "This is important."

Oh well. At least the Iraq Study Group had one 24-hour news cycle before it was dismissed as "important." In Washington, importance is the last stop before irrelevance; it's a graceful way to offer praise without support. On that score, there is reason for more than just the members of the group to be worried. The president and the prime minister used the word 46 times in 53 minutes, including to describe the goal of eventual withdrawal of U.S. troops and the need to be engaged on the Israeli-Palestinian issue.

Semantics aside, Bush's performance Thursday was depressing. He turned truculent when pressed to describe the situation on the ground ("It's bad in Iraq. Does that help?") and was irritatingly simplistic explaining his rationale for staying there ("I wouldn't have our troops in harm's way if I didn't believe that, one, it was important, and, two, we'll succeed"). His opening remarks included the usual airy rhetoric about creating a beacon of democracy in the Middle East and ominous yet vague references to "the forces of terror and extremism." For minutes at a time, the conference sounded like it could have been taking place in 2003.

The president did say that "I believe we need a new approach," and it's clear that the coming season of studies and debate is meant to precede some modest new package of initiatives. What that approach will be is another matter.

The chief value of the Iraq Study Group report is not necessarily what it says — much of which has been suggested elsewhere or has been obvious for some time — but who's saying it. Like management consultants, this group of former insiders can give Bush the cover he needs to make changes that everyone realizes are necessary but no one in power seems willing or able to propose.

Management consultants are rarely popular, and as George and Tony were meeting reporters, Jim and Lee (the group's co-chairmen, James A. Baker III and Lee H. Hamilton) were lobbying Congress. Their report was a "comprehensive strategy," they said, best accepted or rejected in full. It's an oddly naive hope for a realist such as Baker. Certainly it's bizarre to argue that the group's recommendations — all 79 of them — are somehow sacrosanct. If the president deserves any sympathy, it's for his reluctance to give his father's consigliere special deference.

Bush is right: The U.S. needs to confront terrorists, and democracy is a worthy goal. But declaring a goal is separate from achieving it. No one will argue that these goals aren't important (that word again). Yet they will remain unattainable until a host of other issues, many of them outlined by the Iraq Study Group, are addressed. Maybe Bush realizes this but can't bring himself to say so publicly. Or maybe he just doesn't believe it. After Thursday's news conference, it's still hard to tell.

Bush Listened, But Did He Hear? (WP)

By Eugene Robinson

I've been in this business long enough to recognize journalism when I see it. The first tip-off was the way the canny old pros in the Iraq Study Group (not one of whom I'd play poker with for money) studded their report's brief executive summary with explosive phrases -- a "grave and deteriorating" situation, a looming "humanitarian catastrophe," withdrawal of combat troops by "the first quarter of 2008." As an old editor once told me, hit the readers hard at the top of the story before they yawn and turn the page.

It turns out that James Baker, Lee Hamilton and the other members of the group didn't have to worry about holding readers' attention. The 96-page main report -- an attempt to find a way for George W. Bush to get us out of his Iraq debacle without provoking World War III -- is full of solid reporting and analysis, with surprises along the way that make your jaw drop.

There's only one reader who really counts, though, and I doubt he'll be impressed. The Decider isn't in the habit of letting mere facts get in the way of blind conviction.

At least the five senior Republicans and five senior Democrats who made up the panel have put down a marker. Facts do count, they remind us, and the possibility that the Iraq misadventure will spark a wider regional war is enough to powerfully concentrate the mind.

"I've been on a lot of presidential commissions in my life, going back to 1965. This was the toughest, but also the one where there was more cooperation and common purpose," Vernon Jordan told me by phone Wednesday as he sat down to dinner, the first meal he'd had time for on a day that began at 7 a.m. with a White House meeting with the president.

"This was the only commission I've seen where there was no argument, no falling out, nobody storming out of the room," Jordan said.

Roughly the first half of the report is pure journalism, an example of what old foreign correspondents used to call a "situationer" -- a snapshot overview of whatever country one's editors thought needed assessing. I learned things I hadn't known.

For example, I knew that the Iraqi army was a mess and that the Iraqi police force is full of sectarian thugs. But I didn't know that Iraq had another armed force, bigger than the police -- the 145,000-strong Facilities Protection Service, which is supposed to guard military infrastructure. One "senior U.S. official" described this shadowy force as "incompetent, dysfunctional, or subversive." How comforting.

I also wasn't aware that the Baghdad city government is a "Shia dictatorship" that allocates services along sectarian lines, consigning one Sunni neighborhood to "less than two hours of electricity each day" and waist-high piles of trash.

The second half of the report is less a news story than a long op-ed piece. The panel ruled out my preferred exit strategy, which it dismisses as "precipitate withdrawal." (I prefer to call it "wake up and smell the coffee.") The report explains how splitting Iraq into three autonomous parts would be an unacceptably bloody process, as well as intolerable to the neighbors; and how the option of sending a lot more troops to Iraq, as Sen. John McCain advocates, is moot given that we don't have a lot more troops to send.

The report is harshest on the president's "stay the course" option, pointing out that the longer we remain, the worse the situation in Iraq seems to get -- and the more American troops are maimed or killed.

The document concludes with 79 recommendations, most of which are eminently reasonable and none of which will get us out of Iraq overnight. The president will probably reject some out of hand -- talking directly with Syria and Iran, for example. And while it would be good if the president finally realized that solving the Israeli-Palestinian conflict would lower the temperature throughout the Middle East, I'm pretty sure it will take more than a phone call to persuade the Israeli government to give up the Golan Heights.

Jordan said that when the members of the panel met with Bush on Wednesday, the president's attitude was encouraging. "My mama used to say that a lot of people listen, but they don't hear," Jordan said. "Bush both listened and heard us."

That's a good sign. But the administration has set in motion its own multiple reviews of Iraq policy, and the official White House position is that the Iraq Study Group's viewpoint will be just one of many the president takes into account -- which is a bad sign. Would someone please tell the president that even his new secretary of defense doesn't think we're winning this war?

An Ideal In Need Of Rescue (WP)

By E. J. Dionne

The Washington Post, December 8, 2006

One of the many disastrous consequences of President Bush's botched policy in Iraq is that it has given the promotion of democracy a bad name.

If the report of the Iraq Study Group is nothing else, it is a devastating declaration that the administration's approach is an abject failure and that the United States needs to scale back its goals. Grand dreams of Iraqi democracy and a transformed Middle East are out. The best we can hope for now is an Iraq that can "govern itself, sustain itself, and defend itself."

Cleverly, the report cited those words because they were spoken by Bush himself in one of his least expansive descriptions of the mission. The president is now stuck with a minimalist definition of what can be accomplished in Iraq, because everything he has done since 2003 has made broader achievement impossible.

In truth, this Middle East adventure was never a serious effort to build democracy in Saddam Hussein's Iraq. Yes, there were elections and there was a lot of talk about democracy. But don't listen to what the administration said. Look at what it did.

The deployment of a relatively small force to Iraq in the first place and the administration's stubborn refusal to send more troops when violence and chaos followed Hussein's fall were the first signals that the administration didn't understand what it took to create democracy, didn't mean what it said about democracy or was divided over what its objectives really were.

That the administration rushed to war without serious planning, did not take the time to cultivate a broader group of allies that could have helped in nation-building and did not talk honestly to the American people about what a large undertaking it was foisting upon them were all signs of its reckless arrogance -- or, to be more charitable, simple foolishness. The administration fought this war in a way guaranteed to make the road to democracy even more difficult.

Some of the most compelling parts of the report are the sections that will receive the least attention because they deal with the most basic tasks -- policing, the justice system, economic reconstruction, job creation and protection of the oil industry.

Of the report's 79 recommendations, Nos. 50 through 67 are common-sense proposals about rebuilding post-Hussein Iraq that should have been worked out in detail long before we even started this war. James Baker and Lee Hamilton have done in 2006 what should have been done in 2002. Most of the ideas are still good ones, but they will be almost impossible to achieve given the chaos in Iraq that the report describes so accurately.

The report is seen as the triumph of "realism" in the foreign policy debate, and it is that. After years of unrealistic administration claims that all was going well in Iraq, it is truly refreshing to read a report by a group of establishmentarians stating plainly and realistically what is actually going on.

Democrats have mostly welcomed the report, and for good reason: It makes clear that whatever happens in Iraq, the mess was created by Bush administration policies. It will be hard to blame the new Democratic Congress after the fact.

By placing what is in effect a two-year limit on the American combat commitment in Iraq -- there are plenty of fudge words, but the message is clear -- the report ratifies the judgment of America's voters last month that time had run out on Bush's adventure.

And with some of the nation's leading Republican foreign policy specialists pronouncing Bush's policies a failure, other Republicans will have a hard time accusing Democrats of stabbing our military in the back with their own calls for withdrawal. The commission states clearly that what has happened up to this point has left our nation with only bad choices.

This war has done enormous damage to the United States, and some of the damage is to our ideals. The United States still has a powerful interest in encouraging the spread of democracy around the globe. Promoting democracy must remain a core goal of American foreign policy.

But there are smart ways to promote democracy and there are stupid, even dangerous, ways. Creating democracy where it has never existed is a long and painstaking process. You can't whip it up by buying a cake mix or holding a single election and declaring victory.

An administration that fought a misguided, poorly planned and ill-considered war in the name of democracy should not be allowed to discredit the democratic idea itself.

Set A Date And Buy Some Leverage (NYT)

By Thomas L. Friedman

The New York Times, December 8, 2006

The brutally honest Baker-Hamilton assessment of the Iraq morass implies that we need to leave Iraq if the factions there don't get their act together, but it also urges a last-ditch effort to enlist the help of Syria and Iran to salvage something decent. Both are good suggestions, but they will only have a chance of being effective if we go one notch further and set a fixed date — now — for America to leave Iraq.

The only hope of moving the factions inside Iraq, not to mention Syria and Iran, toward reconciliation is if we have leverage over them, which we now lack. The currency of Middle East politics is pain. And right now, all the pain is being inflicted on us and on Iraqi civilians. Only if we tell all the players that we are leaving might we create a different balance of pain and therefore some hope for a diplomatic deal. Trying to do diplomacy without the threat of pain is like trying to play baseball without a bat.

Yes, yes, I know, the conventional wisdom is that if the U.S. sets a date to leave Iraq the whole Middle East will explode in a Shiite-Sunni war. Maybe, but maybe not.

Let's play this out. What happens if we set a date to leave? The war in Iraq will get worse, but for how long? Right now our troops are providing a floor under the civil war that allows some parties to behave outrageously or make impossible demands — because they know that we won't let things spin totally out of control. Would they behave more cautiously if they knew they had to pay retail for their madness? I'd like to find out.

Moreover, while our presence in Iraq helps control the situation, it also aggravates it. For many Sunnis, and a growing number of Shiites, we've become "occupiers" to be resisted. Our leaving will both unleash violence and eliminate violence.

As for the neighbors, well, right now Iran, Syria and some other Arab states look at Iraq and clearly believe that the controlled chaos there is their friend. For Arab autocrats, chaos is their friend because a burning Iraq on Al Jazeera sends a message to their own people: "This is what happens to those who try democracy." And for Iran and Syria, anything that frustrates the U.S. in Iraq and keeps America bleeding weakens its ability to confront Tehran.

The minute we leave, chaos in Iraq is not their friend anymore. First of all, if there is a full-fledged civil war, Syria, a largely Sunni country, will have to support the Iraqi Sunnis. Shiite Iran will have to support the Iraqi Shiites. That would mean Iran and Syria, now allies, will be on opposite sides of the Iraqi civil war. That will leave them with the choice of either indirectly fighting each other or working to settle the war.

Moreover, right now we are "Mr. Big" in Iraq, soaking up all the popular anger. But the minute we're gone, Iran becomes "Mr. Big" and the age-old tensions between Iraqi Arab Shiites and Iranian Persian Shiites will surface. Iran and Moktada al-Sadr will be at each other's throats.

Also, as long as our troops are in Iraq, we are pinned down and an easy target for Iran to hit, should we ever want to strike its nuclear facilities. Once we are out, we will have much more room to maneuver. I'm not saying we should attack Iran, but I am saying Iran will be much more worried that we will.

As for the Arab states, they've done little to promote peace in Iraq. They've basically said to America: "You can't leave and we won't help." O.K., we're leaving. You still don't want to help? The only thing the Arab regimes fear more than democracy is fragmentation.

As I've written before, our real choices in Iraq are 10 months or 10 years. Either we commit the resources to entirely rebuild the place over a decade, for which there is little support, or we tell everyone that we will be out within 10 months, or sooner, and we'll deal with the consequences from afar. We need to start the timer — today, now.

As long as we're in Iraq, Iraq implodes, and we absorb a lot of the pain. The minute we leave, Iraq explodes — or at least no one can be sure it won't — and that is a real threat to the Iraqi factions and neighbors. Even facing that reality might not knock enough sense into them to compromise, but at least then they'll have their medieval religious war without us.

Only that threat will give us leverage. Yes, it would be a sad end to our involvement there. But everything Iraq's leaders have done so far suggests that a united, democratic and pluralistic Iraq is their second choice. Tribal politics is still their first choice. We can't go on having our first-choice kids dying for their second choice.

They Told You So (NYT)

By Paul Krugman

The New York Times, December 8, 2006

Shortly after U.S. forces marched into Baghdad in 2003, The Weekly Standard published a jeering article titled, "The Cassandra Chronicles: The stupidity of the antiwar doomsayers." Among those the article mocked was a "war novelist" named James Webb, who is now the senator-elect from Virginia.

The article's title was more revealing than its authors knew. People forget the nature of Cassandra's curse: although nobody would believe her, all her prophecies came true.

And so it was with those who warned against invading Iraq. At best, they were ignored. A recent article in The Washington Post ruefully conceded that the paper's account of the debate in the House of Representatives over the resolution authorizing the Iraq war — a resolution opposed by a majority of the Democrats — gave no coverage at all to those antiwar arguments that now seem prescient.

At worst, those who were skeptical about the case for war had their patriotism and/or their sanity questioned. The New Republic now says that it "deeply regrets its early support for this war." Does it also deeply regret accusing those who opposed rushing into war of "abject pacifism?"

Now, only a few neocon dead-enders still believe that this war was anything but a vast exercise in folly. And those who braved political pressure and ridicule to oppose what Al Gore has rightly called "the worst strategic mistake in the history of the United States" deserve some credit.

Unlike The Weekly Standard, which singled out those it thought had been proved wrong, I'd like to offer some praise to those who got it right. Here's a partial honor roll:

Former President George H. W. Bush and Brent Scowcroft, explaining in 1998 why they didn't go on to Baghdad in 1991: "Had we gone the invasion route, the United States could conceivably still be an occupying power in a bitterly hostile land."

Representative Ike Skelton, September 2002: "I have no doubt that our military would decisively defeat Iraq's forces and remove Saddam. But like the proverbial dog chasing the car down the road, we must consider what we would do after we caught it."

Al Gore, September 2002: "I am deeply concerned that the course of action that we are presently embarking upon with respect to Iraq has the potential to seriously damage our ability to win the war against terrorism and to weaken our ability to lead the world in this new century."

Barack Obama, now a United States senator, September 2002: "I don't oppose all wars. What I am opposed to is a dumb war. What I am opposed to is a rash war. What I am opposed to is the cynical attempt by Richard Perle and Paul Wolfowitz and other armchair, weekend warriors in this administration to shove their own ideological agendas down our throats, irrespective of the costs in lives lost and in hardships borne."

Representative John Spratt, October 2002: "The outcome after the conflict is actually going to be the hardest part, and it is far less certain."

Representative Nancy Pelosi, now the House speaker-elect, October 2002: "When we go in, the occupation, which is now being called the liberation, could be interminable and the amount of money it costs could be unlimited."

Senator Russ Feingold, October 2002: "I am increasingly troubled by the seemingly shifting justifications for an invasion at this time. ... When the administration moves back and forth from one argument to another, I think it undercuts the credibility of the case and the belief in its urgency. I believe that this practice of shifting justifications has much to do with the troubling phenomenon of many Americans questioning the administration's motives."

Howard Dean, then a candidate for president and now the chairman of the Democratic National Committee, February 2003: "I firmly believe that the president is focusing our diplomats, our military, our intelligence agencies, and even our people on the wrong war, at the wrong time. ... Iraq is a divided country, with Sunni, Shia and Kurdish factions that share both bitter rivalries and access to large quantities of arms."

We should honor these people for their wisdom and courage. We should also ask why anyone who didn't raise questions about the war — or, at any rate, anyone who acted as a cheerleader for this march of folly — should be taken seriously when he or she talks about matters of national security.

At Last, Bush Faced With Obvious Truth On Iraq (FT)

By Philip Stephens

Financial Times, December 8, 2006

About one thing George W. Bush is right; though, unsurprisingly, for the wrong reasons. There can be no "graceful exit" from Iraq. America faces a resounding defeat. The eventual cost, in lost prestige and influence in the Middle East and beyond as well as in blood and treasure in Iraq, will be immense. It may seem trivial to Iraqis.

A year ago, the bipartisan Iraq Study Group might have hoped to supply the architecture for a half-elegant US departure. That was always an over-ambitious aim. In any event, it was overtaken some time ago by the rapid escalation in Iraq of sectarian violence.

Robert Gates, the US defence secretary-designate, got it right when he told the Senate defence committee this week: "It's my impression that, frankly, there are no new ideas on Iraq." The study group's task thus became to put existing ideas together in such a way as to oblige Mr Bush to change course.

We cannot be sure the president will listen. The risk is that Mr Bush will seek to cherry pick. But the White House's options are narrowing fast. In this respect the group has fulfilled its mandate. The report is candid and concise in description, pragmatic in analysis. The tone is set by the opening sentence: "The situation in Iraq is grave and deteriorating."

The report's great service has been to state the obvious. America has lost control in Iraq and its influence is diminishing further by the day. If the US administration is to have even a slight chance of salvaging something from the wreckage, it must admit the connections it has so far denied. That means between security, politics and reconstruction within Iraq and, outside, with the array of other conflicts and tensions across the region. Above all, the report says, the Arab-Israeli conflict can no longer be ignored; nor can the influence and interests of Syria and Iran.

Nothing new there, you might say. Britain's Tony Blair and nearly everyone in Washington outside the administration, have been saying something similar. But the timing and provenance of this report matter. The end game is more about US politics than about the grim realities in Iraq.

Last month's mid-term elections saw the American people bluntly reject the administration's approach in favour of disengagement. As co-chairman of the study group, James Baker, a former Republican secretary of state and long-time Bush family consigliere, carries more clout than the president has ever been comfortable with. Lee Hamilton, the former Democratic congressman, gives the report its all-important bipartisan stamp.

The administration's inner torture, meanwhile, has been regularly bleeding into the pages of the New York Times. Every time Mr Bush reaches for another mantra about accomplishing the mission, the publication of another classified memorandum tells the story of an administration bereft of any strategy.

The most chilling example is a leaked Pentagon missive written by Donald Rumsfeld. There could be no better illustration than Mr Rumsfeld's private musings of the hubristic incompetence that has led America into this mess.

The sacked defence secretary recently remarked that the defence department was getting along fine with its "piece" of Iraq, a curious choice of words given his insistence from the outset that he retain full charge of the conduct of the war. His memorandum, which history will surely rate as one of the most shallow documents ever written by a politician carrying such grave responsibilities, tells a different story.

The soon-to-depart Mr Rumsfeld admits that the US is failing: "In my view, it is time for a major adjustment." He then produces a laundry list of alternative approaches. Almost casually, he admits that these putative changes – from US troop withdrawals and redeployments to cash bribes for friendly political and religious leaders in Iraq – may well not work.

No matter. Whatever decisions the US takes, he suggests, should be on a trial basis: "This will give us the ability to readjust and move to another course, if necessary, and therefore not 'lose'." Not lose? Where has Mr Rumsfeld been?

One suggestion for dealing with the upsurge in violence conveys the sheer vacuousness of it all. The US, he scolds in the manner of a parent set to punish a naughty child, must not reward "bad behaviour". It should cut off aid to any towns and villages where there is any violence. In other words, entire Iraqi communities should be punished for the actions of insurgents. Just the way to win hearts and minds.

Yet Mr Rumsfeld has not been alone. Fear of rewarding bad behaviour remains the stated rationale for the administration's refusal to engage Syria and Iran in an effort to stabilise Iraq. That might have had some superficial logic during that brief spell some years ago when American power seemed poised to sweep away all its enemies. Now it simply marries failed ideology with chronic weakness.

The study group has its own laundry list. Its recommendations run to nearly 80. They are strongest in their understanding of the intricate power struggles – between Shia, Sunni and Kurd, the secular and Islamist as well as Arab and Israeli – that now describe the Middle East. Above all, it recognises: "There must be a renewed and sustained commitment by the United States to a comprehensive Arab-Israel peace on all fronts."

Other recommendations are less convincing. Many are a reminder that the group's first priority is to map a path for US disengagement rather than necessarily to fix Iraq. Some carry the impression that the Iraqis are being blamed for the shortcomings of the US. The binding thread is a proposed withdrawal from Iraq of all US combat brigades by early 2008. If the carnage in Iraq has shaped the politics of Washington, those politics will now determine America's future in Iraq. In spite of its flaws, though, the report offers an intellectual coherence that has thus far been so sadly lacking.

What all this demands of Mr Bush is nothing less than the complete up-ending of his foreign policy. The goal of spreading democracy remains a noble one. But a crude vision of a world in thrall to America's military might must be replaced by one that recognises both the complexities of foreign policy and the limitations of US power. That may well be too much for this president to grasp. And it may, anyway, be too late for Iraq. But the delusions of the past few years are at last being swept away.

Don't Count On Iran To Pick Up The Pieces (NYT)

By Kenneth M. Pollack

The New York Times, December 8, 2006

AS anticipated, the Iraq Study Group has recommended that the United States begin talks with Iran to solicit its assistance in stabilizing Iraq. This recommendation seems so sensible that the Bush administration's past reluctance to follow it is hard to fathom. Still, administration officials are right to counter that talking to Iran is not a policy, let alone a solution to our problems in Iraq.

The real questions are these: What do we say to the Iranians if we can get them to the table? What can they do in Iraq? What would they be willing to do in Iraq? And what will they want in return?

We should have engaged Iran in Iraq years ago. Before and during the war in Afghanistan, the Iranians were quite helpful to the United States. They shared our hatred of Al Qaeda and the Taliban, and they provided us with extensive assistance on intelligence, logistics, diplomacy and Afghan internal politics. After we turned our sights on Saddam Hussein, the Iranians suggested that they would be willing to cooperate on that too. Unfortunately, the Bush administration declined the offer, preferring to lump Tehran with Baghdad and Pyongyang in the "axis of evil."

None of this should suggest that Iran was helping us for reasons other than blatant self-interest, or that it had suddenly given up its antipathy toward us. But it was demonstrating real pragmatism and being very helpful on issues of mutual concern, which should have been good enough.

Today, large numbers of Iranian intelligence agents have infiltrated Iraq, where they seem to be providing money, weapons and other supplies to virtually all of Iraq's Shiite militias. There are reports that Hezbollah is training Iraqi Shiite militiamen in Lebanon at Iran's behest. And the Shiite warlords all know that in an all-out civil war, Iran would be their only backer.

All of that gives the Iranians influence over the Shiite militias — influence that could be helpful to the United States as it tries to forge a new strategy toward Iraq.

We should be careful, however, not to exaggerate Iran's influence. The problems in Iraq were not caused by the Iranians, nor can Iran solve them all.

Most Iraqis dislike the Iranians. In fact, "dislike" is too mild a term. In 2004 and early 2005, when it still seemed as if the United States-led reconstruction of Iraq might succeed, Shiite politicians were bending over backward to demonstrate that they were independent of Iran for fear their constituents would not support them otherwise.

Furthermore, while Iranian support is no doubt gratefully received, the evidence suggests that it is now more a supplement than a necessity for the major militias. At this point, the main Shiite groups — the Supreme Council for the Islamic Revolution in Iraq, the Mahdi Army, and the Fadhila Party among others — have considerable support among the population and are accused of making enormous amounts of money off oil smuggling and organized crime. Plus, there is no shortage of weapons in Iraq, with additional supplies readily available on the regional black market.

So Tehran can influence the behavior of the Shiite groups, but it probably would have a hard time forcing them to do things they do not want to do — like disbanding their militias, accepting a national reconciliation agreement, participating in an equitable oil-sharing scheme or accepting any of the other major changes that the Bush administration is seeking. If Iran were to threaten to end its support for these groups, they would most likely tell Tehran to get lost. What's more, the Iranians seem to understand this, having so far proven reluctant to try to force any of the Shiite groups to radically change course.

The limits on Iranian influence are a double-edged sword. They mean that we cannot count on Iran to solve Iraq's problems, but they also mean that we need not offer the Iranians the world in return for their assistance. Right now, Tehran and its bombastic president are riding high in the Middle East, and they will doubtless want something in return for helping us deal with Iraq. For instance, they may demand that the United States drop its objections to their nuclear program or cave in to Hezbollah's demands for a greater say in Lebanon.

Especially given the likely limits on what Iran can deliver in Iraq, these would not be prices worth paying. Instead, the United States should emphasize a shared interest in preventing Iraq's further implosion, as chaos there could easily spread to Iran — a danger most of Tehran's leaders seem to appreciate.

In exchange for Iran's assistance, Washington should recognize Iran's legitimate interests in Iraq, keep it (generally) apprised of military operations, and possibly even develop a liaison relationship with the Iranian military and intelligence services by which the two sides could exchange limited information, thereby dampening Iranian fears of malign American intentions.

Much of this could be accomplished by forming a standing contact group made up of Iraq's neighbors — similar to the international support group proposed by Baker-Hamilton. The Iraqi government and the coalition forces would regularly brief this group and seek its advice, which should be ignored only with good reason. In return, the members of the contact group would commit to providing specific kinds of economic, political, diplomatic and even military support.

There are at least three good reasons to try this approach. First, no neighboring state is likely to significantly alter strategy unless they all do. Second, our efforts to work with Iran in Iraq cannot come at the expense of our traditional allies among the Sunni states of the region: Jordan, Kuwait, Saudi Arabia and Turkey. Finally, the problems in Iraq have become so daunting and so intertwined that we need every ounce of help we can get from every source available.

We can't simply expect Iran to save Iraq for us. Even all of Iraq's neighbors working in concert would play just a supporting role. Only the United States, working with those forces in Iraq still fighting the good fight, can possibly alter Iraq's catastrophic course.

We need a new, feasible plan of our own. Only then will we know how best Iran can help, and what we are willing to pay for that help. Talking to Iran without such a plan would be fruitless, if not folly.

Our Unceasing Ambivalence (WSJ)

By Shelby Steele

The Wall Street Journal, December 8, 2006

Possibly the most confounding feature of the Iraq war, from the very opening of hostilities to the present day, has been the American government's utter failure to define what victory would be in this war. "Victory" has been a conjure word for the Bush administration, a Churchillian allusion meant to evoke the heroic perseverance shown in the great wars of the past. But no one in the administration has ever said what victory would actually look like. And, lacking this description, even those of us who have supported the war have seen trouble coming for some time. Without a description of victory a war has no goal.

Historically victory in foreign war has always meant hegemony: You win, you take over. We not only occupied Germany and Japan militarily after World War II, we also -- and without a whit of self doubt -- imposed our democratic way of life on them. We took our victory as a moral mandate as well as a military achievement, and felt commanded to morally transform these defeated societies by the terms of our democracy. In this effort we brooked no resistance whatsoever and we achieved great success.

But today, as Nancy Pelosi recently put it, "You can define victory any way you want." And war, she said, was only "a situation to be resolved." If this sort of glibness makes the current war seem a directionless postmodern adventure, it is only because those who call us to war have themselves left the definition of victory wide open. And now, as if to confirm that this is a "relativistic" war meaning everything and nothing, there are at least three national commissions -- the White House, the Pentagon and the Baker committee -- tasked to create the meaning that will give us a dignified exit. Of course America is now quite beyond any possibility of dignity in this situation save the one option all these commissions have or will likely dismiss: complete military victory.

Why don't we know the meaning of this war and our reasons for fighting it? I think the answer begins in the awkward fact that America is now the world's uncontested superpower. If this fate has its advantages, it also brings an unasked-for degree of dominion in the world. This is essentially a passive dominion that has settled on a rather isolationist nation, yet it makes America into something of a sheriff. Whether the problem is Somalia, Bosnia, Iraq, Iran, North Korea or Darfur, America gets the call. Thus our youth are often asked to go to war more out of international responsibility than national necessity. This is a hard fate for a free and prosperous citizenry to accept -- the loss of sons and daughters to a kind of magnanimity. Today our antiwar movement is essentially an argument with this fate, a rejection of superpower responsibility.

And this fear of responsibility is what makes us ambivalent toward the idea of victory. Because victory is hegemonic, it mimics colonialism. A complete American victory in Iraq would put that nation -- at least for a time -- entirely under American power and sovereignty. We would in fact "own" the society as a colony. In today's international moral climate this would both undermine the legitimacy of our war effort and make an ongoing demand on our blood and treasure. If we are already a good ways down this road, complete victory would only take us further.

Is it any wonder, then, that we have failed to completely win this war? Since WWII, American leaders -- left and right -- have worked out of an impossible double bind: They cannot afford to win the wars they fight. Thus the postmodern American war in which the world's greatest power deconstructs its own motives for fighting until losing becomes a better option than winning. And yet the end of the Cold War has made these wars between the West and the Third World inevitable. When the world was clearly divided between the free West and the communist East, Third World countries could play the ingénue by offering their alignment to the most generous suitor. At the center of a market in alignment, they could extract financial support and enjoy a sense of importance.

But after the Cold War, these countries suddenly became crones without appeal or leverage in the West. And it was out of this sense of invisibility, this feeling of having fallen out of history, that certain Middle Eastern countries found a way to play the ingénue once again. They would not compete with or seduce the West; they would menace it.

Islamic extremism is an ideology of menace. It empowers those who, but for menace, would languish in the world's disregard. The dark achievement of bin Laden, Nasrallah and Ahmadinejad, names we know only because of their association to menace, is that they have used menace to make their people visible in the world, to bring them back into the scheme of history. And they are greatly loved for this. If their achievements follow from evil rather than from good, this is a small thing. Worse than evil is invisibility.

So, in the Middle East, America has gone to war not against Islam but against menace as a formula for power -- menace as the force that brings the First World in toe to the Third, and that makes bargaining between the two inevitable. Whether the issue is an obsession with nuclear weapons or terrorism in London or assaults against Israel, menace is the power that draws the West backwards into engagement with otherwise forgotten parts of the world. Iran cannot produce a digital camera or a Ferrari but, through menace, it can affect the balance of power in the world. We in the West, and especially America, then, are at war with menace -- the indulgence of evil for strategic advantage -- because today it is the power that most compromises us.

And yet Americans are also at war in the Middle East with our own fate as the world's singular superpower. Our sacrifice is more in proportion to our responsibility as a superpower than to our survival as a nation. We fight menace in Iraq and yet we know that complete victory there will only make us into colonialists, and thus expand our level of responsibility even further. So we fight a little against victory even as we fight for it. At the beginning of this war we delivered the "shock" but not the "awe," and then as the insurgency developed, we made a kind of space for it, almost as if we believed it had a right to fight us. Victory threatens us with the obligations and moral stigma of empire.

Only reluctant superpowers go to war with a commitment to fight until they can escape. So today the talk is of "draw-downs," "redeployments," etc. But all these options are undermined by the fact that we simply have not won the war. We have not achieved hegemony in Iraq, so there is no umbrella of American power under which a new nation might find its own democratic personality, or learn to defend itself. We have failed to give "peace in the streets" to the people we are asking to embrace the moderations of democracy. Without American hegemony, these "draw-downs" and "redeployments" are acts of outrageous moral irresponsibility, because they cede hegemony to the forces of menace -- the Sunni insurgency, the Shiite militia, the Islamic extremists, the wolfish ambitions of Iran. It was America's weak application of power that made space for these forces to begin with. To now shrink the American footprint further would likely offer the country up as a killing field and embolden Islamic radicals everywhere.

For every reason, from the humanitarian to the geopolitical to the military, Iraq is a war that America must win in the hegemonic, even colonial, sense. It is a test of our civilization's commitment to the good against the alluring notion of menace-as-power that has gripped so much of the Muslim world. Today America is a danger to the world in its own right, not because we are a powerful bully but because we don't fully accept who we are. We rush to war as a superpower protecting the world from menace, then leave the battle before winning as a show of what, humility? We confuse our enemies, discouraging them one minute and encouraging them the next.

Could it be that our enemies are really paper tigers made formidable by our unceasing ambivalence? And could it be that the greater good is in both the idea and the reality of American victory?

A Reality Check On The Iraq Study Group Report (CSM)

By Robert Zelnick

The Christian Science Monitor, December 8, 2006

During the Iran hostage crisis a generation ago, I asked a senior State Department official what he would recommend to extricate the country from its predicament. "There is no good answer," he replied. "The trick is not getting into these situations."

Former Secretary of State James Baker, his Co-chair, Lee Hamilton, and their distinguished Iraq Study Group (ISG), must have echoed that sentiment often. But they persevered and came up with 79 recommendations Wednesday designed to end the US combat role in the country while averting humiliating defeat, giving Iraq the prospect of escaping unimaginable calamity, and providing the region with an opportunity to preempt what could become a spreading war.

For that they deserve credit, and for starkly debunking suggestions by Bush administration apologists that the war was somehow going better than accounts in the media might suggest. No, this is a war of unyielding Sunni insurgents, murderous Shiite militias, a dangerous sprinkling of international jihadists, mounting US and Iraqi casualties, and a staggering price tag of $400 billion to date, en route to a possible final tab of $3 trillion.

Four months ago, during a visit to Iraq, I encountered among senior coalition figures the seeds of disenchantment with Prime Minister Nouri al-Maliki. Some suspected his hatred of the old Saddam Hussein regime remained so intense that he wouldn't promote the reconciliation necessary for the Sunnis to end their insurgency. Others saw him as too politically weak and dependent on radical Shiite factions to offer a package that must include amnesty, a fair division of oil revenues, and a standing down of sectarian militias, particularly the 60,000-man Mahdi Army running wild through the vast Baghdad slum called Sadr City.

Still, the tendency in August was to give Mr. Maliki time to "get his legs." The Baker-Hamilton report, however, pulls no punches: "Maliki has ... ordered the removal of blockades around Sadr City, sought more control over Iraqi security forces and resisted US requests to move forward on reconciliation or on disbanding Shiite militias."

For all its insight regarding where the Iraq effort stands and how things can get even worse, the report's worth will ultimately be judged by two groups of proposals designed to make possible a US withdrawal unburdened by mission failure. The first is a diplomatic offensive calculated to enlist key states in the area to support and assist an independent Iraq, encourage an end to the insurrection on generous terms and, of course, to cease all mischief of their own. Contrary to established administration policy, Iran and Syria would both be invited to the table.

The second would transform the US military role from combat to training and support for Iraqi forces, including a substantial US component embedded with host country troops. By early 2008, the plan envisions a complete end to the US combat role with a drawdown of US forces to about half their current number of roughly 145,000. Two proposals - two probable failures

My problem with both plans is that neither seems likely to work. Both advertise US weakness when even during its period of military and political dominance the US-led coalition could not prevent Iran from training and equipping Shiite militias, Syria from providing a haven for Hussein loyalists and looking the other way as Al Qaeda operatives slipped across the border into Iraq, or Iraq's Sunnis from attacking the "occupier."

As a position of power and influence in Iraq has already fallen into his lap, Iranian President Mahmoud Ahmadinejad isn't likely to abandon his Holocaust denial activities long enough to attend Mr. Baker's event. In several interviews Wednesday, Baker admitted as much. His fallback position: Try to "flip" Syria from its current Iranian benefactor by offering Damascus the opportunity to negotiate with Israel for return of the Golan Heights, captured by the Israelis in 1967. In addition to behaving in Iraq, the Syrians would also stay out of Lebanon, assist the UN in investigating two political murders in Lebanon, block Iranian weapons shipments to Hizbullah that now transit Syria, and persuade Hamas to recognize Israel.

When does diplomacy become fantasy? Viewed in the cold light of day, the panel's "New Diplomatic Offensive" would qualify.

As to the cluster of proposals involving a changed US military role, I fear this would mean foreclosing an important opportunity to make the numbers work to the advantage of the coalition. Just months ago, Marine Corps intelligence estimated that with an additional division in Anbar Province, the marines could defeat the Sunni insurrection. The fleshing out of Iraq's 10 divisions this year, and their accelerated training in 2007, could have complemented the US fighting force, probably enabling it to field that extra Anbar division, with a corresponding increase in bargaining power. Instead, the US would suffer a sharp diminution in combat and bargaining power as the drawdown begins.

A particularly frightening consequence of the combat drawdown could occur in Baghdad itself, where the removal of US troops would leave residents totally at the mercy of Shiite militias overseen only by troops from the Shiite-controlled Army.

Two additional items bear mention. First, the ISG gives short shrift to the Kurdish autonomy issue and the inclusion of the oil-rich territory of Kirkuk in Kurdish lands. Blithely, the group proposes postponement by one year of a referendum on Kirkuk, constitutionally mandated to occur in 2007. When I visited the area in August, two senior American officers warned that the

Kurds would go to war rather than surrender Kirkuk. They argued, too, that the pro-American Kurds were a much better strategic bet than a Shiite-led Iraq strongly influenced by Iran. Even as a nominal part of an Iraqi state, their freedom is worth US protection. The Israeli-Palestinian question

Finally, the panel urges the administration to re-energize the Israeli peace talks with Palestinians who accept Israel's existence. Peace talks are not a synonym for peace and unless carefully prepared, they can lead instead to war. Witness the failure at Camp David in 2000 and the resulting human carnage of the second intifada.

Does any Palestinian today have both the will and the political power to negotiate a deal with Israel that waives the so-called right of return for refugees from the 1948 war and their descendants? Will the region be more content with a failed Camp David-type spectacular, or an effort that begins with such modest confidence-building measures as a cease-fire accord, an easing of travel restrictions, and selective prisoner releases? In any event, the bridge between Israelis and Palestinians is fragile enough to barely support the weight of its own parties. Adding to it the weight of a conflict between Sunnis and Shiites in Iraq is simply not smart.

With Military Options Limited, It's Time For Plan B: Diplomacy (USAT)

USA Today, December 8, 2006

If there was an important message lost in the rollout of the Iraq Study Group's report on Wednesday, it was this: New diplomatic initiatives, even at this 11th hour, are essential not just for ending the Iraq war but also to put the United States in the optimum position after it is over.

If the military effort begins to succeed, they add a point of leverage. But more important is their value in the event that the situation continues to deteriorate.

Should Iraq's shaky government fail, the United States' ability to control the country's violent disintegration militarily will be minimal. The Bush administration — stubbornly fixated on an improbable victory — is poorly positioned to cope with this, much less to restore a U.S. leadership role so badly undercut by differences over Iraq. Diplomacy is the only alternative.

The group's co-chair, former secretary of State James Baker, advocated a broad regional approach as a way to mitigate the dangers. "Everything in the Middle East," he rightly noted, "is connected to everything else."

At the center of the bipartisan panel's ideas is a proposal for an all-out push to revive the Israeli-Palestinian peace process, bringing Syria and Lebanon into that effort.

The group pointed out a truth rarely heard by Americans (even as it is front and center in the Arab world and Europe): U.S. disengagement from Israeli-Palestinian peace efforts is a huge source of tension and anti-Americanism, like a raging toothache inflaming everything else. U.S. allies in the region, including the powerful Sunni leadership in Saudi Arabia, say that it underlies other Mideast problems and that rancor from the impasse makes them harder to solve.

On Thursday, President Bush had the opportunity to act on that recommendation. He met with British Prime Minister Tony Blair, who has long argued for making the Israeli-Palestinian conflict a top priority, in terms not so different from the Iraq Study Group. Blair is about to visit the Middle East, and Bush could have anointed him his de facto envoy, approaching the conflict with the same gusto once applied to the Iraq invasion. But he chose not to, and the truth is that Blair can't get far alone because U.S. leadership has always been the essential ingredient in the peace process.

U.S. presidents forged the Camp David accords that brought peace between Israel and Egypt in 1978, and led Israeli and Palestinian leaders to the brink of peace a decade ago. A new presidential initiative could revive U.S. influence. Instead, Bush seemed more focused on admonishing Palestinian extremists.

That misses the point. The Iraq Study Group explicitly excluded from negotiation those who reject Israel's right to exist. It wants instead to restore the traditional approach of negotiating with Arab neighbors, who have a strong interest in stability.

Critics might dismiss the group's proposals as little more than a nostalgic revival of the unworkable methods of a bygone era. But dialogue and negotiation move opponents toward agreements — in everything from labor disputes to deciding in a family who will prepare dinner. They are the foundation of centuries of diplomacy.

Bush's rigidity is particularly dangerous right now as the United States searches for an exit strategy from Iraq that won't make Americans more vulnerable.

Keep Focus On Iraq (USAT)

By Abraham Foxman

USA Today, December 8, 2006

When it comes to the Arab-Israeli conflict, the Iraq Study Group falls into the traps of inappropriately linking stability in Iraq to a solution of the Arab-Israeli conflict and of blaming extremism on the absence of peace, rather than recognizing that peace itself is prevented by extremism.

DOJ_NMG_0103943

These are critically incorrect assumptions that lead the Iraq Study Group off in counterproductive directions:

·The assumptions lead the group to underplay the importance of Hamas' rejection of Israel and to discount terrorism as an obstacle to progress.

·They lead it to be vague about the greatest threat to the region — to the Arabs as well as Israel — the effort by extremist Iran to develop a nuclear weapon. Instead of focusing on alternative and serious options regarding this threat, all one hears is a recommendation to leave the issue with the United Nations Security Council and consider engaging Iran in dialogue.

·The assumptions also lead to a general misimpression about the sources and goals of extremism in the area.

It has been inevitable historically that when analysts see all problems in the Middle East as coming back to the Arab-Israeli conflict that it leads, as it does in this case, to a minimizing of the extent of hostility that exists toward Israel. For if so much else is dependent on solving that conflict, then one has to delude oneself that parties such as Hamas, Hezbollah, Syria and Iran are not so hostile, in order to believe a solution is possible.

Invariably, this approach neither solves the Arab-Israeli conflict nor helps lessen other serious problems in the region, such as Iraq.

It is good that the Iraq Study Group has reiterated that no U.S. administration will abandon Israel, that peace must be based on Security Council resolutions 242 and 338, and that the only lasting peace will be a negotiated peace such as Israel has achieved with Egypt and Jordan.

Even so, it is of great concern that the underlying concepts of the Iraq Study Group — the focus on the Arab-Israeli conflict and the underestimating of the depths of extremism — would lead U.S. policy in directions that would create even greater obstacles to the peace in the region that we all desire.

Iraq Report Just Cover For Surrender? (USAT)

USA Today, December 8, 2006

Investor's Business Daily,

in an editorial: "The Iraq Study Group's call for 'a change in the primary mission of U.S. forces in Iraq that will enable the United States to begin to move its combat forces out of Iraq responsibly' is simply retreat by another name. … America is engaged in a global war on terror against religious fanatics who cannot be talked into changing their minds, and so retreat in Iraq would be viewed as a victory for the Islamofascists. … Nowhere do we hear from the (group) any inkling of how exactly it could be possible to sit down and change the behavior of someone such as Iran's Mahmoud Ahmadinejad — (who) hopes for an Islamic apocalypse that he might make come sooner with nuclear weapons. …The Baker group serves up a Texas-sized helping of wishful thinking."

The Philadelphia Inquirer,

in an editorial: "The Iraq Study Group report … offers the best of the remaining choices for the United States to proceed in the Persian Gulf. The main recommendation of gradually changing the U.S. military's role from combat to training and supporting Iraqi forces is worth a try. So is convening a conference of Iraq's neighbors and restarting diplomacy to create a Palestinian state that stands alongside a secure Israel. These suggestions, based on a clear-eyed assessment of what's happening in Iraq, are already worth more to the American public than the misinformation that has been coming out of Washington."

The Wichita Eagle,

in an editorial: "President Bush faces a new national mood of tough realism and bipartisanship on Iraq, as exemplified by the study group and its findings. … The call for a pullout gives momentum to those arguing for a sooner rather than later departure from Iraq, although the study group also made clear that America's interests would not be served by leaving chaos behind. In truth, as expected, there's nothing really new in the study: No startling new ideas, no breakthroughs in policy or approach — and no good options. … America must now choose among the least harmful of several bad options for getting out of Iraq. That's the new reality facing President Bush and the nation."

George Will,

syndicated columnist, in The Washington Post: " The Iraq Study Group, like the policy it was created to critique, was overtaken by the unexpectedly rapid crumbling of the U.S. position in Iraq since ISG was formed in March. The deterioration was manifested in last week's misbegotten summit between President Bush and Iraqi Prime Minister Nouri al-Maliki … The ISG's recommendations must be read in light of these facts from the week during which the recommendations were being written. … The ISG's central conclusion … is that the problem with Iraq is the Iraqis, a semi-nation of peoples who are very difficult to help. The ISG's report will help accomplish what it recommends — increase pressure on Iraq's 'government' in the hope of turning it into a government by June, when Maliki says Iraq will be able to cope with its security needs. How likely is that?"

St. Louis Post-Dispatch,

in an editorial: "Recommendation No. 21: 'If the Iraqi government does not make substantial progress toward the achievement of milestones on national reconciliation, security and governance, the United States should reduce its political, military or economic support for the Iraqi government.' … The Baker-Hamilton commission has served the ball directly into the court of Iraqi Prime Minister al-Maliki's government. If the Iraqis don't return serve, the United States should start pulling out. The report … outline(s) how unlikely it is that the Iraqis even will get a racquet on the ball: Review of the constitution to pacify Sunni complaints. Returning former Baath Party members to government posts. Sharing oil revenue from Kurdish and Shiite provinces with the Sunnis. … Protection for the rights of women and minorities. … It almost defies belief. … Still, the report is the closest thing to a viable face-saving, peace-making, troops-home set of options we're likely to see."

Dueling Views On Diplomacy Pit Baker Against Rice (NYT)

By David E. Sanger

WASHINGTON, Dec. 7 — Many of the blistering critiques of the Bush administration contained in the Iraq Study Group's report boil down to this: the worldviews of Baker versus Rice.

Former Secretary of State James A. Baker III was the architect of the "new diplomatic offensive" in the Middle East that the commission recommended Wednesday as one of its main prescriptions for extracting the country from the mess in Iraq. Ever since, he has been talking on television, to Congress and to Iraqis and foreign diplomats about how he would conduct American foreign policy differently. Very differently.

At a midday meeting with reporters on Thursday, Mr. Baker insisted that the study group had "rejected looking backward." But he then proceeded to make a passionate argument for a course of action he believed Condoleezza Rice, the current secretary of state, should be pursuing — while carefully never mentioning Ms. Rice by name.

The United States should engage Iran, Mr. Baker contended, if only to reveal its "rejectionist attitude"; it should try to "flip the Syrians"; and it should begin a renewed quest for peace between Israel and the Palestinians that, he maintained, would help convince Arab moderates that America was not all about invasions and regime change.

Meanwhile, Ms. Rice remained publicly silent, sitting across town in the office that Mr. Baker gave up 14 years ago. She has yet to say anything about the public tutorial being conducted by the man who first knew her when she was a mid-level Soviet expert on the National Security Council. She has not responded to Mr. Baker's argument, delivered in a tone that drips with isn't-this-obvious, that America has to be willing to talk to its adversaries (a premise Ms. Rice has questioned if the conditions are not right), or his dismissal of the administration's early argument that the way to peace in the Middle East was through quick, decisive victory in Baghdad.

Aides to the 52-year-old Ms. Rice say she is acutely aware that there is little percentage in getting into a public argument with Mr. Baker, the 76-year-old architect of the first Bush administration's Middle East policy. But Thursday, as President Bush gently pushed back against some of Mr. Baker's recommendations, Ms. Rice's aides and allies were offering a private defense, saying that she already has a coherent, effective strategy for the region.

She has advocated "deepening the isolation of Syria," because she believes much of the rest of the Arab world condemns its efforts to topple Lebanon's government, they said; and in seeking to isolate Iran, they said, she hopes to capitalize on the fears of nations like Saudi Arabia, Egypt and Jordan that Iran seeks to dominate the region, with the option of wielding a nuclear weapon.

Ms. Rice makes no apology for the premium she has placed on promoting democracy in the Middle East, even though that is an idea that Mr. Baker and his commission conspicuously ignored in spelling out their recommendations. "I don't think that the road to democracy in Iraq is at all utopian," she said in April.

It is plenty utopian to Mr. Baker, who has made clear his view that the quest is entirely ill-suited to the realities of striking a political deal that may keep Sunnis and Shiites from killing each other, and that may extract American forces from Iraq.

Mr. Baker said nothing on Thursday about looking for Jeffersonian democrats in Iraq; he would be happy with few good "Iraqi nationalists" who can keep the country from splintering apart.

"They start from completely different places," said Dennis Ross, the Middle East negotiator who worked for Mr. Baker years ago and left the State Department early in the Bush administration. "Baker approaches everything with a negotiator's mindset. That doesn't mean every negotiation leads to a deal, but you engage your adversaries and use your leverage to change their behavior. This administration has never had a negotiator's mind-set. It divides the world into friends and foes, and the foes are incorrigible and not redeemable. There has been more of an instinct toward regime change than to changing regime behavior."

To some degree, the Bush administration has softened that approach in its second term, and Ms. Rice's aides contend that much of what is recommended in the Baker report, including a regional group to support the country, is already under way.

Mr. Bush himself seems uncertain how to handle his always-uncomfortable relationship with his father's close friend. It was Mr. Baker who in 2000 ran the strategy for winning the Florida recount, but he has also made little secret in private that he regards the current administration as a bunch of diplomatic go-cart racers, more interested in speed than strategy and prone to ruinous crashes. At his news conference on Thursday with Prime Minister Tony Blair, Mr. Bush bathed the report in faint praise, though he slipped at one point and referred to Mr. Baker as the sitting secretary of state.

The administration has sent out word that it regards Mr. Baker's recommendations as more than a little anachronistic, better suited to the Middle East of 1991 than to the one they are confronting — and to some degree have created — in 2006 three years after the Iraq invasion. It is a criticism that angers Mr. Baker, members of the study group say.

Iran and Syria illustrate the differing approaches of Mr. Baker and Ms. Rice. "If you can flip the Syrians you will cure Israel's Hezbollah problem," Mr. Baker said Thursday, noting that Syria is the transit point for arms shipments to Hezbollah. He said Syrian officials told him "that they do have the ability to convince Hamas to acknowledge Israel's right to exist," and added, "If we accomplish that, that would give the Ehud Olmert a negotiating partner."

Ms. Rice's allies argue that if it were all that simple, the Syrian problem would have been solved long ago. Stephen J. Hadley, national security adviser and Ms. Rice's former deputy, said recently that the problem "isn't one of communication, it's one of cooperation." Another administration official, who worked on the Middle East under Mr. Baker, said he admired Mr. Baker but added that "our Arab friends are enormously alarmed by this report, because they think it will be used by the Iranians" to gain advantage.

Now that Mr. Baker has taken his differences public, the mystery is this: is he speaking for Mr. Bush's father? "We never figured that out," said one fellow member of the panel. "There was always this implication that there was a tremendous amount of frustration from the old man about what was happening. But Jim was always very careful."

The elder Mr. Bush was careful, too. Asked if he wanted to offer his insights to the panel, he declined.

Rice To Press Harder For Revival Of Mideast Talks (USAT)

By Barbara Slavin

USA Today, December 8, 2006

WASHINGTON — A day after a bipartisan panel urged the Bush administration to try harder to broker Middle East peace, the State Department said Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice would devote more energy to reviving Israeli talks with the Palestinians.

State Department spokesman Sean McCormack said Rice would travel to the Middle East early next year. "You are going to see her devote a tremendous amount of energy and … focus to create conditions" that allow peace talks to resume, McCormack said.

James Baker and Lee Hamilton, co-leaders of the Iraq Study Group, recommended that the Bush administration do more to resolve the Arab-Israeli conflict, which was hurting the chances to stabilize Iraq.

"We need to improve things for the United States in the Middle East generally," Baker, a former secretary of State, said.

"The road to peace in Iraq lies in Baghdad," added Hamilton, former chairman of the House International Relations Committee. But he said it was "critical" to re-energize efforts to forge Arab-Israeli peace to shore up U.S. "standing and credibility" throughout the region and to encourage Syria and Iran not to sabotage Iraq.

The Bush administration has been leery of direct negotiations with Syria or Iran. President Bush, at a joint news conference with British Prime Minister Tony Blair, said Thursday that he is not eager to let Syria and Iran join multination talks about Iraq, proposed by the Iraq panel, unless they "understand their responsibilities" not to foster violence in Iraq.

Hamilton and Baker, whose report is critical of Bush's Middle East policy, disagreed. The report calls for creation of an Iraq Support Group to include Syria and Iran and said the United States "should also consider incentives" to get them to participate.

"You shouldn't try is not a policy," Hamilton said. "In order to solve problems, you have to talk to people."

The study group recommendation is similar to diplomacy in 1991.

Then, the United States organized the first conference of Israel and its Arab foes. The United States had just won a war against Iraq with the help of a large coalition that included Syria. The Palestine Liberation Organization, which had backed Iraq when it invaded Kuwait, was desperate for a lifeline.

The situation now is different. "We won that war, and were able to build on that victory with our allies," said Robert Satloff, executive director of the Washington Institute for Near East Policy, a pro-Israel think tank. "This is a very different scenario in which regional peacemaking is not in the cards."

The environment is not as favorable to the United States and its allies as it was in 1991. Since the U.S.-led invasion of Iraq in 2003, U.S. enemies have gained strength.

Iran, which supports militant groups opposed to Israel, is growing in regional importance. The Iraq Study Group said Iran is the most influential of Iraq's neighbors because of its ties with Iraqi Shiite politicians and militias.

Iran is also developing nuclear power, and Iran-backed Islamic fundamentalists are stronger in Lebanon than they were 15 years ago.

Israel is weaker after a 34-day war this summer with Hezbollah, a militant Shiite faction in Lebanon backed by Iran and Syria, said Vali Nasr, a Middle East expert at the Naval Postgraduate School in Monterey, Calif.

Hamas, another Iran-backed militant group, won in U.S.-backed Palestinian elections this year, complicating efforts to restart peace talks.

The United States and Israel say they want new negotiations but insist that the Palestinians form a Cabinet that excludes Hamas, which doesn't recognize Israel's right to exist.

On Thursday, Israeli Prime Minister Ehud Olmert rejected peace talks with Syria, which wants to regain the Golan Heights, which Israel captured in 1967.

Edward Djerejian, a former U.S. ambassador to Israel and Syria who wrote much of the study group report, said Syria's desire to regain the Golan Heights has to be taken into account to get Syria to help stabilize Iraq.

"If you want to get Syria to act more constructively, you have to put it in a broader context in which they will have a stake in the game," he said.

Chairmen Urge Bush To Follow Recommendations (WP)

By Howard Schneider

The Washington Post, December 8, 2006

The chairmen of the bipartisan Iraq Study Group today urged President Bush to follow their full slate of recommendations, as one key senator criticized the panel's report as a recipe for defeat.

In a hearing before the Senate Armed Services Committee, former secretary of state James A. Baker III and former Democratic congressman Lee H. Hamilton also criticized the current government of Iraq and said a main thrust of their work is to hold Iraqi officials more accountable for events in the country.

"The Iraqi government has not performed well. It is a weak government. . . . Our approach to this point has been to give assistance without conditionality," said Hamilton. "We are pouring huge resources in there, and why wouldn't they be satisfied with that?" he asked. "This government has not taken the tough steps it needs to take."

Today's hearing came as lawmakers, observers and the president himself began digesting the conclusions and recommendations of the Iraq Study Group. The panel, assessing the state of the nearly four-year-old conflict, has called for a major change in direction that puts more onus on the Iraqis to police their own country and calls for the exit of most American combat troops by early 2008.

While Baker and Hamilton reiterated their feeling that Iraq policy needed a dose of pragmatism, Sen. John McCain (R-Ariz.) said he thought the call to begin withdrawing troops is a "recipe that will lead to our defeat in Iraq."

McCain has called for a large increase in troops to overcome the sectarian militias and insurgent groups that have pushed the country toward anarchy.

"There's only one thing worse than an overstressed Army and Marine Corps, and that's a defeated Army and Marine Corps," McCain said.

Baker said the Iraq panel felt it was adequate to keep a force of perhaps 20,000 in the country to "embed" with and train Iraqi forces, along with a "robust deployment" of additional troops to protect the trainers. There are currently about 140,000 troops in Iraq.

Both Baker and Hamilton also questioned one of the Bush administration's original premises for the 2003 invasion -- that going into Iraq was necessary to defeat al-Qaeda and other terrorist groups following the Sept. 11, 2001, attacks in New York and Washington.

Asked directly by Sen. Lindsey O. Graham (R-S.C.) whether Iraq was central to the war on terror, Baker said "it may not have been when we first went in," even though he felt "it certainly is now."

Since the invasion, Iraq has attracted foreign fighters who have launched attacks on Americans and helped stir sectarian violence between Iraq's Shiite Muslim majority and its Sunni Muslim Arab minority.

Hamilton said Iraq is one central front in the war on terror, "but to put it the central front overstates it."

The study group concluded that the al-Qaeda presence in Iraq is relatively small, particularly compared to the tens of thousands of Iraqis involved in sectarian militias.

The Iraq Study Group's report is one of several policy reviews that the Bush administration says it will consider in coming weeks as it decides what changes to make in its Iraq strategy.

In a press conference today, Bush seemed to reject the panel's call to scale back U.S. ambitions, repeating his feeling that the war in Iraq is part of a broader ideological struggle -- akin to the Cold War or World War II -- against extremist groups trying to influence the Muslim world.

While acknowledging that Bush will consult a number of sources for advice, Baker told the committee that the group's report was not a "fruit salad" whose recommendations could easily be sorted.

"This is a comprehensive strategy to face this problem in Iraq," Baker said, and its recommendations would help "restore American standing and credibility in the world."

Some Senators Skeptical Of Iraq Study Group's Proposals (USAT)

By Bill Nichols

USA Today, December 8, 2006

WASHINGTON — Senators sharply questioned the recommendations of the Iraq Study Group on Thursday, while the commission's co-chairmen urged Congress to unite behind a revised U.S. policy.

Most members of the Senate Armed Services Committee endorsed the overall tone of the bipartisan report, which offers 79 recommendations for how to change U.S. policy in Iraq. Former Indiana congressman Lee Hamilton and former secretary of State James Baker, the study's co-chairmen, appeared before the committee.

"I think perhaps the most significant thing you've done is to set an example for us, that five Democrats and five Republicans sat and reasoned together about what we should do in Iraq to succeed," said Sen. Joe Lieberman, I-Conn.

Two of the commission's recommendations drew scrutiny, however — a call for the Bush administration to make diplomatic overtures to Iran and Syria and for the U.S. military to accelerate its efforts to train Iraqi forces.

Lieberman and Sen. Susan Collins, R-Maine, expressed doubt that the United States could coax Iran into helping stabilize Iraq as part of a larger diplomatic initiative in the Middle East.

"I'm skeptical that it's realistic to think that Iran wants to help the United States succeed in Iraq," Lieberman said.

Baker acknowledged that Iran is unlikely to help. He said the White House had given him permission recently to approach the Iranian government. "And they, in effect, said, 'We would not be inclined to help you this time around,' " he said.

Baker said, however, that the commission saw no harm in approaching Iran anyway. If Iran declines to help, "then we will hold them up to public scrutiny as the rejectionist state they have proven to be."

Sen. John McCain, R-Ariz., took issue with the panel's call for largely phasing out the U.S. combat role in Iraq by 2008 and focusing instead on training and advising the Iraqi army. McCain dismissed the study's contention that the U.S. Army and Marines cannot spare more combat forces for Iraq.

"There's only one thing worse than an overstressed Army and Marine Corps and that's a defeated Army and Marine Corps," he said. "I believe this is a recipe that will lead to our defeat sooner or later in Iraq."

Baker and Hamilton underscored the need for rapid change in Iraq. "Bipartisanship is critical," Baker said. "This is an extraordinarily difficult problem. And unless the country comes together behind a unified approach, we're going to have a tough time dealing with it."

Neither Baker nor Hamilton offered predictions on what new direction President Bush ultimately will choose for the United States' course in Iraq.

Senators Challenge Feasibility Of Iraq Plans (WP)

By Thomas E. Ricks

The Washington Post, December 8, 2006

Members of Congress yesterday questioned the practicability of recommendations from the Iraq Study Group about how to reverse the chaos in Iraq, but they praised the panel's stark assessment of conditions there.

Sen. Carl M. Levin (D-Mich.) said he plans to hold a series of hearings on Iraq soon after becoming chairman of the Senate Armed Services Committee next month when Democrats take control of Congress, and he said he is prepared to use subpoenas to get relevant documents from the Pentagon.

Democrats were guarded in their treatment of the report, especially its call for engaging Syria and Iran in diplomacy. In comments after a hearing yesterday with the co-chairmen of the Iraq Study Group, Levin suggested that "there could be some kind of effort to generally support the recommendations."

But Republicans and Democrats alike on the Senate Armed Services panel quizzed former secretary of state James A. Baker III and former congressman Lee H. Hamilton (D-Ind.) about specifics. Sen. John McCain (R-Ariz.) was the most dubious, singling out the group's decision not to call for sending more troops to Iraq. "I believe that this is a recipe that will lead to, sooner or later, our defeat in Iraq," he said.

Another leading presidential aspirant, Sen. Hillary Rodham Clinton (D-N.Y.), was more receptive but expressed doubt that President Bush would act on the report. "We've now heard from the Iraq Study Group, but we need the White House to become the Iraq Results Group," she said. "That is very frustrating for some of us. We don't understand the misjudgments and missteps that have been taken in the last years."

Sen. Joseph I. Lieberman (D-Conn.), along with several colleagues, took aim at one of the bipartisan commission's most controversial proposals: that the United States use diplomacy to find ways to get Syria and Iran to help stabilize Iraq. "I'm skeptical that it's realistic to think that Iran wants to help the United States succeed in Iraq," he said.

Baker and Hamilton proved to be unusual witnesses. They conceded that their 79 recommendations carry a good deal of risk, but they essentially said no one else had a better idea. "We think it is worth a try," said Baker, conveying the sense that the United States is down to its last chance in Iraq, and that the group had prescribed the least bad of several options.

"You don't have much to lose here," Hamilton added in defending the diplomatic recommendations. "Things are not going in a very good direction right now, and why not take some chance here in involving these countries?"

He also warned that a point is fast approaching beyond which Iraq could become a lost cause. "We're perilously close to that point," he said.

Baker was feisty in defending the proposals to engage Iran and Syria. "We're not naive enough to think that in this case they may want to help," he said. But if Iran refused to participate in an international conference, he said, it would show itself to be rejectionist.

He also said it is possible to use carrots and sticks to get Syria to be more helpful, citing as proof that he was able to bring Damascus into the international coalition for the Persian Gulf War. "I got it, back in '91 after 15 trips there, at a time when they were a state that sponsored terrorism," he noted.

Baker displayed little of the deference witnesses customarily show senators. At one point, he impatiently interrupted Lieberman's questioning about whether Iran would engage in talks. "We say it in the report, Senator -- it's in the report," he said, noting that the United States conferred with Tehran about events in Afghanistan.

Hamilton also told the senators that they are part of the problem. "I, frankly, am not that impressed with what the Congress has been able to do," said the 34-year House veteran. "I think the Congress has been extraordinarily timid in its exercise of its constitutional responsibilities on the question of warmaking and conducting war."

Separately, in another indication of the difficulties the commission's recommendations may encounter in Congress, Rep. Neil Abercrombie (D-Hawaii), a senior member of the House Armed Services Committee, characterized the Iraq Study Group report as "theater" and "devoid of any basis in reality" because it offers what he considers overly ambitious plans that almost certainly cannot be carried out.

"The practical realities of these empty recommendations will be clear when we try to implement any of this stuff," Abercrombie said in an interview.

Senators Question Iraq Panel's Blueprint (AP)

By Robert Burns

AP, December 7, 2006

Senators sharply questioned an Iraq commission's call for a new U.S. war strategy Thursday, saying the Bush administration and Congress must work urgently together to find a more effective approach.

Sen. John McCain, R-Ariz., a 2008 presidential hopeful, took strong issue with the commission's call for phasing out the U.S. combat role in Iraq by 2008 and focusing instead more on training and advising the Iraqi army. He rejected the idea that the Army and Marines cannot spare more combat forces for Iraq duty.

"There's only one thing worse than an over-stressed Army and Marine Corps, and that's a defeated Army and Marine Corps," said McCain, a Vietnam veteran who will become the ranking Republican on the Senate Armed Services Committee when the Democrats take control of both houses of Congress in January.

"I believe this is a recipe that will lead to our defeat sooner or later in Iraq," McCain added.

One of the commission's co-chairmen, former Rep. Lee Hamilton, D-Ind., underscored the urgency of changing course in Iraq, where conditions were described as grave and deteriorating. He was asked at what point the situation there, if not corrected, would be hopeless.

"Well, there certainly is that point, and we're perilously close to that point," he replied.

Hamilton and his co-chairman, former Secretary of State James A. Baker III, testified before the Senate committee one day after delivering their report. Hamilton said that a new, more realistic and practical approach is needed.

"That's a very tough policy problem, and in order for this to happen, it can't be pie in the sky, it can't be idealistic, it has to be pragmatic," he said. Later, he added, "We reject the idea that the situation is hopeless."

Most senators broadly endorsed the commission's report, which made 79 recommendations for policy changes. Their skepticism focused mainly on two of the recommendations: a diplomatic approach to Iran and Syria, and an acceleration of the U.S. military's work to train and advise Iraqi forces.

Hamilton said it was essential for the White House and Congress to work together on this, and he criticized lawmakers for not having taken a stronger role in overseeing the Bush administration's war policies.

Many in Congress have praised the group's report, which was eight months in the making.

Sen. Hillary Rodham Clinton, D-N.Y., said the key question now is whether Bush will effectively implement a new policy.

"We need the White House to become the `Iraq Results Group,' " she said.

Baker said Congress could play a key role in that regard.

"If the Congress would come together behind supporting -- let's say utopianly -- all of the recommendations of this report, that would do a lot toward moving things downtown," Baker told the committee.

As the pair appeared on Capitol Hill, Bush met at the White House with British Prime Minister Tony Blair, a key Bush ally in Iraq. Speaking to reporters, Bush referred to this as a "difficult moment for America and Great Britain."

Bush has called Iraq the central front in the war on terrorism. Asked by Sen. Lindsey Graham, R-S.C., whether he agreed, Baker replied, "It may not have been when we first went in but it certainly is now."

Hamilton added, "I would strike the word 'the' and use the word 'a'. To make it 'the' central front overstates it."

Sen. Joseph Lieberman, D-Conn., and Sen. Susan Collins, R-Maine, both said they are skeptical about another of the commission's key recommendations: that the administration approach Iran in search of help in stabilizing Iraq, as part of a regional diplomatic initiative.

"I'm skeptical that it's realistic to think that Iran wants to help the United States succeed in Iraq," Lieberman said.

Baker acknowledged that the Iranians were unlikely to help, even if asked. He said that during the course of the commission's discussions an Iranian official told him that Iran was not inclined to help.

But Baker said he saw no harm in approaching Iran anyway, and if it declines to help, "then we will hold them up to public scrutiny as the rejectionist state they have proven to be."

Hamilton said that while Iran has been unhelpful to U.S. interests in Iraq thus far, "We do not think it's in the Iranian interest for the American policy to fail completely, and to lead to chaos in that country." He said the Iranian's main worry is that a chaotic Iraq would lead to a refugee crisis on its border.

McCain also questioned the wisdom of the group's recommendation that many more U.S. troops be placed inside Iraqi combat units to advise and train them on the battlefield. He said this was too dangerous.

Hamilton acknowledged that it was risky but said there would be combat forces available to protect the trainers and adviser. He added that it was the group's consensus view that this approach was necessary in order to phase out the U.S. combat role and accelerate the building of competent Iraqi security forces.

"But there is no blinking the fact that that's a risky mission and a difficult mission and we should not slide over it as you have not in your comments," Hamilton said.

The study panel's 96-page report said flatly that the administration's approach was not working and recommended that the U.S. military accelerate a change in its main mission so that most combat troops can be withdrawn by spring 2008.

Senators Question Baker, Hamilton On Panel Findings (LAT)

By Joel Havemann

The Los Angeles Times, December 8, 2006

WASHINGTON — Members of the Senate Armed Services Committee signaled a looming battle with President Bush over his Iraq policy today by giving a warm welcome to the co-chairmen of the Iraq Study Group, whose report a day earlier warned that the administration's policies have set off a "slide toward chaos" in Iraq.

Backing from a key congressional committee figured to raise pressure on the president to treat the study group's recommendations seriously. Further suggesting conflict between the administration and Congress, Bush denied shortly after today's Senate hearing that his Iraq policy is failing.

Sen. Carl Levin (D-Mich.), who is in line to become chairman of the Armed Services Committee next month, said the bipartisan report signaled "the end of the administration's stay-the-course policy and the beginning of the development of a new, realistic, bipartisan and hopefully successful approach."

The 10-member commission — half Republicans, half Democrats — unanimously endorsed 79 recommendations that would require the administration to reverse its fundamental approach to Iraq. U.S. combat forces would give way to trainers and advisors embedded in Iraqi units by early 2008, and the United States would promote regional peace talks that would include Iran and Syria, two countries that are anathema to Bush.

The panel said the continuing deterioration in Iraq could embroil the entire Middle East in a war that would further curtail U.S. influence throughout the world.

"The current approach is not working, and the ability of the United States to influence events is diminishing," said former Rep. Lee H. Hamilton (D-Ind.), who led the Iraq Study Group with former Secretary of State James A. Baker III. "Many Americans are understandably dissatisfied. Our ship of state has hit rough waters. It must now chart a new way forward," Hamilton said.

While Bush disputed the report's premise that his policy in Iraq is failing — he conceded only that "I am disappointed in the pace of success" — most Armed Services Committee members accepted it as a necessary condition of changing that policy.

Hamilton was more critical of Congress than the committee was of him and his study group. Although he acknowledged that "the report that we put before you must largely by implemented by the executive branch," he said Congress had not done its job of overseeing the administration's conduct of the war.

"I think the Congress has been extraordinarily timid in its exercise of its constitutional responsibilities on the question of war-making and conducting war," he said.

"The options before you are not very good," Hamilton conceded. He said the commission's report — while no guarantee — offered the best chance of restoring peace to Iraq.

Sen. John McCain (R-Ariz.) sounded one discordant note when he challenged the commission's conclusion that the United States could not impose peace on Iraq because it did not have the 100,000 additional troops that might be necessary.

He called this conclusion "dispiriting," adding, "It should alarm us that we don't have enough troops to surge in Iraq."

Both McCain and Sen. Susan Collins (R-Me.) wondered whether U.S. combat troops could provide the necessary protection to the trainers and advisors who would be embedded in Iraqi forces.

Hamilton said a residual U.S. combat force would remain strictly to protect the trainers and advisers. But he acknowledged that "when you put these men into Iraqi units, they're very exposed."

Collins joined Sen. Joe Lieberman (D-Conn.) in questioning the advisability of including Iran and Syria in regional peace talks because both countries are supporting terrorists in Iraq and are dedicated to eliminating Israel.

"I'm skeptical that it's realistic to think that Iran wants to help the United States succeed in Iraq," Lieberman said.

Baker replied that the United States gained Iran's help in overthrowing the Taliban regime in Afghanistan. Iraq, he said, is a different case. "If we can't do it, we can't do it, but we don't lose a darn thing by trying."

As for Syria, Baker said that as secretary of State to President George H. W. Bush he made 15 trips there in the early 1990s, "and we made them change 25 years of policy."

Iraq Report's Proposals Split Congress (FT)

By Demetri Sevastopulo

Financial Times, December 8, 2006

Key lawmakers were divided over Iraq policy yesterday following the publication of the Iraq Study Group report, with Senator John McCain calling its recommendations a recipe for failure.

While senators on the influential armed services committee welcomed the efforts of James Baker, the former secretary of state, and Lee Hamilton, the former Democratic congressman, they showed that consensus over Iraq may be difficult to achieve.

Mr McCain, the Republican frontrunner for the 2008 presidential election, who has called on Mr Bush to increase troop levels in Iraq, expressed strong reser- vations about the ISG's proposal to start reducing combat troops.

The study group report recommended that the Pentagon shift its mission to training Iraqi security forces in a manner that would allow the US to withdraw most combat forces from Iraq by early 2008. Mr Baker and Mr Hamilton told the Senate armed services committee that the 10 commissioners on the ISG, which was created by Congress, had been advised by most experts that the US did not have the military resources to sustain a large increase in troops in Iraq.

"I want to tell you something that I know that you know. There's only one thing worse than an overstressed army and marine corps, and that's a defeated army and marine corps," said Mr McCain, who becomes the top Republican on the committee next month. "We saw that in 1973. And I believe that this is a recipe that will lead to, sooner or later, our defeat in Iraq."

Carl Levin, the Michigan Democrat who will become committee chairman next month, said the report underscored the message he has been sending to Mr Bush to tell the Iraqi government the US would start to withdraw troops within six months. Mr Hamilton told the committee the ISG thought increasing troops, other than a short-term surge to improve security in Baghdad, would be counterproductive.

"One of the things we kept asking ourselves repeatedly through our discussions was what kind of leverage you could assert on the Iraqi government," said Mr Hamilton. "Well, we believe that the troop level question is one point of leverage. And we have to say to those folks that we're just not going to be there indefinitely. There are limits to the American patience. There are limits to American resources."

Mr Hamilton and Mr Baker appeared to dismiss a key tenet of Mr Bush's initial justification for the war in Iraq, that the country was the central front in the "war on terror". Mr Baker said: "It may not have been when we first went in but it certainly is now."

Mr Hamilton was even stronger, saying: "I would strike the word 'the' and use 'a' - it is a central front. Look, al-Qaeda today is an important part of the violence, but not as important as sectarian violence. It is a central front in the war on terror. But to make it the central front overstates it."

Robert Gates, the incoming sec-retary of defence, told the same committee this week that he believed Iraq was only one of the central fronts in the "war on terror". In contrast to Mr Levin, who welcomed the report as an indictment of Bush administration policy, Joe Lieberman, the hawkish Democrat senator from Connecticut, said the ISG proposals broadly mirrored current administration proposals.

While some senators agreed with the ISG recommendation to create a new diplomatic initiative in the Middle East, others, including Mr McCain and Susan Collins, the Maine Republican, questioned whether talking to Iran and Syria could work.

Hillary Clinton, the New York senator who is the perceived Demo-crat frontrunner for the 2008 presidential race, said: "We've now heard from the Iraq Study Group but we need the White House to become the Iraq results group."

Democrats React Warily To The Baker Report (TIME)

By Douglas Waller

Time, December 7, 2006

With the Bush administration on the defensive in the wake of the strong critique of its Iraq policies by the Iraq Study Group, the Democrats might be expected to be cheering. But key Democrats in Congress are keeping their distance from the report. Critics of the war opponents obviously liked the report's stark portrayal of the deteriorating situation in Iraq and its blunt assessment of failed Bush administration policies there. But while seeking to "pivot off that to put it squarely back in the lap of the President to propose a way forward in Iraq," in the words of one senior Democratic aide, "there's definitely a sense of wariness up here on Capitol Hill."

Take Nancy Pelosi, the future House Speaker. While one of the fiercest congressional critics of Bush and the war, she promised only that her party would give the report's recommendations "full consideration" — not its stamp of approval. Pelosi has been leery of the commission from the start, because she had no hand in picking its Democratic members. Normally legislation setting up such blue- ribbon panels has a clause specifying that congressional Democratic and Republican leaders will have a hand in picking members. But the measure creating this panel, sponsored by GOP Congressman Frank Wolf, left those choices up to the co-chairs, former Secretary of State James Baker and former Indiana Rep. Lee Hamilton. Pelosi "didn't think the commission was constituted properly," says a friend. "That annoyed her."

Other key Democrats are disappointed that the commission's recommendations didn't go as far as they might have. Sen. Carl Levin, who will take over the Senate Armed Services Committee, praised the report for proposing a "comprehensive plan for a change in course, including calling for an end to the open-ended commitment of American troops as a way of pressing the Iraqis to take responsibility for their own future." But he was disappointed the commission didn't specify a timetable for U.S. troop withdrawals — which he wants to begin in four to six months.

Another key chairman-to-be, Joseph Biden, who will take over the Foreign Relations Committee in January, was miffed that the commission dismissed his proposal to federalize Iraq, setting up Shiite, Sunni and Kurdish regions run by largely autonomous governments. Shortly after the 96-page report's public release, Biden issued a lengthy critique of its recommendations. The changes the commission proposed, Biden complained, "are necessary, but not sufficient to achieve the objective most Americans share: to leave Iraq without leaving chaos behind." The commission's proposal to beef up U.S. military trainers embedded in Iraqi units while withdrawing U.S. combat troops "is not, by itself, a plan." There has to be "a sustainable political settlement" as well, said Biden.

Baker and Hamilton also faced a grilling at a Senate Armed Services Committee hearing Thursday, where Connecticut Democratic Sen. Joseph Lieberman and Maine Republican Sen. Susan Collins questioned one of their key recommendations: to open a diplomatic dialogue with Iran. "I'm skeptical that it's realistic to think that Iran wants to help the United States succeed in Iraq," Lieberman said.

Congressional Democrats are cautioning that the report will be just one of many recommendations that will influence them when they control Congress next year. "The ISG report is relevant today, but I don't know whether it will be in a month and a half when we take over," says another senior Democratic leadership aide. "Things in Iraq could change. The trend lines could be worse."

If the Democrats are trying to distance themselves from the report, Republicans are taking an even more careful wait-and-see attitude. Save for Sen. John McCain — who sharply criticized the report because it didn't endorse his call for more U.S. troops in Iraq — most Hill Republicans issued bland statements praising the report, then ducked for cover. Texas GOP Sen. John Cornyn said he hoped the report would enable Republicans and Democrats to "set any partisan rancor aside and reach a bipartisan solution to this critical issue." "The feeling on our side is that report seems pretty reasonable," a senior House GOP aide told TIME. "It requires some heavy lifting, but it doesn't ask the Bush administration to bend over backwards."

The Republicans' reluctance to criticize the report is understandable. Many Republicans in both the Senate and House believe they're now in the minority because of the failed war — and Bush's refusal to fire Defense Secretary Donald Rumsfeld until after the November elections, instead of before, when the move might have saved some of their seats. "Iraq is the anchor around the administration's ankle," says a senior GOP aide. "A lot of our guys are going to let the Administration take the heat."

Hyde Leaving Congress With Mixed Feelings (USAT)

By Kathy Kiely

USA Today, December 8, 2006

WASHINGTON — The retiring Republican chairman of the House International Relations Committee on Thursday delivered a blunt description of the challenge facing U.S. policymakers on Iraq.

"We need to find a way to get out of Iraq that doesn't cover us with dishonor," Rep. Henry Hyde, R-Ill., said in an interview with USA TODAY.

Hyde, 82, is the longest-serving of the 50 House members who will leave Congress at the end of this week; he is one of 11 who did not seek re-election; 23 were defeated and 16 sought higher office.

A conservative icon with a razor tongue and an impish sense of humor, Hyde was involved in several controversies during his 32 years in the House of Representatives, including President Clinton's impeachment.

Yet Rep. Rahm Emanuel, an Illinois Democrat who was a top aide to Clinton, said of Hyde, "I will miss his humor."

So will Rep. Jesse Jackson Jr., another Chicago Democrat. Jackson said he was "the left wing and Chairman Hyde was the right wing" in their joint effort to win funding for a third Chicago airport.

"It will be impossible to replace Henry Hyde's great sense of humor, towering intellect and dedication to public service," Jackson said.

Hyde wraps up his career with a mixture of affection and exasperation. On the one hand, Hyde said, Congress "is a great institution. I really mean that."

On the other, he's appalled by the complacency and corruption he said cost his party their House majority. "We Republicans handed the election to Democrats," he said. "I don't blame Americans for being angry."

Hyde's career was marked by his efforts to end legalized abortion. The "Hyde amendment," first passed in 1976, bans the use of federal funds for abortions, a policy that prevents poor women from using Medicaid funds to terminate their pregnancies. Hyde makes no apologies: "I hope I've saved a few lives."

Hyde's role as an anti-abortion crusader was "accidental," he said.

He "never thought about the issue," he said, until a colleague in the Illinois Legislature asked him to co-sponsor a bill that would liberalize the state's abortion laws. Before agreeing, Hyde decided to research the topic. "I became convinced abortion was an evil," he said.

Hyde's other brush with national fame and embarrassment came during Clinton's impeachment in 1998. As chairman of the Judiciary Committee, Hyde had a central role in prosecuting the trial, during which it was revealed that Hyde had an extramarital affair 30 years before. He called it "a youthful indiscretion."

"Clinton and his handlers did a wonderful job in shifting the focus to sex," Hyde said of the case. "It wasn't about sex. It was about perjury and the rule of law."

Hyde, who said he might write a book about the impeachment trial, said the Senate did not give the House prosecution team a chance to present its best case. He said he should have insisted on cross-examining Clinton and Monica Lewinsky, the White House intern with whom the president had an affair, before the Senate. "I wasn't obstreperous enough," he said.

Some of Hyde's votes might appear inconsistent with his reputation as a strict conservative.

In 2003, he helped negotiate a deal committing the United States to spending $15 million for AIDS eradication and treatment. He was also chief sponsor of the Family and Medical Leave Act. Hyde said he became convinced of the need for it while shuttling between work and the bedside of his wife, who died in 1992 of ovarian cancer. "It was personal," he said.

Hyde worries the "maelstrom of hate and venom heaped upon public servants" in today's politics will discourage Americans from entering the fray. Even so, he'd do it all over again. "In a heartbeat," the congressman said. "It will be hard to walk away from here."

Beltway Bloodshed (WSJ)

By Daniel Henninger

The Wall Street Journal, December 8, 2006

Notwithstanding its 79 recommendations for "the way forward," the Iraq Study Group's primary purpose wasn't saving Iraq from catastrophe but saving the political system of the United States from catastrophe.

The commission's two chairs, Jim Baker and Lee Hamilton, make this explicit in the report's first pages. "U.S. foreign policy is doomed to failure . . . if it is not supported by a broad, sustained consensus." Leon Panetta, a Democrat in the House from 1977 to 1993, said at their news conference, "This country cannot be at war and be as divided as it is today."

These are essentially restatements of GOP Sen. Arthur Vandenberg's 1952 dictum amid the Truman presidency that "politics stops at the water's edge." More than a sentiment, Vandenberg's point was, as he put it, "to unite our official voice at the water's edge so that America speaks with maximum authority against those who would divide and conquer us." For the past three years, we have had the opposite -- a domestic political war waged relentlessly at the water's edge.

Now comes the ISG report, and based on the Beltway reaction to it, one has to wonder whether the call yesterday for unity and bipartisanship by Messrs. Baker, Hamilton, Panetta and former Sen. Alan Simpson was disingenuous or naïve. Washington took their study and went completely over the edge. The morning-after press reporting on the Baker-Hamilton report can only be described as neurotic glee. Over endless columns, reporters ransacked their thesauruses for words to unload pent-up antipathy toward the Bush White House: failed, repudiated, dire, abject failure, deeply pessimistic, disdain, replete with damning details, a rebuke, a remarkable condemnation.

For the Bush opposition and its beliefs, this White House has become the most odious and illegitimate presidency (the disputed 2000 Florida result) of the last century. Opposing it became a moral imperative. We can pinpoint the moment the Vandenberg ethos died. It was when one Democratic senator, Joe Lieberman, tried to bridge the partisan divide. He was culled from the party herd, shunned and left for dead by his oldest friends in the Senate.

Note that the ISG report at no point includes the words Guantanamo, warrantless wiretaps, Swift surveillance, secret prisons or the Patriot Act. These are the Bush policies in the war on terror, presumably the war "we all support." And they are the names of the most famous Washington battlefields of recent years. All this, like Iraq, has been repudiated, denounced and condemned as a moral violation.

This bloodbath at the water's edge has produced a divided, bitter nation. The American people are dispirited and depressed, even after the election. An AP/Ipsos poll taken the week after the November vote showed Congress's ratings fell, to 26%, 10 points below the president's in the same poll. It looks like the voters have replaced the traditional post-election honeymoon with a political prenuptial agreement. * * *

Before this Sunday's talk shows use the Baker-Hamilton bulldozer to bury alive the Bush Doctrine and the "neoconservatives," let us suggest there is an alternative version of the Iraq narrative -- one that is less a collapse of doctrine than simply the result of bad, possibly fatal, decisions the administration made in 2003.

The years 2003-2005 don't exist in the ISG study, which is almost wholly about the horrors of the past year. But in the war's immediate aftermath, from May 2003 onward, Baghdad was rebuilding, notwithstanding continued violence. Retail commerce came to life. A strong real-estate market emerged. New cars filled the streets, and Iraq's universities reopened. But it was also in May that someone in the Bush administration made the worst decision of the war, as described on this page in June by Iraqi Foreign Minister Hoshyar Zebari in an interview with our Robert Pollock.

"The biggest mistake, honestly, if you go back," said Mr. Zebari, "was not entrusting the Iraqis as partners, to empower them, to see them do their part, to fill the vacuum, to have a national unity government."

The opportunity existed at that moment to form an Iraqi unity government, likely consisting of the religious Shiites Ibrahim al-Jaafari and Abdul Aziz al-Hakim, the Sunni Adnan Pachachi, Kurdish leaders Massoud Barzani and Jalal Talabani, and secular Shiites Ahmed Chalabi and Ayad Allawi.

Instead, someone in Washington (it has never been clear exactly who) decided to push them aside in favor of the U.S.-led Coalition Provisional Authority. This was fatal because for two years, until last December's election, Iraqis had nothing -- other than tribes, sects and militias -- to commit themselves to politically.

Recall how over that period the insurgents repeatedly targeted police stations and police recruits. They knew that a functioning police posed the greatest danger to their plans to reduce Baghdad to a brutal anarchy that would drain the spirit of both Iraqis and Americans. It worked. For two years there was no "Iraqi" entity for their police to fight and die for.

Certainly opinions can differ on whether these Iraqi leaders in 2003 could have achieved the vaunted "national reconciliation" at the heart of the ISG report. But it is a more plausible, discrete explanation of what went wrong than the preposterously exaggerated celebration (there is no other word) of total American "failure" emanating from the Baker-Hamilton report now.

In short order, the Iraq story will enter 2008's presidential politics. To his credit, John McCain distanced himself from the report, which has turned into an unedifying pig-wallow for one swath of our political culture. The Washington Post yesterday reported that Democratic congressional aides say they'll make sure Mr. Bush still "owns" the Iraq war so he gets tagged if Baker-Hamilton fails.

Leon Panetta is already getting an answer to his belief that a divided nation cannot be at war. Oh yes it can -- if defeating the enemy at home is more important than defeating the enemy abroad.

A New Chief At The Pentagon (CSM)

By Peter Grier

The Christian Science Monitor, December 8, 2006

After Secretary of Defense-designate Robert Gates assumes his new post later this month, he may find it hard to alter US military weapons programs or the structure of US forces. In essence, the Pentagon is a huge ship that changes direction slowly - and the Bush administration has only two years left to run.

Nor will US options in Iraq change magically when he is sworn in 10 days from now. Dr. Gates brings with him no secret ideas that the Iraq Study Group or other strategic reviews may have missed.

Yet the moment Gates steps into his expansive new office in the Pentagon's outer "E" ring, he could have a profound effect on Washington. The reason: He's not Donald Rumsfeld. As a low-key figure whose nomination met with approval among both Democrats and Republicans, Gates might find it easier than his predecessor would have to shape a more bipartisan approach to Iraq and the overall war on terrorism.

"Is there anybody who doesn't think he's a good choice?" says James Jay Carafano, a senior fellow in national security at the Heritage Foundation. "It's an enormous opportunity to get the politics out of this."

What may change immediately after Gates takes up his post is the atmosphere in the Pentagon's top echelons.

Rumsfeld famously challenged the military bureaucracy, issuing memos, requests for information, and other internal documents with a blizzardlike intensity. By way of contrast, cannonades of paperwork don't appear to be part of Gates's bureaucratic style.

Throughout his Senate confirmation hearing on Tuesday, Gates emphasized that he would have a lot of listening to do in the early stages of his new job. He'd have to consult with military commanders, he said, before deciding what should be done in Iraq.

But with his clipped answer of "no" to a question as to whether the US is winning in Iraq, Gates made it clear that he agreed with the Iraq Study Group that the current approach is not working.

"I do think he feels that Iraq is a catastrophe, and he is there to try and do something about that," says Gary Sick, executive director of the Gulf 2000 project at Columbia University, who worked with Gates in the Ford and Carter administrations. "I think he's getting ready to really do battle."

Gates is a pragmatist, not an ideologue, says his former colleague. That was clear when the incoming secretary of Defense indicated during his hearing that any US military action against Syria or Iran would be highly unlikely, says Mr. Sick. "To me, that's a different brand of political action" than that espoused by the neoconservatives who urged the invasion of Iraq, he says.

In calling for a unified approach to Iraq policy, Gates struck the right note, says Dr. Carafano.

Also important were Gates's insistence on the need for continued big defense budgets, and his support for missile defense, Carafano adds.

But when it comes to actually allocating money to priorities, Gates won't have much time to make changes. There are only two budget cycles left to prepare before the next administration takes office. Furthermore, next year's budget has largely been drawn up. The last budget in an administration is often a slapdash exercise, due to political concerns.

"Practically, is there much that Gates can really do differently?", says Carafano. "No, not really."

But if nothing else, Gates has managed the rare feat of becoming less controversial over time, at least in terms of Senate confirmation struggles.

· In 1987, Gates was nominated to head the Central Intelligence Agency by President Ronald Reagan, but withdrew from consideration after it became clear that the Senate would reject him due to controversy over his role in aspects of the Iran-contra affair, a clandestine arrangement in the 1980s that gave money to Nicaraguan contra rebels from profits gained through selling weapons to Iran.

DOJ_NMG_0103955

· In 1991, Gates was again tapped to head the CIA, this time by President George H.W. Bush. He won Senate approval after months of hearings. Thirty-one Democrats voted against him.

· In 2006, Gates's nomination to head the Pentagon was subjected to one day of hearings before the Senate Armed Services Committee. The panel Tuesday approved the posting unanimously. On Wednesday, the full Senate slid Gates through, confirming him by the lopsided vote of 95 to 2.

Some Democrats who voted against Gates in 1991 voted for him this time - notably, Sen. Carl Levin of Michigan, the incoming chairman of the Senate Armed Services Committee, and Sen. Edward Kennedy of Massachusetts. The senators who voted against him were Republicans normally supportive of the administration - Sen. Rick Santorum of Pennsylvania, who lost his reelection bid last month, and Sen. Jim Bunning of Kentucky.

"Mr. Gates has repeatedly criticized our efforts in Iraq and Afghanistan without providing any viable solutions to the problems our troops currently face," said Senator Bunning, explaining his "no" vote.

According to the White House, Gates will not be sworn in until Dec. 18 due to commitments in his current job as president of Texas A&M University.

Robert Gates Resigns From Brinker Board (AP)

AP, December 7, 2006

DALLAS (AP) -- Brinker International Inc., which operates the Chili's, Macaroni Grill, Maggiano's and On the Border restaurant chains, said Robert Gates resigned from its board after he was confirmed today by the Senate as the nation's new Defense Secretary.

Brinker said Gates had served on its board since 2003, and was a member of its audit, governance and nominating committees.

The company said it will start looking for a replacement immediately.

Shares of Brinker fell 8 cents to close at $30.18 on the New York Stock Exchange.

U.S. Commanders Advance Plan To Beef Up Training Of Iraqi Army (WSJ)

By Greg Jaffe, Neil King

The Wall Street Journal, December 8, 2006

WASHINGTON -- Senior U.S. military commanders in Baghdad, eager to shift the fight in Iraq to that country's army, are advancing a plan that could more than double the number of American troops involved in training Iraqi soldiers.

The tentative plan, which calls for breaking up some big U.S. combat units into military-training teams, reflects a major shift in U.S. tactics, and meshes with one of the key recommendations of a high-profile report released Wednesday by the bipartisan Iraq Study Group.

The new approach isn't expected to require a marked change in the overall number of American troops in Iraq. But it would increase the number involved in advisory roles to as many as 10,000, from the current 4,000, senior military officials said.

The plan, drawn up over the past two months, reflects the growing belief among U.S. officials that the Iraqi army is the only truly national institution that exists in an increasingly fractured country, and thus is the best hope not only to provide security, but also to hold Iraq together.

Though it hasn't received formal approval by top U.S. military officials in Iraq, the plan could be presented to incoming Defense Secretary Robert Gates when he visits Baghdad in the coming weeks, a senior military official said. Whether to implement the plan could be one of the first big decisions Mr. Gates makes in his new job. Though he has been confirmed by the Senate, Mr. Gates won't officially start work until Dec. 18.

Senior military officials are betting that larger U.S. military training teams that would live and work with Iraqi units could speed the development of an Iraqi army force that has shown some promise, but is still bedeviled by corruption, absenteeism and logistical problems. How quickly the Iraqi army improves could ultimately determine how quickly U.S. troops could withdraw from the country.

However, even the staunchest advocates of building up the Iraqi army warn that the strategy carries significant risks that could derail it. In the near term, commanders say, shifting more U.S. troops into training and advisory jobs could lead to an increase in sectarian violence in Baghdad, because there would be fewer U.S. troops patrolling the streets. Iraqi army units and their U.S. trainers would have to pick up the slack.

The idea of shifting more U.S. troops into training roles has been kicking around in Baghdad and the Pentagon at least since spring. Multiple internal studies by the U.S. Army have concluded that its current training teams in Iraq, typically 10 to 12 U.S. soldiers per an Iraqi battalion, are too small to be effective.

But this summer, with sectarian violence rising in Baghdad, U.S. military commanders chose instead to concentrate U.S. troops in the capital. The hope was that they could stem the rising chaos and help the weak Iraqi government, led by Prime Minister Nouri al-Maliki, to build support among the Iraqi people.

By late October, however, it was clear the crackdown wasn't working. With American patience running thin, commanders began considering an expedited effort to build up the Iraqi military, which is made up of nearly 135,000 troops. In recent months, senior Iraqi officials have also started to press U.S. officials to speed up the development of Iraqi army forces.

Under the plan, some big U.S. units would be broken into teams of 20 to 25 men to train and advise Iraqi army forces and some border guards and police units. The remaining U.S. troops in Iraq would focus on more traditional missions, such as backing up Iraqi army units, conducting patrols, and working on local reconstruction projects. The U.S. military currently has about 15 combat brigades in Iraq, each with about 3,000 to 5,000 troops.

With the U.S. midterm elections over and a new defense secretary taking over in Washington, the plan isn't the only one in the works aimed at turning the tide of violence in Iraq. It comes as Gen. Peter Pace, chairman of the Joint Chiefs of Staff, is preparing his own recommendations to President Bush on how to move forward militarily. His report is likely to be wrapped up by late December.

Mr. Bush has said he would be particularly receptive to whatever advice his military commanders in the Pentagon and in Iraq offer in coming weeks.

After meeting yesterday with British Prime Minister Tony Blair, Mr. Bush called the Iraq Study Group's report, which offered up a strong rebuke of his Iraq policy, "worthy of serious study," but didn't endorse any of its recommendations.

The study group, led by former Secretary of State James Baker III and former Democratic Rep. Lee Hamilton, called for the withdrawal of the majority of U.S. combat troops by March 2008, as well as for far-reaching changes in U.S. policy across the Middle East.

The group, which recommended tripling or quadrupling the size of the U.S. training teams at the expense of larger U.S. combat forces, raised deep concerns about the Iraqi army's ability to hold Baghdad together. "Can I assure anyone that we won't end up training an Iraqi army that ends up fighting others or turns against itself?" asked Former Defense Secretary William Perry, the top military expert in the group. "No, I can't."

But Mr. Perry said in an interview that the U.S. had no choice but to turn to the rudiments of an army in Iraq as the best hope for a long-term solution. "The only truly national institution in Iraq is the Iraqi army," he said. Mr. Perry described the panel's robust recommendation for "embedding" significant numbers of U.S. troops into all Iraqi units as a form of "supervised on-the-job training."

A big concern with the plan is how to protect U.S. soldiers serving on advisory and training teams. These troops would be prime targets for insurgents and sectarian militias seeking to stymie the progress of Iraqi units. They would also be vulnerable if their Iraqi units were overrun by the enemy.

Senior U.S. military commanders also warn that without progress on rebuilding Iraq's economy and without a political accommodation between Iraq's Shiites and Sunnis, no military force will be able to impose order in the country. "The military cannot win this alone -- it's flat impossible," said one senior U.S. official.

U.S. training teams now live and focus on advising Iraqi battalion commanders, who each oversees about 500 troops, plus staff. Under the new plan, the expanded teams would spend more time with the lower-ranking commanders and their troops who do most of the day-to-day fighting and patrolling in Baghdad.

U.S. commanders say the larger teams would be better able to prevent abuses by the Iraqi units and ensure that they do their jobs properly. "Beefing up the training teams will give us a 24/7 presence in the Iraqi units that we haven't had so far," said a military official.

Some officers who have recently served on U.S. military training teams in Iraq praised the effort to focus more troops on the training mission. But they cautioned that this wouldn't fix many of the Iraqi army's biggest problems.

Many Iraqi units continue to be hamstrung by ineffective or corrupt commanders who have the support of key officials in Iraq's Ministry of Defense. "Right now we cannot even fire Iraqi army leaders [whom] we know cooperate with insurgents or are incompetent," said Lt. Col. David Coffey, who returned last month from Iraq, where he had served on a 10-man training team.

The supply system often fails to deliver Iraqi troops the fuel, food and bullets they need to carry out their missions. Several advisers said there is also pressure to inflate the capabilities of the Iraqi units in readiness reports. "There is tremendous pressure on the training teams to show steady progress in the abilities of the Iraqi battalions," Col. Coffey said. "This ignores the fact that many units actually get worse as key leaders are killed or go AWOL, as unit equipment degrades, as the enemy situation gets worse, or as combat operations prevent ongoing training."

The U.S. soldiers who make up the military training teams cannot order Iraqi commanders to carry out missions. Instead, their job is to advise, cajole and set a good example for their Iraqi counterparts. The teams help the Iraqi forces plan raids, set training schedules and get necessary supplies. They also act as a conduit to U.S. forces in the area.

The intense focus on the Iraqi army comes at a time when senior U.S. officials are growing increasingly disillusioned with the Iraqi police and the Iraqi Interior Ministry, which oversees them. Earlier this year, military commanders in Baghdad declared 2006 "the year of the police." In recent months, though, U.S. officials have come to see the Iraqi police as infiltrated by sectarian militias and increasingly part of the problem in Iraq. Police units in Baghdad and other cities have been implicated in sectarian killings and kidnappings.

Iraqi leaders seem to support the new focus on the Iraqi army. Iraqi Prime Minister Maliki has told senior U.S. commanders that he would like to increase the size of the Iraqi army by as many as 40,000 troops to about 170,000 soldiers. It isn't clear, however, that the Iraqi government has the resources to recruit, train and outfit a larger force right now, say senior U.S. military officials.

"Absolute dependence on foreign troops is not possible," Deputy Prime Minister Barham Saleh said on the Arab satellite television channel Al-Arabiya earlier this week. "The focus must be on boosting Iraqi security forces."

Intelligence Agencies "Must Do Better" (WP)

By Walter Pincus

The Washington Post, December 8, 2006

The U.S. intelligence community has failed to provide policymakers with a clear understanding of the Iraq insurgency, the role of militias or the level of violence in that country, according to the Iraq Study Group.

"Clearly U.S. intelligence agencies can and must do better," the group's report said, though it praises the gathering of day-to-day intelligence about enemy targets and notes that the gathering of information from human sources has improved.

"The quality of the intelligence has to be disappointing with regard to the insurgency," former representative Lee H. Hamilton (D-Ind.), co-chairman of the group, told reporters yesterday. "We are having a huge time, still, identifying the enemy."

The group singled out the lack of analysts experienced in insurgency with needed language skills, such as Arabic, as well as familiarity with Iraqi culture.

As an example, the report says the panel was told that fewer than 10 Defense Intelligence Agency analysts have more than two years' experience analyzing insurgencies, and that the rotation system of the military prevents development of experts. A DIA spokesman said yesterday that about 100 experienced analysts in Iraq and Washington work these issues. He questioned how the study group arrived at its conclusions.

The report also says the intelligence community's knowledge of militias, their leadership, financing and relationship to the government "falls far short of what policymakers need to know." U.S. military sources in Baghdad have identified at least 21 separate militias in that city alone.

The panel's report points out that the Mahdi Army, the militia of Moqtada al-Sadr, may get its support indirectly from the Iraqi government because some members are paid as guards in the Facilities Protection Service, which is on duty at the three Iraq ministries controlled by Sadr's political party.

Another issue raised in the report is why, after $2 billion has been appropriated this year to protect forces in Iraq, more is not being done to try "to understand the people who fabricate, plant and explode" roadside bombs, which are major killers of U.S. troops.

The group recommends that the director of national intelligence and the defense secretary put greater resources and analysts into understanding the sources of sectarian violence.

It also complains that databases underreport violence in Iraq, particularly when no U.S. personnel are involved. "A roadside bomb or a rocket or mortar attack that doesn't hurt U.S. doesn't count," the report says. It cites a day in July 2006 when 93 attacks were reported, yet a careful review showed that 1,100 acts of violence took place. Hamilton told reporters: "We certainly believe it has been grossly underreported. Why that is we don't really know."

The report recommends that the intelligence director and DIA change the collection of data "to provide a more accurate picture of events on the ground."

The CIA should also increase its personnel for training Iraqis and establish a counterterrorism intelligence center in Iraq that would coordinate all information and "facilitate intelligence-led police and military actions" against terrorist networks, the panel says.

Rep. Silvestre Reyes (D-Tex.), incoming chairman of the House Permanent Select Committee on Intelligence, said the report's findings are "troubling." He added that his first hearings will be "examining the state of intelligence support to our troops deployed in Iraq."

U.S. Troops Suffer Heavy Losses This Month In Iraq (USAT)

By Cesar G. Soriano And Matt Kelley

USA Today, December 8, 2006

BAGHDAD — A flare-up of fighting in Iraq, particularly in the western Anbar province where the Sunni insurgency is strong, has made the first week in December one of the deadliest in the war.

At least 32 U.S. troops have died in Iraq this month, according to the Defense Department. Eleven died Wednesday, the same day the Iraq Study Group in Washington released its 79 recommendations for policy changes in Iraq and the Middle East. Another soldier wounded Wednesday died Thursday, the military said.

Most of the deaths — at least 18 — were in Anbar province, a large stretch of desert west of Baghdad where U.S. and Iraqi forces have been unable to crush insurgents. Most of Anbar's residents are members of the Sunni Muslim minority that ruled Iraq for centuries before the 2003 U.S. invasion.

Military leaders, including the top U.S. commander in the region, Gen. John Abizaid, have said Anbar province is not under control. Robert Gates, in Senate hearings Wednesday before his confirmation as Defense secretary, said one of his top priorities would be addressing the violence there.

Ramadi, one of the largest cities in Anbar province, has been the site of some of the fiercest fighting. At least 10 U.S. troops have died in or around the city this month.

Fighting in Ramadi on Wednesday claimed the lives of six U.S. troops, including two Army soldiers and two Marines killed by a roadside bomb, a soldier shot to death while manning a machine gun nest and another soldier fatally wounded in a firefight with insurgents.

That shootout began when insurgents fired on U.S. and Iraqi troops from several directions, a military news release said. The forces responded with rifle and machine gun fire, tank rounds and unspecified precision-guided weapons. Several buildings used by the insurgents were destroyed.

Some insurgents had fired on the coalition troops from a mosque, but Iraqi troops who searched the mosque found nothing, the release said. The U.S. and Iraqi forces didn't fire heavy weapons at the mosque, the military said.

A soldier from the 1st Brigade of the Army's 1st Armored Division died Thursday from wounds suffered in that battle Wednesday.

Also Wednesday, five soldiers from the Army's 3rd Brigade Combat Team of the 25th Infantry Division died when a bomb hit their vehicle in or near the northern city of Kirkuk, the military said. That oil-rich city — a mix of Kurds, Sunni Arabs, Turkmen and other minorities — is a potential source of sectarian violence if Kurds push forward with plans to make it part of the semi-autonomous Kurdish region, the Iraq Study Group report said.

At least 2,919 American servicemembers have died since the war began in March 2003. In another grim milestone, the Pentagon announced that more than 22,000 U.S. troops have been wounded. A total 22,057 troops had been wounded as of Thursday, but the majority — 12,167 — returned to duty within 72 hours of being wounded, the military said.

The youngest troops killed this week were 19 years old: Lance Cpl. Jesse Tillery of Vesper, Wis., and Pfc. Ross McGinniss of Knox, Pa. The oldest was Maj. Joseph McCloud, 39, of Grosse Pointe Park, Mich.

At least 23 Iraqis died Thursday in a series of bombings and shootings, police said. Among the dead were a 7-year-old girl and two college professors. Baghdad police also found 35 bullet-riddled bodies.

Soriano reported from Baghdad and Kelley from Washington.

Wednesday's Toll For U.S. Troops In Iraq Rises To 11 (WP)

By Nancy Trejos

The Washington Post, December 8, 2006

BAGHDAD, Dec. 7 -- The U.S. military raised the number of service members killed Wednesday to 11, making it one of the deadliest days for U.S. troops this year.

Also, a soldier died Thursday from wounds suffered the day before in a battle in the volatile western province of Anbar.

The deaths bring to at least 31 the number of U.S. troops killed in the first week of December.

Civilian casualties also continued to mount Thursday, as 52 bodies were found across Baghdad in a 24-hour period, an Interior Ministry source said. All had gunshot wounds, nine had been beheaded and many bore signs of torture. Five of the victims were women, the source said.

Officials have attributed the surge in U.S. military deaths to stepped-up efforts to quell sectarian violence in Baghdad and a continuing campaign against insurgents in Anbar province.

On Thursday, the military released more details about the deaths. "It was a variety of events and a variety of operations," said Lt. Christopher C. Garver, a U.S. military spokesman.

Most of the casualties were in Anbar. Three soldiers from the 1st Armored Division, one Marine from the 1st Marine Expeditionary Force Headquarters Group and one Marine from the 15th Marine Expeditionary Force died of wounds suffered in enemy action. Another Marine from the 1st Marine Expeditionary Force died of nonhostile causes.

Five soldiers from the 25th Infantry Division were killed by a roadside bomb during combat operations in Kirkuk province, north of Baghdad, the military reported.

The soldier who died Thursday had been wounded in a battle Wednesday with suspected insurgents in Ramadi, the provincial capital of Anbar. Three service members were injured when the insurgents attacked them with small-arms fire from numerous buildings, including al-Haqq mosque. The U.S. troops, working with Iraqi soldiers, killed 14 insurgents and destroyed the buildings they had used as hiding places but did not fire on the mosque, the military said.

"While we are mindful to limit damage, we must respond with necessary and proportional force to protect our forces and Iraq from the insurgents," Marine Lt. Col. Bryan Salas said in a statement.

Roadside bombs killed several civilians and police officers in the capital, the Interior Ministry source said. One targeting a police patrol in northern Baghdad killed two officers and wounded three officers and three civilians.

Another bomb in southwestern Baghdad killed one civilian and wounded five. A third bomb targeting a U.S. patrol exploded in southern Baghdad, killing two civilians and injuring two passersby, the source said.

In Iskandariyah, about 30 miles south of Baghdad, police found the bodies of two people who had been tortured, handcuffed and shot in the head, said Capt. Muthana Ahmad, a spokesman for police forces in Babil province.

Iraqi and U.S. forces continued to conduct raids across the country.

Iraqi forces, with the help of American advisers, captured a senior leader of the insurgent group al-Qaeda in Iraq in Fallujah, the military reported.

In Baqubah, northeast of Baghdad, Iraqi troops captured eight suspected insurgents on Wednesday at an explosives factory containing more than a ton of TNT, said Iraqi army Maj. Gen. Shakir al-Kabi. Car bombs used in attacks in Kirkuk and Baghdad were made at the factory, Kabi said. Residents were temporarily evacuated while Iraqi forces destroyed the factory.

Also Thursday, former president Saddam Hussein's genocide trial continued with two prosecution witnesses, both medical doctors, describing chemical weapons attacks on Kurdish villages in 1987. Hussein and six other defendants are on trial for the so-called Anfal campaign, which prosecutors say resulted in the deaths of as many as 180,000 ethnic Kurds. The court adjourned until Dec. 18.

Saudis Reportedly Funding Iraqi Sunnis (AP)

By Salah Nasrawi

AP, December 8, 2006

Private Saudi citizens are giving millions of dollars to Sunni insurgents in Iraq and much of the money is used to buy weapons, including shoulder fired anti-aircraft missiles, according to key Iraqi officials and others familiar with the flow of cash.

Saudi government officials deny that any money from their country is being sent to Iraqis fighting the government and the U.S.-led coalition.

But the U.S. Iraq Study Group report said Saudis are a source of funding for Sunni Arab insurgents. Several truck drivers interviewed by The Associated Press described carrying boxes of cash from Saudi Arabia into Iraq, money they said was headed for insurgents.

Two high-ranking Iraqi officials, speaking on condition of anonymity because of the issue's sensitivity, told the AP most of the Saudi money comes from private donations, called zaqat, collected for Islamic causes and charities.

Some Saudis appear to know the money is headed to Iraq's insurgents, but others merely give it to clerics who channel it to anti-coalition forces, the officials said.

In one recent case, an Iraqi official said $25 million in Saudi money went to a top Iraqi Sunni cleric and was used to buy weapons, including Strela, a Russian shoulder-fired anti-aircraft missile. The missiles were purchased from someone in Romania, apparently through the black market, he said.

Overall, the Iraqi officials said, money has been pouring into Iraq from oil-rich Saudi Arabia, a Sunni bastion, since the U.S.-led invasion of Iraq toppled the Sunni-controlled regime of Saddam Hussein in 2003.

Saudi officials vehemently deny their country is a major source of financial support for the insurgents.

DOJ_NMG_0103960

"There isn't any organized terror finance, and we will not permit any such unorganized acts," said Brig. Gen. Mansour al-Turki, a spokesman for the Saudi Interior Ministry. About a year ago the Saudi government set up a unit to track any "suspicious financial operations," he said.

But the Iraq Study Group said "funding for the Sunni insurgency comes from private individuals within Saudi Arabia and other Gulf states."

Saudi officials say they cracked down on zakat abuses, under pressure from the United States, after the Sept. 11, 2001, attacks on New York and Washington.

The Iraqi officials, however, said some funding goes to Iraq's Sunni Arab political leadership, who then disburse it. Other money, they said, is funneled directly to insurgents. The distribution network includes Iraqi truck and bus drivers.

Several drivers interviewed by the AP in Middle East capitals said Saudis have been using religious events, like the hajj pilgrimage to Mecca and a smaller pilgrimage, as cover for illicit money transfers. Some money, they said, is carried into Iraq on buses with returning pilgrims.

"They sent boxes full of dollars and asked me to deliver them to certain addresses in Iraq," said one driver, who gave his name only as Hussein, out of fear of reprisal. "I know it is being sent to the resistance, and if I don't take it with me, they will kill me."

He was told what was in the boxes, he said, to ensure he hid the money from authorities at the border.

The two Iraqi officials would not name specific Iraqi Sunnis who have received money from Saudi Arabia. But Iraq issued an arrest warrant for Harith al-Dhari, a Sunni opponent of the Iraqi government, shortly after he visited Saudi Arabia in October. He was accused of sectarian incitement.

Saudi Arabia is a key U.S. ally in the Middle East. The Iraq Study Group report noted that its government has assisted the U.S. military with intelligence on Iraq.

But Saudi citizens have close tribal ties with Sunni Arabs in Iraq, and sympathize with their brethren in what they see as a fight for political control — and survival — with Iraq's Shiites.

The Saudi government is determined to curb the growing influence of its chief rival in the region, Iran. Tehran is closely linked to Shiite parties that dominate the Iraqi government.

Saudi officials say the kingdom has worked with all sides to reconcile Iraq's warring factions. They have, they point out, held talks in Saudi Arabia with Shiite cleric Muqtada al-Sadr, whose militia is accused of killing Sunnis.

These officials say zakat donations are now channeled through supervised bank accounts. Cash donation boxes, once prevalent in supermarkets and shopping malls, have been eliminated.

Still, Iraq's foreign minister expressed concern about the influence of neighboring Sunni states at a recent Arab foreign ministers meeting in Cairo.

"We hope that Saudi Arabia will keep the same distance from each and all Iraqi parties," Foreign Minister Hoshyar Zebari later told the AP.

Last month, the New York Times reported that a classified U.S. government report said Iraq's Sunni Arab insurgency had become self-sufficient financially, raising millions from oil smuggling, kidnapping and Islamic charities. The report did not say whether any money came from Saudi Arabia.

Allegations the insurgents have purchased shoulder-fired Strela missiles raise concerns that they are obtaining increasingly sophisticated weapons.

On Nov. 27, a U.S. Air Force F-16 jet crashed while flying in support of American soldiers fighting Anbar province, a Sunni insurgent hotbed. The U.S. military said it had no information about the cause of the crash. Gen. William Caldwell, a U.S. military spokesman, said he would be surprised if the jet was shot down because F-16's have not encountered weapons capable of taking them down in Iraq.

But last week, a spokesman for Saddam's ousted Baath party claimed that fighters armed with a Strela missile had shot down the jet.

"We have stockpiles of Strelas and we are going to surprise them (the Americans)," Khudair al-Murshidi, the spokesman told the AP in Damascus, Syria. He would not say how the Strelas were obtained.

Saddam's army had Strelas; it is not known how many survived the 2003 war. The Strela is a shoulder-fired, low-altitude system with a passive infrared guidance system.

The issue of Saudi funding for the insurgency could gain new prominence as the Bush administration reviews its Iraq policy, especially if it seeks to engage Iran and Syria in peace efforts.

Bush's national security adviser, Stephen Hadley, wrote in a recent leaked memo that Washington should "step up efforts to get Saudi Arabia to take a leadership role in supporting Iraq, by using its influence to move Sunni populations out of violence into politics."

DOJ_NMG_0103961

Last week, a Saudi who headed a security consulting group close to the Saudi government, Nawaf Obaid, wrote in the Washington Post that Saudi Arabia would use money, oil and support for Sunnis to thwart Iranian efforts to dominate Iraq if American troops pulled out. The Saudi government denied the report and fired Obaid.

Uneasy Havens Await Those Who Flee Iraq (NYT)

By Hassan M. Fattah

The New York Times, December 8, 2006

AMMAN, Jordan, Dec. 6 — Every day at dusk as the streets of this brooding city empty, people like Halima Reyahi scramble to become invisible again.

She sticks to side streets, her eyes scanning for the increasingly frequent police dragnets and checkpoints set up in search of illegal Iraqi immigrants like her. The loneliness of her exile is magnified by the fact that all four of her sons have been turned away repeatedly at the Jordanian border.

Ms. Reyahi is one of nearly two million Iraqis who have fled the vicious chaos of their country since the American invasion nearly four years ago, flooding neighboring states, especially Jordan and Syria, but also Lebanon and Egypt.

As they leave Iraq at a rate of nearly 3,000 a day, the refugees are threatening the social and economic fabric of both Jordan and Syria. In Jordan, hundreds of thousands of Iraqis are trying to blend into a country of only 6 million inhabitants, including about 1.5 million registered Palestinian refugees. The governments classify most of the Iraqis as visitors, not refugees.

The United Nations High Commissioner for Refugees estimated in a report released last month that more than 1.6 million Iraqis have left since March 2003, nearly 7 percent of the population. Jordanian security officials say more than 750,000 are in and around Amman, a city of 2.5 million. Syrian officials estimate that up to one million have gone to the suburbs of Damascus, a city of three million. An additional 150,000 have landed in Cairo. Every month, 100,000 more join them in Syria and Jordan, the report said.

In a report released this week, Refugees International, a Washington-based advocacy group, put the total at close to two million and called their flight "the fastest-growing humanitarian crisis in the world." Its president, Kenneth Bacon, said, "The United States and its allies sparked the current chaos in Iraq, but they are doing little to ease the humanitarian crisis caused by the current exodus."

Every night, hulking orange and white GMC Suburbans and sedans pull into the taxi garage in downtown Amman stuffed with Iraqis and their belongings, adding to the growing social problems they pose while fueling growing fears that Iraq's sectarian tensions will spill over here.

As Iraq seems to disintegrate into warring factions of Sunnis, Shiites and Kurds, the risk that their dispute will be transferred here and increase local social problems is frightening the authorities. As a result, restrictions on Iraqis have been tightened in Egypt, Syria and Jordan, which has been increasing patrols seeking to evict those who have overstayed their visas.

Most of the émigrés bring tales of horror and sadness. Ali Ghani, a onetime champion Iraqi body builder, said that his father had been grabbed from their house in Iraq, apparently because he was a Shiite; his body was later found in the street. Several other friends have met a similar fate, he said.

Partly as a result of such strife, refugees here claim, there is a growing sectarian dimension to the official crackdown. They say the authorities of this officially Sunni country have paid more attention to deporting Iraqi Shiites, fearing that their militias are trying to organize here.

"There is only disrespect for us now," said Qais Attiyeh, 36, a Shiite sculptor who says he has been granted refugee status in Amman. "And now I increasingly find Jordanians who ask me, 'Are you a Shiite or a Muslim?' " he said, referring to extremist Sunnis' rejection of Shiism as a branch of Islam.

"I read their facial expressions and tell them what they like to hear," he said.

Faris Braizat, a researcher at the Center for Strategic Studies at Jordan University, said, "It's becoming clear that with these kinds of numbers we are creating a massive problem further down the road." Jordanians, once proud of their Iraqi neighbors, have become unwilling to continue sacrificing for them, he said.

The first wave of Iraqis, mostly doctors, intellectuals and teachers, came here after the Persian Gulf war in 1991, escaping Saddam Hussein's Iraq. After the American invasion of 2003, a similarly wealthy wave of former government figures, businessmen and investors came here with billions of dollars that they soon began investing in real estate and businesses. Their arrival drove up prices but was also credited with helping the economy. As their numbers grew and much poorer people started to arrive, however, the problems began.

In particular, when Iraqi suicide bombers attacked three Amman hotels in 2005, this country's attitude toward Iraqis changed abruptly. The attack was organized by Al Qaeda in Mesopotamia, which was led by Abu Musab al-Zarqawi, a

Jordanian. Jordanian officials stepped up immigration enforcement, turning away many Iraqis at the border and making it harder for Iraqis to renew their visas.

It remains the case that those able to deposit $150,000 in Amman banks are granted residency almost instantly here. A few have also been sponsored by employers or have married Jordanian women. But the vast majority, poor and with few options, enter on visitor visas and soon become illegal, opening them up to exploitation and abuse.

Human Rights Watch called on the Jordanian government last week to grant Iraqis temporary protection and legalize their status. The group also called on the Jordanians to halt the deportation of Iraqis who registered for temporary protection and to admit asylum seekers, in addition to exempting Iraqis who registered their status from having to pay stiff fines.

Iraqis are increasingly blamed for Jordan's ills. Those with cash are blamed for doubling, and even tripling, property prices, as well as for buoying prices on everything from tomatoes to cigarettes. (Less attention has been paid to the broader market forces that led to the rise.)

The average price of a three-bedroom apartment in upscale West Amman has risen to up to $150,000 from about $50,000. Apartments that once rented for $400 now rent for $1,200, pricing out the average Jordanian, who earns between $500 and $750 per month.

Khaled Saeed, who owns a DVD shop in downtown Amman, was saving for years to buy an apartment near Amman's Sports City complex. He had his eye on one building where, just a few years ago, apartments sold for the equivalent of $35,000.

Then the Iraqis came, he said.

"When I finally came to buy it after some time, I found that the price had risen to 45,000 dinars," he said, amounting to almost $65,000. "So I've changed my mind about the Iraqis. Now I just wish they would leave so that life would go back to normal."

Late this summer the government loosened restrictions on private education for Iraqis without residency here, flooding Jordanian schools with new students. Principals have found themselves in the awkward position of telling families they have to go elsewhere.

Inflation, too, has doubled to 6 percent from about 3.5 percent in 2005, fueled in part by reduced subsidies on oil and gasoline, and by growing demand from Iraqis, economists say.

Many refugees say the crackdown has focused attention on Shiites, even as the government has hunted down Al Qaeda. Even before this, Shiite prayer halls, known as Husseiniyas, were strictly banned here. Security officials have been wary of Shiites seeking to organize and preach Shiite teachings. A prominent sheik representing Grand Ayatollah Ali al-Sistani of Iraq was deported late this summer.

In the Jordanian town of Muta, the site of a historic battle between Muslim and Byzantine armies, the shrine of the Shiite saint Jaffar al-Tayyar, a pilgrimage site, has come under particularly close scrutiny lately. Last week, security men crawled around the site, keeping an eye on the comings and goings of visitors.

Shiite pilgrims have been banned from sleeping overnight at the site and are now allowed to stay only briefly, a shop owner at the shrine said. Where thousands once came, the number of visitors has dropped markedly, he said, for fear of the security men, and his sales have plummeted.

Security men at the site said they were concerned about attacks against Shiites there, rather than trouble from the Shiites themselves.

Still many Shiites say they are increasingly bearing the brunt of the growing frustration with the Iraqis here.

"When you say 'deported,' people typically think 'Shia' now," one former Jordanian official said. "They are afraid that they will connect with the groups in Iraq."

Security officials say they have sought to weed out both Sunnis and Shiites who intend to cause trouble in Iraq, and do not differentiate between the sects. "We don't have a problem with someone trying to advance his Shiite faith," the security official said. "But we do have a problem with someone proselytizing and being political."

The Iraqi exodus has sent ripples through Syria, too, where the government has maintained an open-door policy for Iraqis, attracting mainly poor Iraqis who have flocked to neighborhoods like Sayeda Zeynab, the site of a Shiite shrine, creating little ghettos.

There, too, rents have risen, more than doubling in poorer areas like Jaramana, a suburb of Damascus. Some officials have begun warning of impending electricity and water shortages in Syria because of the influx of Iraqis. The price of heating oil and gasoline is expected to rise along with the increased demand.

Reserve Troops Facing Job Woes (USAT)

By Barbara Slavin

USA Today, December 8, 2006

DOJ_NMG_0103963

WASHINGTON — The number of reservists and National Guard members who say they have been reassigned, lost benefits or been fired from civilian jobs after returning from duty has increased by more than 70% over the past six years.

The sharp spike in complaints brought to the U.S. Labor Department reflects the extensive use of part-time soldiers in Iraq and Afghanistan, the largest call up of reserves since the 1950-53 Korean War.

DEPLOYMENT COSTS: Impact of police felt on street

About 500,000 of the 850,000 reservists and National Guard members eligible for duty have been mobilized since late 2001, said Maj. Rob Palmer, spokesman for a Pentagon office that tries to resolve job disputes.

Not all have been treated well by their employers when they return home.

After the 1991 Gulf War, "I was welcomed home with ticker tape," said Marc Garcia, a lieutenant colonel in the Army Reserves. "This time, I get the door slammed in my face."

Garcia, a member of the State Department's Bureau of Diplomatic Security, has been called up twice since Sept. 11, 2001, once for Afghanistan and the last time for stateside duty.

Garcia, 44, had been a supervisor in the Miami office of the security bureau. When he returned to work early last month, he was given a desk job in Washington with no clear responsibilities, he said.

Last month, a judge in Atlanta ruled that the State Department violated Garcia's rights under a 1994 law, which requires employers to give returning reservists their old jobs or equivalent positions. The law was passed to address employment problems faced by veterans returning from the 1991 Gulf War.

The Labor Department said it handled 1,548 complaints from returning service members in the fiscal year ending Sept. 30, up from 895 in the year that ended Sept. 30, 2001. About a third of the cases are resolved in favor of employees, the department said.

Those numbers don't reflect all the servicemen and women with problems. Many of the cases are settled before they get to the Labor Department.

The Pentagon received more than 8,000 complaints this year, nearly double the previous year, but most were resolved without further government action, Palmer said. Complaints range from being fired, losing chances for promotion or being reassigned to jobs with less pay or responsibility.

Retired Marine lieutenant general Dennis McCarthy, executive director of the Reserve Officers Association, a private advocacy group, acknowledged the deployments can be difficult for employers, particularly small companies. "That burden is an acceptable cost when it's compared to the value of reserve service to our country," he said.

Impact Of Police Being Sent To Iraq Felt On Street (USAT)

By Kevin Johnson

USA Today, December 8, 2006

WASHINGTON — The deployment of thousands of police officers to Iraq, Afghanistan and other military reserve posts is costing local law enforcement agencies up to $1.2 billion per year, according to a new analysis of Justice Department data.

The review, prepared for a law enforcement trade journal by Justice Department statistician Matthew Hickman, found that the number of military call-ups is outstripping the pace of new hires at a time when agencies are struggling to find new recruits, and as crime is ticking upward after several years of historically low crime rates.

The problem is particularly acute in small police agencies, which often have struggled to fill gaps in patrol coverage left by cops who have been called to military duty, according to Hickman's analysis, just published in Police Chief magazine.

"This is a serious problem since (police executives) cannot place quotas on the number of reservists in their agencies," according to the analysis, which said that about 2.2% of the estimated 683,600 full-time police officers, sheriff's deputies and state troopers across the nation are in the military reserves.

For his analysis, Hickman reviewed personnel in 3,000 of the nearly 16,000 police agencies across the nation for a 12-month period that ended June 30, 2003. The findings then were projected across all of the agencies as estimates of continuing annual costs to local law enforcement.

Hickman estimated that 11,380 law enforcement officers were called for military reserve service from all agencies during the time period studied, compared with gains of about 2,600 new hires.

At least 23% of all police agencies had officers called for reserve duty during that time, according to Hickman. There is no official count of how many reservists are police officers, but Hickman says the trends in military call-ups and police hiring appear to have been consistent since the period he examined. Police chiefs say overtime paid to other officers to fill patrol shift gaps accounted for the bulk of the deployment costs.

Hickman's analysis does not directly link the reservist call-ups to recent increases in violent crime in many cities. However, police chiefs such as Houston's Harold Hurtt say the impact of call-ups is being felt on the street — even in large departments such as his that are able to absorb losses in officers more easily than smaller police agencies.

"Everybody understands the necessity to do their part for the country," says Hurtt, president of the Major Cities Chiefs Association, a group of about 60 police agencies in the USA and Canada. "But this responsibility is having a noticeable impact on our ability to provide basic services. A lot of these (reservists) were people who answer calls for service."

Hurtt says many of the 25-30 Houston cops called to military duty have been notified that their service likely will be extended beyond a year. The numbers represent a tiny portion of the city's 4,800-officer force, but the call-ups have come as the department is trying to fill hundreds of vacancies caused by the retirements of 700 officers in the past two years, Hurtt says.

Police staffing is a particularly urgent issue in Houston, which took in about 200,000 evacuees from Hurricane Katrina last year. Hurtt says the surge in population contributed to a jump in violent crime, including a 20% increase in homicides this year. This year, the U.S. government gave Houston about $20 million to help pay police overtime and other costs related to the influx of Katrina evacuees.

Reservist call-ups have had more impact on smaller police agencies. In Pottsville, Pa., Police Chief Joseph Murton says the department lost three of its 28 officers to prolonged reserve duty during the past three years.

The deployments, which will require two of the officers to serve two years each, triggered a department-wide restructuring of patrol shifts and undisclosed overtime costs to cover the manpower shortfall. "We understand the value of freedom; we support the service they are providing our country," Murton says. "But it has been difficult. This has affected everybody in the department."

Murton says his community of about 16,500 residents, 100 miles north of Philadelphia, was making do with a decreasing police force before military call-ups. A tightening local budget has forced Pottsville's police department to cut its number of patrol officers from 35 to 28 during the past several years, Murton says.

"If I'm a manufacturing company, I can go to a temp service to fill slots I'm losing to call-ups," he says. "You can't do that in law enforcement. Our employees are required to undergo 22 weeks of training. The average employer doesn't have to face that."

DOJ:

Congress Signs Off On Comp Time For Justice Lawyers' Travel (GOVEXEC)

By Karen Rutzick

Government Executive, December 8, 2006

The Senate passed a bill Wednesday providing compensatory time off for Justice Department lawyers on business travel, following House approval of the measure in March.

Sponsored by Sen. Daniel Akaka, D-Hawaii, and passed unanimously, the bill provides Justice lawyers the same benefit as the rest of their white-collar counterparts in the federal government. The bill now goes to President Bush.

Congress initially granted civil servants comp time for travel as part of the 2004 Federal Workforce Flexibility Act. The Justice Department, however, determined that it lacked authority to grant lawyers the benefit because of limitations on their premium pay.

Richard Delonis, president of the National Association of Assistant United States Attorneys, which has lobbied Congress for two years to force Justice to change its rule, said the department's attorneys are being asked to spend more nights and weekends traveling.

"The comp time legislation passed by Congress sends an important message to these dedicated public servants, assuring that they do not bear an extra burden that Congress did not intend to impose," Delonis said.

On the House side, Reps. Jon Porter, R-Nev.; Tom Davis, R-Va.; Henry Waxman, D-Calif.; Danny Davis, D-Ill.; and Chris Van Hollen, D-Md., introduced the comp time bill (H.R. 4057) to correct the variation in benefits.

Agencies can award travel comp time when they are otherwise unable to compensate employees for time spent in transit outside of normal work hours. They are not allowed to give cash payments, but there is no limit on the amount of time off they can award.

The rules on travel comp time are complex. For example, time spent eating meals is not eligible. That includes meals eaten at an airport while waiting for a flight. The Office of Personnel Management considers this to be time that employees would have spent eating elsewhere.

In addition, regular commuting time is deducted from travel comp time. If employees travel to the airport from home in the morning, they must deduct the amount of time they normally spend commuting. But if employees travel from work to the airport, then that time is considered compensable.

By law, members of the Senior Executive Service, immigration judges and Federal Wage System employees in the Justice Department will remain ineligible for travel comp time.

Northrop Grumman Gets Justice Contract (AP)

Northrop Grumman to Provide Information Technology Services to Justice Department in $20M Deal

MCLEAN, Va. (AP) -- Defense and technology company Northrop Grumman Corp. said Thursday it received a contract worth up to $20 million to help improve information technology management and operations for the Department of Justice.

Northrop will provide IT and security analysis, training, Web content, task and asset management, and applications, operations and help desk support for the agency's Criminal Division Office.

The one-year contract has four one-year options and is worth about $19.9 million if they're all exercised.

Northrop Grumman's teammate on the task order is CACI International Inc. of Arlington, Va.

CORPORATE SCANDALS:

Senator Calls For An Easing Of Corporate-Wrongdoing Rules (NYT)

By Lynnley Browning

The New York Times, December 8, 2006

The departing chairman of the Senate Judiciary Committee proposed legislation yesterday calling for a rollback of the tactics adopted by federal prosecutors to combat corporate wrongdoing after the Enron collapse.

The bill from Senator Arlen Specter, a Pennsylvania Republican, is the latest challenge to the tactics, which have come under scrutiny from trade groups, former United States attorneys general and a prominent federal judge. Mr. Specter said he would reintroduce the bill next month when Congress convenes.

The Justice Department is now weighing how much to revise the guidelines, which are used as a playbook by prosecutors when conducting investigations of companies and employees. But the white-collar-crime group of an advisory council to Attorney General Alberto R. Gonzales, the body that is redrafting the guidelines, is mired in internal debate over how much to scale them back, according to a person close to the matter.

The current guidelines lay out nine factors that prosecutors must consider when weighing whether to indict a company or an individual. The guidelines are intended to encourage companies and people under scrutiny to demonstrate cooperation with investigators by, among other things, disclosing legal secrets, or else face a heightened risk of indictment — a death knell, as it was for the accounting firm Arthur Anderson in 2002.

Despite calling some of the tactics “legitimate tools,” Mr. Specter’s bill calls for “clear and practical limits” to protect the confidentiality of legal communications surrounding companies and employees under investigation.

The current guidelines also encourage companies under investigation to demonstrate cooperation by cutting off legal fees to employees caught up in the inquiries, all in order to avert indictment — something the Specter bill seeks to halt. Mr. Specter, who is a former federal prosecutor, and other critics have said that prosecutors use the tactics as a bludgeon to coerce companies and individuals into giving up their rights.

Specter Bill Seeks To Alter DOJ Corporate Fraud Investigations (LAW)

By Jason Mclure, Legal Times

Legal Times, December 8, 2006

In an attempt to pressure the Justice Department to alter the way it investigates corporate fraud, a key member of the Senate Judiciary Committee on Thursday formally introduced legislation aimed at preventing prosecutors from forcing companies to waive the attorney-client privilege in order to avoid indictment. Sen. Arlen Specter, R-Pa., the outgoing chairman of the committee, said on the Senate floor that the DOJ had not moved quickly enough to change policies that he said encroached on corporate defendants' constitutional right to counsel.

"I see no need for the Justice Department to publicly express a policy that encourages waiver of attorney-client privilege," Specter said. "Especially where the policy is backed by the heavy hammer of possible criminal charges."

Specter was joined by former Attorney General Richard Thornburgh and lobbyists from a number of business and legal groups, who said that forcing a change in the DOJ's policy could lead the Securities and Exchange Commission, the Internal Revenue Service and other government agencies to review their policies on privilege waivers.

"I have no doubt, if DOJ changed policies, it would lead to backtracking by agencies that have followed suit," Thornburgh says.

Specter's move comes as Deputy Attorney General Paul McNulty is leading an internal review of the government's corporate-fraud prosecution policies in the wake of a concerted lobbying effort by business groups and a court decision in New York that found one of the policies to be unconstitutional.

Given that companies would still be granted credit for "voluntarily" waiving their privilege, however, it's unclear whether Specter's bill would have any real effect, says Andrew Hruska, a former DOJ lawyer who helped draft the current controversial policies. And with the Senate set to adjourn on Dec. 8, the bill appears to be aimed squarely at pressuring McNulty. "How far they'll go, I don't know," Specter said of the DOJ's review. In a statement, a spokesman for the Justice Department said it would examine Specter's bill. "We have met with a number of individuals and organizations who have raised concerns or suggestions about our current guidance," said the statement, issued by DOJ spokesman Brian Roehrkasse. "Currently, we have not made any final decisions."

At issue is the way federal prosecutors have interpreted provisions of the so-called Thompson memo, issued in 2003 by then-Deputy Attorney General Larry Thompson. In the memo, Thompson lists a number of factors prosecutors should consider when deciding whether to indict a company for corporate fraud. Among them: whether the company has waived the attorney-client or work-product privilege and granted prosecutors access to internal investigations prepared by the company's lawyers. (Thompson is now general counsel of PepsiCo.) Given that companies under criminal indictment are often driven to bankruptcy -- most notably exemplified in the case of accounting firm Arthur Andersen -- the DOJ's critics say corporate defendants are left with little choice but to waive their privilege and turn over documents relating to internal investigations. Those documents often become public through court proceedings and provide fodder for shareholder class actions.

Critics of the Thompson memo, including Thornburgh, say it has led to a "culture of waiver" in which prosecutors frequently demand companies waive their attorney-client privilege and cut off legal fees to culpable executives at the beginning of an investigation.

But Justice Department officials involved in promulgating the original Thompson memo say its principles are sound and have helped prosecutors win more than 1,100 corporate-fraud convictions since 2002. Although individual prosecutors may have overreached in certain circumstances, they argue, the document's guidelines are an accurate way to assess whether a company is truly cooperating with a criminal fraud investigation. "I do think a lot of prosecutors are doing the right thing," says William Mateja, a former Justice Department official involved in drawing up the memo. "First and foremost, they're trying to get to the truth, and if they can get to it without asking companies to waive, they do."

Both Specter's bill and the Justice Department's internal review represent a success for the business and legal groups that have criticized the DOJ's corporate-fraud tactics. Calling themselves the Coalition to Preserve the Attorney-Client Privilege, a range of groups -- including the National Association of Manufacturers, the U.S. Chamber of Commerce, the American Civil Liberties Union and the Association of Corporate Counsel -- have pushed Congress to roll back the DOJ's most aggressive anti-fraud tactics.

Dodd Vows To Protect Investors (WP)

By Carrie Johnson

The Washington Post, December 8, 2006

Sen. Christopher J. Dodd asserted yesterday that he was not "allergic to business," but the Connecticut Democrat vowed that preserving investor confidence would guide his actions and agenda as chairman of the Senate Banking Committee next year.

Dodd, whose state is home to many of the nation's 9,000-odd hedge funds, rejected the idea of legislation that would impose new rules on the $1 trillion industry. In a briefing with reporters yesterday, Dodd forcefully reasserted his jurisdiction over hedge funds -- trumping a bid by the outgoing chairman of the Senate Judiciary Committee to introduce legislation that would force the funds to register with securities regulators under certain circumstances.

Instead, Dodd said, he would question officials from the Treasury Department and the Federal Reserve Board about their efforts to better understand hedge funds, which are loosely regulated pools of capital designed for wealthy and sophisticated investors. Increasingly, public employee pension funds and other retail investors have been pouring money into hedge funds, an issue of concern for Dodd.

"We bear a responsibility to that kind of investor to make sure there's transparency and the like," he said.

Dodd's remarks are being closely watched by industry and investor advocates because they come at a time when trade groups are arguing that burdensome regulation and too many lawsuits are hurting the competitiveness of U.S. markets and sending businesses abroad.

While Dodd agreed with changing a contentious audit rule blasted by companies as overly expensive, he rejected a wholesale rollback of measures designed to protect investors after the collapses of Enron and WorldCom. In some instances, Dodd argued, regulators went far beyond the intentions of the 2002 Sarbanes-Oxley law. The Securities and Exchange Commission and the Public Company Accounting Oversight Board are to unveil changes to the audit rule within two weeks.

"I'm not going to tolerate during my stewardship here to have a systemic failure because we raced to the bottom in regulations," Dodd added.

The lawmaker said he would seriously consider proposals by the private Committee on Capital Markets Regulation, which last week called for less costly corporate rules and limits on the ability of people to sue businesses, board members and auditors.

Dodd also said he had not yet determined whether to pursue the presidency in 2008, a decision he said he would make early next year. Until then, Dodd said, he will not impose a blanket ban on accepting political donations from industries his banking committee oversees.

Separately, Sen. Arlen Specter (R-Pa.) introduced as expected a measure that would bar prosecutors from forcing companies to waive the attorney-client privilege and from refusing to pay attorney fees for employees ensnared in investigations.

Specter said he went forward with the legislation, which he will take up again next year, because Justice Department officials have failed to produce their own plan after repeated urging from Congress and a coalition that includes the U.S. Chamber of Commerce, the National Association of Manufacturers, the American Civil Liberties Union and the National Association of Criminal Defense Lawyers.

Senator Fights Illegal Tactics Against Corporations (AP)

By Lara Jakes Jordan, Associated Press

AP, December 8, 2006

WASHINGTON — The outgoing Senate Judiciary Committee chairman tried to increase pressure on the Justice Department on today to drop what he described as coercive and unconstitutional tactics used against companies in criminal investigations.

Hours before Congress was to leave for the year, Sen. Arlen Specter, R-Pa., filed legislation that would prohibit prosecutors from unduly pressuring companies to cooperate in such cases.

The tactics were written in the wake of white-collar crime cases at major corporations that cost investors and employees billions of dollars. Companies that do not cooperate face possible indictment.

Asked if the legislation would make it harder to prosecute companies and protect shareholders, Specter said, "I don't think so. I think it'll require (prosecutors) to do a little more work."

"That's a small price to pay for preserving constitutional rights," he said.

Even with the end of the congressional session and Democrats taking power, Specter said he will push to change the law next year and will refile his bill in January. He wants to:

— Prohibit the department from pressuring corporations to waive their rights to preserve conversations and other information shared between lawyers and their clients as confidential.

— Allow corporations to continue paying lawyers' fees for their employees without fear of seeming uncooperative with investigators.

— Bar the department from considering how cooperative a corporation has been with the investigation when determining possible charges.

Deputy Attorney General Paul McNulty is reviewing the memo — written in 2003 by Larry Thompson, who was then deputy attorney general. McNulty is expected to announce changes as early as next week.

Specter said it is not likely that the department will meet all of his demands.

"It may be that the first draft they give us will be satisfactory," said Specter, flanked at a news conference by former Attorney General Richard Thornburgh and officials from the U.S. Chamber of Commerce and the American Civil Liberties Union. "Or it may be that it will require a fair amount of negotiation. That's the more likely consequence."

The committee's incoming chairman, Sen. Patrick Leahy, D-Vt., "has serious concerns about the current, coercive policy," a spokeswoman said, but is waiting to see what the department proposes before considering legislation.

In June, a federal judge in New York said the policy violated employees' rights to fair trials after accounting firm KPMG cut off their legal aid in trying to cooperate with prosecutors.

Hewlett-Packard Agrees To $14.5-million Settlement Over Spying Claims (LAT)

By James S. Granelli

The Los Angeles Times, December 8, 2006

Hewlett-Packard Co. today agreed to a $14.5-million settlement with California Atty. Gen. Bill Lockyer to resolve claims that the computer products maker illegally spied on people in an effort to halt media leaks from the boardroom.

The pioneering Silicon Valley firm will pay $13.5 million into a privacy and piracy fund that will be used by the attorney general and local prosecutors to investigate and prosecute violations of privacy and intellectual property rights.

In addition, HP will pay $650,000 in civil penalties, $350,000 to cover the attorney general's investigation and agreed to strengthen its corporate governance standards to make sure the company complies with ethical and legal standards.

"With its governance reforms, this settlement should help guide companies across the country as they seek to protect confidential business information without violating corporate ethics or privacy rights," Lockyer said in a statement. "And the new fund will help ensure that when businesses cross the legal line, they will be held accountable."

The Santa Clara County Superior Court approved the settlement, which Lockyer filed today as part of a civil lawsuit.

A relieved HP Chairman Mark Hurd said the company, which did not admit any wrongdoing, was "committed to ensuring that HP regains its standing as a global leader in corporate ethics and responsibility."

The civil lawsuit was separate from the criminal charges pending against former HP Chairwoman Patricia Dunn, one former executive and three outside investigators for their alleged roles in surreptitiously tapping into private phone records of directors, reporters and their families.

The Palo Alto-based company revealed in September that its outside investigators had used so-called pretexting, where people posed as directors and reporters to gain access to their phone records, as part of an elaborate corporate spying campaign over the past two years.

The revelations led to Dunn's ouster, the firing of three other executives, a congressional hearing and the criminal charges.

The scandal riveted Silicon Valley throughout September as Lockyer, the FBI, a congressional panel and the Securities and Exchange Commission launched investigations into the Palo Alto company once considered so strait-laced that the "HP Way" was synonymous with honesty and fair dealing.

So far, only Lockyer has filed criminal charges. Dunn and four others are accused of using false pretenses to obtain confidential information from a public utility, gaining unauthorized access to computer data, identity theft and conspiracy to commit each of those crimes. All have pleaded not guilty.

H-P Settles Civil Charges In 'Pretexting' Scandal (WSJ)

By Christopher Lawton

The Wall Street Journal, December 8, 2006

Hewlett-Packard Co. agreed to pay $14.5 million to settle civil charges stemming from a board-leak probe, the latest in a series of moves the technology giant has made to put the scandal behind it.

H-P didn't admit any wrongdoing under the settlement with California Attorney General Bill Lockyer, who has brought criminal charges against former executives and others involved in the company's investigation into the media leaks. The settlement won't affect those cases, legal experts said, but it suggests that H-P itself isn't likely to face criminal charges. All the defendants in the criminal cases have pleaded not guilty.

The civil settlement requires the company to pay $13.5 million toward a new law-enforcement fund for authorities to investigate violations of privacy and intellectual-property rights. Both the attorney general's office and local prosecutors will be allocated as much as $500,000 each year from the fund to investigate and prosecute any violations of those rights. (Read the judgment7 detailing the settlement.)

H-P agreed to pay an additional $650,000 in civil penalties and $350,000 to cover the costs of the attorney general's investigation. The company also agreed to a series of internal governance overhauls that are aimed at heading off any possible abuse of privacy rights in the future.

H-P used practices that included pretexting -- obtaining private phone records under false pretences -- of company directors, employees and journalists as part of a probe that turned into a high-profile scandal this fall.

Along with documents outlining the settlement, Mr. Lockyer's office also filed a civil complaint in Santa Clara County Superior Curt alleging that H-P used "false and fraudulent pretenses" to obtain confidential phone records. Significantly, however, H-P didn't admit wrongdoing in connection with the allegations in the complaint, which could have affected the criminal cases or other civil litigation associated with the scandal.

Mr. Lockyer's office said the settlement will have no impact on the criminal case brought against former H-P Chairman Patricia Dunn and others in the company's leak investigation, but could still set an important precedent.

"The Hewlett-Packard incident has helped shine a national spotlight on a major privacy protection problem," Mr. Lockyer said8 in a statement. "The new fund will help ensure that when businesses cross the legal line they will be held accountable."

Mark Hurd, H-P's chairman and chief executive, added that the company was pleased to settle the matter and is "committed to ensuring that HP regains its standing as a global leader in corporate ethics and responsibility."

The H-P scandal erupted in September, largely as a result of complaints by director Thomas Perkins about H-P's actions in investigating the possibility that board members had leaked confidential information. Mr. Perkins resigned from the board last spring.

Besides Mr. Lockyer's office, investigations were launched by the Justice Department, the Securities and Exchange Commission and a congressional subcommittee, which held high-profile hearings in September. The fallout led to the departures of several H-P executives and board members, including Ms. Dunn and director George Keyworth.

The settlement, which has been approved by the state court, includes provisions associated with H-P's governance processes that will extend for five years. Among other things, the company will designate an independent director who will be responsible for reviewing and reporting to the board H-P's legal and ethical requirements as it relates to future investigations.

H-P's chief ethics and compliance officer, whose position was created in October, will play a key role in the tighter governance procedures. That executive, who previously reported to H-P's general counsel, will now also report to the audit committee of H-P's board.

H-P also will establish a compliance council chaired by the ethics officer to develop, maintain and revise H-P's ethics and compliance programs. The company has retained an expert in investigative practices to conduct a comprehensive review its investigative practices and to assist the chief ethics and compliance officer in making improvements where appropriate. H-P also agreed to beef up the ethics and conflict-of-interest portions of its employee-training program.

Joel Reidenberg, professor of law and director of the Center on Law and Information Policy at Fordham University School of Law, in New York, said the settlement was an important victory for Mr. Lockyer, who is leaving office in January to become California state treasurer. He argued that the agreement bolsters a perception that H-P's tactics did violate a legal privacy right, even if it has no impact on any other cases.

"All of this points quite clearly to the illegality of what H-P did, but it is a settlement," Mr. Reidenberg said. "It is not a court decision that what H-P did is illegal."

William Keane, a partner and criminal defense attorney at the San Francisco law firm Farella Braun & Martel, called the settlement a smart move by H-P. "The statement reflects a recognition by H-P, at a minimum, that it would been a challenging case to defend," said Mr. Keane, who isn't involved in the case.

Hewlett To Pay $14.5 Million In Deal On Spying Case (NYT)

By Damon Darlin

The New York Times, December 8, 2006

SAN FRANCISCO, Dec. 7 — Hewlett-Packard said today that it would pay $14.5 million in a settlement with the California attorney general over the company's use of private detectives to obtain phone records of board members and journalists.

The company is paying $650,000 in fines for "statutory damages," but the bulk of the money, $13.5 million, is going to create a state-administered fund to finance the investigation of privacy violations. The rest of the settlement goes to cover the attorney general's expenses in its investigation of the corporate spying case.

Hewlett-Packard reported revenue for its fiscal year of $91.7 billion. The fine is equivalent to what the company brings in every 83 minutes.

The attorney general's civil lawsuit was filed today in state court along with the settlement of that case. The civil suit did not name any individuals.

The attorney general, Bill Lockyer, filed criminal charges in early October against five people, including Patricia C. Dunn, the former H.P. chairwoman, and a former company lawyer, accusing them of violating state privacy laws. All of the individuals have pleaded not guilty.

In those cases, the attorney general alleges that company officials passed on information to private investigators — who in turn passed it to other private investigators — that allowed the personal phone records of several board members and journalists to be viewed. The investigators used a form of subterfuge, called pretexting, to obtain the private phone records by pretending to be someone else.

The settlement of the civil suit puts an end to the company's problems with state investigators. But on the federal level, the Justice Department, the Securities and Exchange Commission and the Federal Communications Commission are all investigating the company's conduct during the company's internal investigations of leaks from its board during 2005 and 2006.

HP, Calif. Settle Spying Lawsuit (WP)

By Ellen Nakashima

The Washington Post, December 8, 2006

California's attorney general announced a $14.5 million civil settlement with Hewlett-Packard over its corporate spying scandal yesterday and said in an interview that he was exploring a possible settlement of criminal charges against the firm's former chairman.

Patricia C. Dunn was ousted as chairman in September after the HP ethics and spying scandal became public. California Attorney General Bill Lockyer filed fraud and conspiracy charges against her in October, a day after Dunn learned that she had suffered a relapse of ovarian cancer.

Lockyer said he has been talking to Dunn's attorney, James Brosnahan, about a potential settlement. "I'm sympathetic to her health problems," Lockyer said in an interview, adding that there was "nothing yet that would indicate that settlements are likely."

Brosnahan did not return a reporter's call yesterday.

The civil settlement involved a lawsuit the state filed against the computer giant in Santa Clara County Superior Court. Under the agreement, HP will pay $13.5 million to create a "privacy and piracy" fund to help state and local law enforcement fight privacy and intellectual property violations. The rest of the money will go to damages and to pay for the investigation.

HP also agreed to strengthen in-house monitoring to ensure that future investigations launched by HP or its contractors will comply with legal and ethical standards and protect privacy rights. HP further agreed to hire an independent director, expand the duties of its chief ethics officer and chief privacy officer, beef up staff ethics training and create a compliance council to set policies for ethics programs.

"This settlement creates a template for other companies seeking to protect confidential business information without violating corporate ethics or privacy rights," Lockyer said.

The scandal broke in September when HP acknowledged in a Securities and Exchange Commission filing that investigators probing internal HP leaks to the media had gained access to board members' personal phone records by impersonating the board members, a practice known as pretexting. HP's investigators also conducted physical and electronic surveillance of board members and reporters, according to HP documents.

Pretexting violates a California criminal law banning the use of "false and fraudulent pretenses" to obtain confidential information from a phone company, Lockyer's office said. California civil law also considers criminal acts unlawful business practices, which was the basis of the state's civil action.

The civil settlement does not affect the criminal charges brought against Dunn and four others, including former HP chief ethics director and senior legal counsel Kevin Hunsaker, who resigned as the scandal unfolded; Boston security consultant Ronald R. DeLia; and private investigators Bryan Wagner of Littleton, Colo., and Matthew Depante of Melbourne, Fla.

Lockyer commended HP yesterday for "cooperating, instead of stonewalling" the investigation.

Mark V. Hurd, HP's chairman and chief executive, hailed the deal. "We are pleased to settle this matter with the attorney general and are committed to ensuring that HP regains its standing as a global leader in corporate ethics and responsibility," he said.

HP To Pay $14.5M To Settle Spying Lawsuit (USAT)

By Jim Hopkins And Michelle Kessler

USA Today, December 8, 2006

SAN FRANCISCO — Hewlett-Packard (HPQ) said Thursday that it would pay $14.5 million and bolster its corporate governance to settle a civil case brought by California's attorney general over a boardroom spying scandal that engulfed HP this year.

The computer giant will pay $13.5 million to create a state fund to enforce privacy and intellectual property laws. HP also will pay $650,000 in civil penalties and $350,000 to cover Attorney General Bill Lockyer's investigation.

SCANDAL NO THREAT TO BUSINESS: HP looks sharp to many tech analysts

The settlement is expected to absolve HP of all civil and criminal claims in the matter, Lockyer says. It does not affect criminal charges he filed against former HP chairman Patricia Dunn and four others. They have pleaded not guilty.

The settlement's governance reforms are to ensure that HP complies with legal and ethical standards and protection of privacy rights, Lockyer said.

The reforms include expanding the role of HP's chief privacy officer.

Charles Elson, director of the University of Delaware's corporate governance center, said the reforms were a good step. But he said HP had ethics rules in place when it launched the boardroom probe.

"The problem was, people who implemented those policies acted in improper manners," he said.

HP said it was not found liable in the settlement. Chairman and CEO Mark Hurd said the company is "committed to ensuring that HP regains its standing as a global leader in corporate ethics."

Lockyer acknowledged that $14.5 million is small relative to HP's size. But he noted, "The fine or penalty isn't a function of how big the company is."

Other corporations have paid far more to settle law enforcement claims. Securities giant Prudential Equity Group agreed in August to pay $600 million to resolve civil and criminal complaints brought by the SEC and others.

HP shares closed at $39.86 on the news, down 28 cents.

The settlement stems from HP's efforts to uncover the source of boardroom news leaks to journalists. HP's private investigators used subterfuge to get phone records of directors, journalists, employees and their family members.

A bill making it a crime for anyone but law enforcement agencies to get phone records under false pretenses is expected to be approved by the Senate as soon as this week after clearing the House. President Bush is expected to sign the legislation.

Hewlett-Packard To Pay $14.5 Million In Spying Probe (Update2) (BLOOM)

By Karen Gullo And Connie Guglielmo

Bloomberg, December 8, 2006

Dec. 7 (Bloomberg) -- Hewlett-Packard Co., the world's largest maker of personal computers and printers, agreed to pay $14.5 million to settle an investigation by California's attorney general over the spying tactics used to uncover boardroom leaks.

The money will be used to finance a fund to fight privacy and intellectual property violations, California Attorney General Bill Lockyer said today in a statement. The state won't pursue new civil claims against the company or current and former directors and employees, Hewlett-Packard said in a statement.

The agreement ends California's probe of Palo Alto, California-based Hewlett-Packard, which hired investigators who used fake identities to obtain private phone records. It would take Hewlett-Packard an hour and 23 minutes to generate $14.5 million in sales, based on fiscal 2006 revenue of $91.7 billion.

``It's kind of a slap on the wrist," said Rob Enderle, an analyst with San Jose, California-based Enderle Group. ``This was a series of mistakes that was more about incompetence than criminal intent. Paying $14.5 million for an `oops' is probably good enough and for every company that may need to be reminded that spying on reporters is not a good idea, this may do it."

Hewlett-Packard still faces investigations by the U.S. Securities and Exchange Commission, Justice Department and shareholder lawsuits. Lockyer separately has charged the company's former Chairman Patricia Dunn and four others with conspiracy and fraud over their involvement in an investigation into boardroom leaks. Dunn pleaded not guilty.

Hewlett-Packard shares fell 28 cents to $39.86 at 4:20 p.m. New York time in Nasdaq Stock Market composite trading. The stock has gained 39 percent this year.

`Put It to Rest'

The settlement requires Hewlett-Packard to pay $13.5 million to create a new ``Privacy and Piracy Fund" for law enforcement in California, Lockyer said in the statement. The company is also paying $650,000 in civil penalties and $350,000 in fees to cover California's investigation costs.

``It's positive that the company can put it to rest," said Tony Ursillo, who helps invest $75 billion at Loomis, Sayles & Co. in Boston. The firm had almost 4 million Hewlett-Packard shares as of September. ``These civil charges are the sort of things that can get more attention than they deserve."

The Santa Clara County Superior Court has approved the settlement, Lockyer said. Hewlett-Packard didn't admit wrongdoing as part of the settlement.

Hewlett-Packard in September said investigators may have used illegal tactics to uncover the source of boardroom leaks to the media, including pretexting, or the use of fake identities, to gain access to telephone records.

Escalation

DOJ_NMG_0103972

The scandal escalated as California, the SEC and Congress started their own probes into the methods used by investigators. Chief Executive Officer Mark Hurd, Dunn and other executives spent a day testifying before a Congressional committee seeking information on the pretexting.

Hewlett-Packard said investigators hired by the company trawled through garbage and followed reporters in their efforts to uncover which director was leaking information.

The settlement resolves a civil lawsuit filed today by Lockyer that says Hewlett-Packard violated California's unfair business practices rules by engaging ``in an unlawful scheme to spy on its own employees and directors.''

The company violated the privacy rights of those it spied on and broke California laws against deceiving phone companies to gain call records and committing identify theft. The allegations are similar to those made in Lockyer's criminal cases against Dunn and others.

``The company was fully cooperative and didn't try to stonewall or duck responsibility at all,'' Lockyer said in an interview today. ``They stepped up, they made changes, they want to get this behind them.''

New Policies

Hurd said he didn't know of the practices being used because the investigation was authorized by Dunn, who now faces charges that each carry a maximum sentence of three years in prison and tens of thousands of dollars in fines.

The California agreement comes a week before Hurd, 49, and other executives face Wall Street analysts in New York at the company's analyst day.

``We are pleased to settle this matter with the attorney general and are committed to ensuring that HP regains its standing as a global leader in corporate ethics and responsibility,'' Hurd said in the statement today.

Independent Director

Hewlett-Packard agreed to adopt new policies for five years. They include designating one of its board members, Wachovia Corp. CEO G. Kennedy Thompson, as an independent director to review the company's compliance with legal and ethical standards.

Joel Reidenberg, a professor at Fordham Law School in New York, said the agreement is one of the largest settlements of a case involving privacy violations of a small group of people. Hewlett-Packard admitted obtaining private phone records of at least seven directors, two employees and nine reporters.

``For a privacy case, it's very significant,'' said Reidenberg in an interview.

Hurd last month presided over a fourfold jump in fiscal fourth-quarter profit. In the same period, Hewlett-Packard reclaimed the lead in the personal-computer market after lagging behind Round Rock, Texas-based Dell Inc. for three years.

The results demonstrated Hurd's success in overcoming the leak scandal, investors said.

``It's good because we need investors to refocus on the numbers, especially with analyst day coming up,'' Ursillo said.

Convicted Ex-Cendant Exec Under House Arrest (BLOOM)

By Jane Mills And David Voreacos, BLOOMBERG NEWS

Bloomberg, December 8, 2006

E. Kirk Shelton, the former Cendant Corp. vice chairman convicted of a $3 billion accounting fraud, was placed under house arrest Thursday by a federal judge until he begins serving a 10-year prison term.

U.S. District Judge Alvin Thompson ordered Shelton confined to his house in Darien, Conn., after an appeals court upheld his conviction Nov. 22. Thompson said he cannot order Shelton to prison until the appeals court lifts a stay on his term.

"I would order a surrender that would be forthwith," Thompson said in federal court in Hartford, Conn.

Shelton, 51, was convicted in 2005 of overstating income by $286 million at CUC International, which merged withParsippany-based HFS in 1997 to create Cendant, a travel and real-estate services company.

Cendant paid $3.2 billion to settle investor lawsuits.

Cendant split into four public companies this year.

Thompson allowed Shelton to leave his house to visit his lawyers and psychiatrist. He has been free on a bond secured by his houses in Darien and Vail, Colo.

In sentencing Shelton last year, Thompson ordered him to repay $3.2 billion to Cendant.

Both Cendant and the Justice Department have sued Shelton, saying he is hiding tens of millions of dollars in assets through fraudulent transfers.

During a hearing Thursday, Thompson said he agreed that Shelton's asset transfers were suspicious.

"At the end of the day, there is going to be a conclusion that there was a fraudulent transfer here," Thompson said.

Thompson urged Cendant and Shelton to reach a settlement, appointing an attorney to oversee negotiations.

DOJ_NMG_0103973

"We are running up a lot of legal fees here and it's a waste," he said. "Mr. Shelton is going to prison. His wife could have some peace of mind. His children could have some peace of mind. The money that would go to victims will go to lawyers."

Cendant attorney Robert Kaelin said the company is opposed to any settlement negotiations with Shelton.

Last year, Thompson ordered Shelton to make a $15 million initial payment toward his restitution. After his release from prison, the judge said, Shelton must pay $2,000 a month for 35 months before making a final payment of the $3.27 billion order.

Shelton attorney Thomas Puccio said he asked the full 2nd U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals on Thursday to reconsider the order by a three-judge panel that upheld the conviction.

Shelton was convicted of conspiracy, securities fraud, and making false statements to the Securities and Exchange Commission.

At his trial, jurors deadlocked on charges against former Cendant chairman Walter Forbes, 64, prompting a mistrial.

After a second mistrial, Forbes was convicted at a third trial in federal court in Bridgeport, Conn.

The case is U.S. v. Forbes, 02CR264, U.S. District Court, District of Connecticut (Hartford).

4 Ex-Employees Convicted In Stock Inflation Case (KCAL)

KCAL-TV, CBS 9, Los Angeles, December 8, 2006

(CBS) LOS ANGELES Four men who worked for a San Diego brokerage were convicted of federal charges Thursday for selling their clients stocks that their superiors wanted to run up in value.

The brokerage, Hampton Porter Investment Bankers, shut its doors abruptly in 2001, U.S. Justice Department attorney Kathleen McGovern told jurors during a month-long trial in Los Angeles.

Hampton Porter paid the four brokers convicted -- Bryan Laurienti, 50, David Montesano, 39, Curtiss Parker, 45, and Donald Samaria, 37, -- special commissions in return for the transactions, which typically involved thinly traded low-value stocks their firm had received at deep discounts, McGovern told jurors.

The four were convicted of conspiracy and securities fraud in connection with the transactions, according to another prosecutor on the case, Assistant U.S. Attorney David Willingham.

A fifth man, Michael Losse, 42, was acquitted on all charges, Willingham said.

The owners of the brokerage, John Laurienti and Gregory Walker, previously pleaded guilty to one count each of conspiracy, as did its retail manager, James Green. They are awaiting sentencing.

More than 100 of Hampton Porter's clients were bilked out of an estimated $5 million as the result of trades made between 1998 and 2000, authorities have said.

Once the clients bought the stocks, the prices would go up, and co-conspirators in the alleged scam would sell their shares for huge profits, according to the government.

Bryan Laurienti's attorney, Evan Jenness, said her client plans to appeal the conviction.

Attorney Michael Mayock, who represented Montesano, said he will also seek to reverse his client's conviction.

Mayock contended that it was the higher-ups at Hampton Porter who were really responsible for the stock inflation scam.

"These brokers had no idea what was going on at Hampton Porter," Mayock said.

According to the government, Hampton Porter's clients did not know that the defendants were paid the special commissions of about 10 percent for selling the stocks at issue, which were known as "house stocks."

U.S. District Judge Terry Hatter set sentencing for March 12.

The Pequot 'Scandal' (WSJ)

The Wall Street Journal, December 8, 2006

In Washington, the "whistleblower" is a stock political figure. Some are truth-tellers, others grind a political ax. One duty of Congressional oversight is knowing the difference, and that looks to be among the failings of Senator Chuck Grassley in the strange and much-hyped case of Pequot Capital Management.

Pequot is the hedge fund that Mr. Grassley is doggedly suggesting is at the center of an insider-trading scheme, one that has supposedly been winked at by the Securities and Exchange Commission. Or so claims disgruntled former SEC lawyer Gary Aguirre, whom Mr. Grassley has adopted as a truth-teller while courting publicity by suggesting an SEC coverup. The only thing missing is evidence.

This melodrama began in May, when Mr. Aguirre sent a letter to Congress claiming he'd been fired because he'd come across insider trading at Pequot. Mr. Aguirre suspected Morgan Stanley CEO John Mack of tipping off Pequot CEO Art Samberg to a corporate merger in 2001, allowing Pequot to bank $18 million. When he asked to depose Mr. Mack, senior SEC officials denied his request and Mr. Aguirre lost his job not long thereafter.

Mr. Aguirre was soon feted at a Congressional hearing, and by August Mr. Grassley was interrogating SEC staff amid media leaks portraying the Senator as a tireless pursuer of the rich and powerful. The Iowan dismissed a report from the SEC's inspector general that found the agency had not acted improperly, and he has unleashed the Government Accountability Office to dig for whatever it can find.

Which brings us to the rest of the story, to the extent there is one. One problem is that the whistleblower in the case, Mr. Aguirre, seems to have long held sweeping grievances against hedge funds and the SEC. He spent many years as a tort lawyer in San Diego, until he retired in 1995 to attend film school. In 2003, at the ripe young age of 61, he decided he wanted a new career in government enforcement. According to SEC officials who testified at a raucous Senate Judiciary hearing Tuesday, he was turned down for an SEC job no less than 22 times.

Mr. Aguirre filed a complaint with the Equal Employment Opportunity Commission claiming age discrimination. Nearly all the SEC officials interviewed by the EEOC about their hiring decisions said Mr. Aguirre lacked the qualifications, or the temperament, to work at the agency. Nonetheless, on his 23rd try in September 2004, Mr. Aguirre was hired in the SEC enforcement division. Why Mr. Aguirre was so determined to join the SEC is unclear, but in a letter in 2000 he described certain SEC practices as "unconscionable," complaining he'd lost $10,000 in a stock deal because "institutional investors" had possessed more information than he had.

Once at the agency he became part of an ongoing investigation into some fortuitous 2001 Pequot trades. Hedge funds are in the business of closely watching markets and making bets, so winning trades hardly prove illegality. But Mr. Aguirre became convinced that Mr. Mack had tipped off Mr. Samberg in 2001 that GE Capital was buying Heller Financial. His evidence? Well, none, as he himself has admitted.

Mr. Aguirre pointed instead to the fact that Mr. Mack had interviewed for a job at CSFB, which was involved with the GE-Heller deal. Oh, and Mr. Mack and Mr. Samberg were friends. Never mind that the GE-Heller deal had been speculated about often and in many places prior to its announcement, and Mr. Samberg can presumably read.

Cooler heads at the SEC continued the Pequot investigation for a year after Mr. Aguirre left, interviewing a dozen individuals (including Mr. Mack) and ultimately found nothing. As for the latest media allegation that former SEC associate director of enforcement Paul Berger squelched the Mack deposition in order to land a private-sector job, again the only thing missing is evidence. Mr. Berger spent 14 unblemished years at the SEC's enforcement division, spearheading investigations against Fannie Mae, Xerox, KPMG and Morgan Stanley.

So what's really going on here? Mr. Aguirre's financial bugbears aside, one hint is the allusion in his whistleblowing letter to the Senate that Mr. Mack has "powerful political connections," meaning that Mr. Mack had raised money for President Bush. This has kept the media titillated, and it also gives Mr. Grassley a chance to court the New York Times and burnish his reputation as a populist. The hedge fund industry is also a sexy media target these days, and any new "scandal" will assist the cause of Senators who want more regulation, not to mention more campaign contributions, from the fund industry.

We have no affection for the SEC, and we don't know Mr. Mack. But Senators and their staff ought to be under some obligation to produce evidence before they cry scandal and drag reputations through the mud. As it stands, Messrs. Mack and Samberg appear to have been singled out for no other reason than because they have money and political friends. And if anything, Pequot is the wronged party, having cooperated with the SEC probe only to find that Mr. Aguirre had leaked confidential corporate information to Senate staff, who then leaked it to the press. That sounds like the real scandal.

Spitzer Gets Blocked (WSJ)

Eliot Spitzer will soon be New York's Governor, and maybe just in time for the good of his prosecutorial reputation. Another of his well-publicized lawsuits went down in flames late last week when New York Supreme Court Justice Karla Moskowitz dismissed the Attorney General's complaint against H&R Block.

Readers may recall that the AG proclaimed in March -- to the applause of his media Boswells -- that the giant tax adviser had fraudulently sold retirement savings plans. When H&R Block refused to roll over and settle, Mr. Spitzer reacted with his customary cool, promising "vast fines" and hinting at a possible corporate indictment.

Judge Moskowitz's dismissal is about as humiliating as these things get. The judge noted that Mr. Spitzer's office lacks jurisdiction over H&R Block because the parent company has no physical presence in New York state. And while its H&R Block Financial Advisers unit does work with a bank in New York, the judge found that Mr. Spitzer had shown no offending conduct at that unit.

This is good news, both for the rule of law and especially for the low-income individuals who use H&R Block's Express IRA retirement product. Mr. Spitzer had alleged that because these products have low minimum balances, and are invested in low-risk (and thus low-interest bearing) money market accounts, many users have sometimes paid more in fees than they earned in interest.

Mr. Spitzer cherrypicked his data to suggest that most H&R Block customers had lost money, and it is probably true that some beginning savers saw a dip in their accounts as they started to build balances. While this is an unavoidable risk for new savers relying on money-market accounts, it is not fraud. Interest rates were unusually low in the early years of the decade and have since risen, and so these money-market accounts are now seeing larger returns. Meantime, H&R Block has since received permission to charter its own bank and so is able to offer new savings products with higher interest rates and no fees.

Studies have shown that such accounts are one way to induce the working poor to get into the valuable habit of saving. Many Americans with low incomes work for companies without retirement plans, and many are reluctant to divert a portion of their already stretched paychecks to future saving. Yet numerous low-income Americans do receive sizable tax refunds from the government in some years, and the H&R Block accounts allow them to directly deposit this mini-windfall. Thrift is supposed to be a virtue.

Mr. Spitzer's office understood all this, especially because many of his fellow Democrats have been among the leading proponents of such accounts. Then again, March was tax season, and H&R Block may have been too tantalizing a political target for an Attorney General's office that wasn't being featured as often in front-page headlines.

The H&R Block defeat joins the queue of Mr. Spitzer's other courtroom losses: the failed prosecution of Bank of America broker Ted Sihpol, the foiled campaign to pry confidential mortgage data out of national banks, and his dropped civil, and evanescent criminal, charges against former AIG CEO Hank Greenberg.

Mr. Spitzer has had his successes, most of which included settlements by companies that couldn't risk going to court. But as the AG's ambitions grew he began to stretch the law, and his record when he actually goes to court is poor. While the press runs his charges on page one, the dismissals appear next to the classifieds, if they run at all. We couldn't find anyone who'd even reported the H&R Block ruling.

Judge Moskowitz said Mr. Spitzer may refile the H&R Block suit if his office can remedy its failings. However, she added that, at least regarding the jurisdictional issue, the deficiencies came despite "extensive discovery" in which "Block, Inc. produced thousands of documents and permitted [the AG's office] to take seven depositions." Sounds as if the judge is suggesting that Mr. Spitzer quit while he's behind.

CRIMINAL LAW:

State Rep. Anderson In Jail On "public Corruption" Charges (ADN)

Alaska Daily News, December 8, 2006

Federal authorities arrested state Rep. Tom Anderson on Thursday afternoon on “public corruption” charges, the FBI said. Anderson was still in custody at the Anchorage Jail on Thursday night.

FBI spokesman Eric Gonzalez said further details would be available from the Department of Justice Friday with the release of the federal charging documents.

Gonzalez only would say that there was a federal warrant for Anderson’s arrest “in connection with a public corruption probe.” Anderson was arrested around 4:30 p.m. at his residence, Gonzalez said.

Anderson, who was elected to the state House four years ago to represent Muldoon but did not seek re-election in November, kept up his original consulting business as an adviser for clients who do business with state and local government. He is married to state Rep. Lesil McGuire, R-Anchorage, who was elected to the state Senate in November.

Federal agents swarmed six legislative offices around the state at the end of August, seeking information on legislator’s links to oil services and construction company Veco. The FBI made no arrests.

Anderson is excepted to be arraigned in federal court Friday.

FBI: State Lawmaker Arrested In FBI Probe (AP)

AP, December 8, 2006

ANCHORAGE, Alaska (AP) - An Alaska state lawmaker was arrested Thursday on a federal bribery warrant.

Rep. Tom Anderson was arrested at his Anchorage home and was being held Thursday night at the city jail, FBI Special Agent Eric Gonzalez told The Associated Press.

The arrest stems from the recent raid of several lawmaker's offices. No other arrests were made, but Gonzalez said it was an ongoing investigation.

DOJ_NMG_0103976

More information about Anderson's arrest, first reported by Anchorage television station KTUU, was expected to be released by Department of Justice officials in Washington, D.C., Gonzalez said.

A message left late Thursday night with DOJ officials by the AP was not immediately returned.

Anderson, who did not seek re-election and leaves office this month, is married to Lesil McGuire, who gave up her state representative seat and was elected to the state Senate, taking office next month. There was no home listing for Anderson and McGuire, but Anderson's father, Tom Anderson, former director of the Alaska State Troopers, said, "No comment."

The offices of at least six Alaska legislators were raided in late August and early September by federal agents searching for possible ties between the lawmakers and VECO Corp., a large oil field services company, officials and aides said. Anderson's name had not appeared in the list of offices searched.

About 20 warrants were served at the time in Anchorage, Juneau, Wasilla, Eagle River and Girdwood, but federal officials would not say who received warrants and remained tightlipped about the investigation. All inquiries were referred to DOJ officials, who declined to comment for months.

Rep. Tom Anderson Arrested (KTUU)

KTUU-TV, December 8, 2006

Anchorage, Alaska - Rep. Tom Anderson, R-Anchorage, is under arrest and in the Anchorage jail tonight. Anderson was indicted in connection with a federal influence-peddling probe and was taken into custody at his Anchorage home this evening by the FBI.

It appears to be the first arrest in a federal probe that made headlines after the raid of several lawmakers' offices in late August.

The FBI confirms that Anderson was arrested at around 4 p.m. today based on a warrant in connection with a federal indictment. Federal investigators would not elaborate any further, but did say it stemmed from the public corruption probe and the investigation is ongoing.

In August, FBI agents and several other agencies descended on multiple offices of six lawmakers as well as VECO Corp. and the office of U.S. Sen. Ted Stevens in Girdwood.

The offices of Anchorage Senators Ben Stevens and John Cowdery and Nome Sen. Donny Olson were all searched, as were offices of Reps. Pete Kott, R-Eagle River, Vic Koehring, R-Wasilla and Bruce Weyrauch, R-Juneau.

Months earlier, as lawmakers were in a flurry to pass the oil production tax, there was heated debate about whether the oil industry was meddling too much.

"This is our floor. Our floor. No telephone calls are supposed to change what we're doing. No lobbyist is supposed to peer over the railing and tell us to change our mind. Never should happen," said House Minority Leader Ethan Berkowitz, D-Anchorage.

In the specter of the federal raids, many wondered if that debate and the actions that spurned it spiraled into a criminal probe.

Anderson and Stevens have been criticized in the past for taking consulting contracts from oil-related firms, including VECO Corp., without disclosing exactly what they do.

The FBI would not release what charges Anderson is being held on, saying only that it can confirm the arrest.

Any further information will need to come from the Department of Justice.

Phone calls to Anderson's wife, Sen.-elect Lesil McGuire, were not returned.

NYC Court Reserves Decision Documents In Decades-old Murders (AP)

By Pat Milton

AP, December 8, 2006

NEW YORK - Attorneys for an American Indian activist convicted of killing two FBI agents in a shoot-out on a South Dakota reservation in 1975 took their fight to free the imprisoned man to a New York courtroom on Thursday.

The attorneys for Leonard Peltier argued for the release of all FBI files stemming from the three-decade old case. Appearing before a three-judge panel of the U.S. Appeals Court in Manhattan, they contended that the documents should have been turned over to them at the time of trial in 1977.

They are now seeking the release of the documents under the Freedom of Information Act, hoping the withheld information will lead to Peltier's exoneration.

"The FBI cannot use exemptions under FOIA to shield unauthorized, illegal tactics in this case," Peltier's attorney, Michael Kuzma, told the panel. Kuzma claimed investigators coerced witnesses and withheld evidence in building a case against Peltier.

DOJ_NMG_0103977

Justice Department attorney H. Thomas Byron III told the court that unfettered release of the documents would compromise the confidentiality of the witnesses. He said the witnesses were guaranteed confidentiality, either expressed or implied.

"The circumstances of this case make it clear that anyone who provided information would have reason to have concern for their well-being," Byron argued.

The FBI in Buffalo released 797 pages of material in 2004. But it withheld some 15 pages and redacted large portions of the released pages, citing exemptions allowed under FOIA for national security concerns and to protect the identity of agents, witnesses, and informants.

The judges reserved decision on whether to overturn a Buffalo federal court's ruling last February and order the release of the 15 withheld documents and grant unfettered access to the others with redactions. The federal court in Buffalo found that the FBI could keep secret the handful of documents.

Peltier, 60, is serving two life sentences at the federal penitentiary in Lewisburg, Pa.

He was a leader of the American Indian Movement in the 1970s. He was convicted in 1977 in North Dakota of the killings of the two agents during a shootout on the Pine Ridge Indian Reservation in South Dakota. His supporters have been trying to get his conviction overturned for years, saying he was wrongfully targeted because of his activism.

Kuzma said outside court that any ruling against Peltier would be appealed to the U.S. Supreme Court.

Kuzma said the defense team is seeking more than 140,000 pages of FBI documents from field offices nationwide.

More than two dozen supporters of Peltier filled the rear benches in the courtroom during the 30-minute hearing. "They needed someone to blame for the crime and they got him," said supporter Jerry Sevitz of Manhattan.

Trucchio Gets Judicial Warning (TAMPTRIB)

By Elaine Silvestrini

Tampa Tribune, December 8, 2006

TAMPA - Ronald "Ronnie One Arm" Trucchio said his family didn't mean to scare anyone when they sent two private detectives down from New York to talk to jurors who convicted him of racketeering conspiracy.

One of the investigators said he was hired to question jurors about allegations made by juror Diana Young-Stewart, who wrote a letter to the judge claiming other jurors coerced her into voting to convict Trucchio.

Defense attorney Joseph Corozzo Jr. said he did not know anything about the private investigators.

"It's distressing to me that this happened," said U.S. District Judge Susan Bucklew, who called a hearing Thursday to tell Trucchio that he can't have anyone try to contact jurors. "Serving on a jury is difficult enough."

After several jurors called her office and U.S. marshals, Bucklew had a telephone conference with the attorneys in the case on Wednesday, she said. After Corozzo said he did not know about the contacts, the judge wanted to talk directly to Trucchio, who faces a possible life sentence after his conviction last month. Prosecutors say Trucchio is a capo in the Gambino crime family who was in charge of a crew that committed crimes in three states.

"I didn't try to contact anybody," he said initially.

Bucklew warned Trucchio that if he does contact jurors, "you will be held in contempt of my order ordering you not to do that." And, she said, "any contact of jurors could be seen as obstruction of justice and have an effect on your sentencing."

Corozzo said he filed a motion to have the jurors questioned under oath in response to a letter to the judge from juror Diana Young-Stewart saying she was coerced into voting to convict.

Bucklew said she will consider the motion after prosecutors respond. But, she said, "you can't attack a jury's verdict based on their internal deliberations." She emphasized the ban on jury contact. "What happens is the jurors get frightened," she told Trucchio.

"Understandably, your honor. No harm intended."

Bucklew addressed one of the investigators identified by jurors as making the contacts. Thomas Allen of ACI Investigators on Long Island said he would follow the judge's order to stop trying to talk to jurors.

He said he and another investigator, Vincent Parco, an author who makes frequent television appearances, were hired by Trucchio's brother-in-law, Jerry Dirazzo.

"Do you understand that you can't do that?" Bucklew asked Trucchio.

"I do now, your honor," he said, adding later, "If they knew there was gonna be any problem like this, I'm sure my brother-in-law and my sister wouldn't have done it. This was just a big misunderstanding. I apologize."

No Dismissal For Killer Of Abortion Doc (NSDY/AP)

By Carolyn Thompson, Associated Press Writer

Long Island Newsday, December 8, 2006

BUFFALO, N.Y. -- A judge on Thursday rejected all defense motions to dismiss a federal case against a man who admits fatally shooting a doctor who performed abortions, and barred the defendant from discussing his anti-abortion views at trial.

James Kopp already is serving a 25-year-to-life state sentence after being convicted of second-degree murder in the 1998 shooting of Dr. Barnett Slepian. He faces a life term if found guilty of violating the federal Freedom of Access to Clinic Entrances Act in the shooting.

Kopp, preparing his own defense from a Niagara County jail cell, argued for dismissal of the federal case in recent court filings.

In one filing, he argued that the charges should be dismissed because the shooting did not take place at a clinic entrance. In another brief, he contended that a government prosecutor had implied during a meeting with him that he believed Kopp's claims that he was only trying to wound Slepian to prevent him from performing abortions. The prosecutor denied making any such statement.

U.S. District Judge Richard Arcara rejected all of Kopp's arguments.

Kopp, 52, has admitted shooting Slepian with a high-powered rifle through a window of the doctor's suburban Amherst home. He was a fugitive for 2 1/2 years and was among the FBI's most wanted criminals when he was captured in France in March 2001.

Kopp had hoped to argue at his federal trial that the shooting was justified because he shot Slepian to save the lives of unborn babies the doctor was about to abort.

But Arcara agreed with the government that such a defense cannot be used when someone is trying to prevent legal behavior. Kopp will not even be allowed to talk about his religious or moral reasons for opposing abortion, the judge ruled, because they are irrelevant. For the same reason, Kopp may not offer abortion-related photographs or testimony from women who have had abortions, Arcara said.

Abortion-related buttons, signs or clothing also will not be allowed in the courtroom for the trial. Jury selection is scheduled to begin Jan. 3.

KHOU-TV, December 8, 2006

A local psychiatrist was sentenced to prison and ordered to pay millions to the Medicare and Medicaid programs for his involvement in a motorized wheelchair fraud scheme, U.S. Attorney Don DeGabrielle said Wednesday.

Lewis Gottlieb was given six years and six months in federal prison without parole and will pay more than $20.6 million in restitution for the scheme.

Dr. Gottlieb was one of a group of people indicted in September 2003 after an extensive investigation revealed his involvement in the scheme with owners of durable medical equipment companies and recruiters to defraud the Medicare and Medicaid programs.

Over the two-year period of the scam's operation, the companies and Dr. Gottlieb were paid more than $20 million by Medicare and Medicaid.

The case was the result of a joint investigation conducted by FBI, the Department of Health and Human Services, and the Texas Attorney General's Medicaid Fraud Control Unit of the Office.

Psychiatrist Gets Prison, Fine In Wheelchair Scam (HC)

By Harvey Rice, Houston Chronicle

Houston Chronicle, December 8, 2006

A Houston psychiatrist was sentenced to more than six years in prison and ordered to pay $20.6 million in restitution for defrauding the federal government in a scheme to sell unneeded motorized wheelchairs.

U.S. District Court Judge Lee Rosenthal also ordered Tuesday that Dr. Lewis Gottlieb forfeit $19 million in proceeds or property derived from a scheme to defraud Medicare and Medicaid.

Gottlieb was indicted in September 2003 with six others accused of involvement in a separate group operating the same fraud scheme.

He was among the first to be targeted in a federal crackdown on a widespread scheme that, at the time, was centered in Houston.

Since his arrest, two doctors who worked with Gottlieb and three medical equipment suppliers involved in the scheme have been convicted by a jury and are awaiting sentencing.

Gottlieb admitted accepting $200 kickbacks for each prescription he wrote for a motorized wheelchair, most of which were unneeded. The kickbacks were paid by recruiters working for medical supply companies, prosecutors said.

He also admitted that he refused to sign prescriptions unless patients also agreed to sign a form showing they needed his psychiatric services, for which Gottlieb billed the government.

Medical supply companies used the prescriptions to bill Medicare and Medicaid for motorized wheelchairs costing more than $4,000, then substituted motorized scooters costing about $1,600 and pocketed the difference, prosecutors said.

Trial Centers On Dispute Over War Protesters' Arrests (NYT)

By Anemona Hartocollis

The New York Times, December 8, 2006

It started as a tiny act of protest. Cindy Sheehan, the mother of a soldier killed in Iraq who had held a vigil near President Bush's ranch, and a group of women wanted to submit a petition to the United States Mission to the United Nations in Manhattan, demanding an end to the war.

But Ms. Sheehan and three other women were handcuffed, arrested and jailed overnight. Now their misdemeanor trial in Manhattan Criminal Court has turned into a look at the use — and they say abuse — of police power, in the face of an antiwar protest.

At the trial, the police and security officers told the jury that the four women had sat down and blocked the entrance to the building, and had resisted arrest by refusing to follow the instructions of arresting officers.

And yesterday, Peggy Kerry, the sister of Senator John Kerry of Massachusetts and a liaison at the mission, testified that she was planning to meet with the protesters, but told one of them that she would not meet with the press because that was not her job. After learning that they had a celebrity, Ms. Sheehan, with them, Ms. Kerry turned off her phone and had no further contact with them.

"I was angry that they had not told me Cindy Sheehan would be there," Ms. Kerry, a prosecution witness, said, under questioning by Ms. Sheehan's lawyer, Robert Gottlieb.

The women, who showed a television news videotape in court yesterday to buttress their case, say the police and the security staff at the building, a private office building run by the Macklowe organization, locked the doors, refused to accept their petition and hemmed them in from all sides.

The video shows police officers, some wearing helmets, moving in on the protesters, who are sitting in a public plaza. As the police handcuff the women leading the protest, the video shows Ms. Sheehan lying on the ground, hands behind her back, with her shirt pulled up and bra exposed.

An arresting officer testified that Ms. Sheehan asked him to pull her shirt down and that he did.

The police have testified that the arrests were routine. But the women say their treatment harks back to a pattern of excessive force by the police during the Republican National Convention in New York in 2004 and in other demonstrations around the city, a "policy of stifling dissent by arresting noted people," Mr. Gottlieb said yesterday.

He said that locking them up instead of giving them desk appearance tickets for misdemeanor offenses was "piling on."

Paul J. Browne, the deputy police commissioner for public information, said yesterday that the police "routinely accommodate dissent." However, he said, "individuals who choose to engage in civil disobedience and, I would maintain, expect to be arrested, often are."

On March 6, the day they were arrested, the four defendants — Ms. Sheehan, 49, who lives in Northern California; the Rev. Patricia Ackerman, 48, an Episcopal priest; Susan Benjamin, 54, known as Medea; and Melissa Beattie, 57, known as Missy, were participating in a series of events to celebrate International Women's Day. Mr. Gottlieb said they had no intention of being arrested and were scheduled to take a van to Washington that afternoon, a trip that they would miss.

The case is expected to go to the jury today. So far, none of the women have testified, and their lawyers did not say whether they would. The oldest of Ms. Sheehan's four children, Casey, a soldier, was killed in Iraq in April 2004 at the age of 24, and she has spoken out against the war ever since, most notably by camping out near President Bush's ranch in Texas in the summer of 2005.

A prosecution witness, Detective Frank Bogucki, said that as soon as the women appeared at the building on East 45th Street, senior police officers tried to steer them into a "designated area set aside for them opposite the U.S. Mission" while building security locked the doors.

Ms. Kerry said that she had originally agreed to meet with Ms. Ackerman and a delegation of Iraqi women to accept the petition. But Ms. Kerry said that when she saw Ms. Ackerman with a large group of protesters and members of the news media, she turned off her cellphone.

Richard Grenell, the mission's head of external relations and Ms. Kerry's boss, characterized the demonstration during testimony yesterday as a "media event." He said he had seen women dressed in pink, to signify their membership in Code Pink, an antiwar group, being followed by reporters, and had agreed to meet with two women in his offices, but not "in front of cameras."

Then building security officials intervened, he said, and decided to close the building to maintain public safety.

"These women in pink looked dangerous?" Mr. Gottlieb asked.

"It sounds like women in pink are innocent," Mr. Grenell replied. "But I was nervous that day. First of all, they were marching towards the mission. The police were coming. They clearly were happy, and they were not paying attention to anything else."

New Tack On Teen Justice: A Push Away From Prisons (CSM)

By Amanda Paulson

The Christian Science Monitor, December 8, 2006

CHICAGO

Cook County, home of the nation's first juvenile court, created in 1899, hasn't always had the best track record for dealing with young offenders.

A 1995 Chicago Tribune editorial deplored the local juvenile detention center's filthy conditions, unqualified staff, and children who "languish there like warehoused animals."

But these days, spurred by a state recidivism rate around 50 percent and research showing clear differences between the ways adolescents and adults cope with jail time, Illinois is rethinking its approach to juvenile justice.

In doing so, it's leading a wave of new policy approaches nationwide that emphasize rehabilitation and intervention programs over simple punishment and incarceration for youths, or the "scaring them straight" strategies favored by many during the 1990s crime waves.

The state's pilot programs and brand new Juvenile Justice Department were centerpieces of a MacArthur Foundation conference on juvenile justice reform this week - just a few days after the Department of Justice released new statistics showing that a record 7 million Americans, or 1 in 32 adults, is now in prison or on parole.

Other states, like Louisiana, Pennsylvania, Missouri, and Washington have been experimenting with similar programs.

"People have a sense that incarceration in itself, at the levels that we are incarcerating kids, doesn't necessarily work," says Jason Ziedenberg, executive director of the Justice Policy Institute, which favors juvenile justice reform. "Because of the falling crime rates, because of the state budget crisis, which makes states look at how much they spend on the justice system, because of Roper v. Simmons [the 2005 Supreme Court case that made capital punishment illegal for offenders under the age of 18], and because of the research, we have seen a sea change."

The tougher approaches - including automatically trying kids as adults for certain crimes or imprisoning them for even minor offenses - were mostly spurred by the crime waves of the 1980s and early 90s, when fear of the young "super predator" was widespread.

A report by the National Council on Crime and Delinquency shows a 208 percent increase in the number of offenders under 18 serving time in adult jails between 1990 and 2004. Since it peaked in 1999 at close to 9,500 youths, that number has started to drop off, but reform advocates say it's still too high.

Of equal concern to many juvenile advocates is the willingness of some judges to ship kids to detention centers, even if their crimes are relatively minor.

Recent research has shown that adolescents perceive punishment fundamentally differently from adults, says Laurie Garduque, research director for the John D. and Catherine T. MacArthur Foundation, which has funded many studies in the area. They're less inhibited, more impulsive, have a shakier understanding of consequences, are more susceptible to peer pressure - and are also far more receptive to rehabilitation efforts than adults.

"We know that having committed a serious crime [as a youth] doesn't mean you're on a pathway to becoming a career criminal," says Ms. Garduque. "We thought we could find a third way in this polarized debate, with the adult [jail time] that were being adopted by states and advocates saying that the juvenile justice system had lost its way."

As a result, MacArthur has invested close to $100 million in state juvenile justice reform, particularly in programs that focus on alternatives to secure detention centers, which critics say can turn a minor delinquent into a more hardened criminal.

In Illinois, advocates are hoping that the new Department of Juvenile Justice - separate from the Department of Corrections - will help change a culture that gave little thought to rehabilitation and has a recidivism rate close to 50 percent.

"The whole juvenile justice system in Cook County is now trying to divert kids from going deeper into the system," says Paula Wolff, a senior executive at Chicago Metropolis 2020, a nonpartisan think tank.

At Chicago's brand-new Juvenile Intervention Center police can bring youths in for assessment, and workers spend time trying to match kids up with social or mental-health services.

"Rules without relationship breeds rebellion," says Azim Ramelize, assistant commissioner for the Chicago Department of Children and Youth Services. Mr. Ramelize, a former gang leader who eventually attended law school, says he knows first-hand the ways in which the system often fails troubled kids. He and the center connect the teens with mental-health services, alternative schools, and community or church programs that meet those needs.

Focusing on rehabilitation, makes financial sense as well, advocates say. The cost of incarceration in the state is now more than $70,000 a year per juvenile - seven times the state's budget for K through 12 education, and significantly higher than the proposed rehabilitation and prevention programs.

"The kids whose mental health needs are diagnosed and treated, they have extraordinarily low recidivism rates,"says George Timberlake, who retired as chief judge of the state's Second Circuit Court last week. "We're trying to show communities and states attorneys that you can be smart on crime without being tough on crime - that you can use intelligent responses instead of punitive responses, and achieve a better result."

Phoenix Crime Wave May Be Over (USAT)

By Judi Villa

USA Today, December 8, 2006

PHOENIX — Three months after Mark Goudeau was arrested and accused of a sexual assault linked to the "Baseline Killer" cases, Phoenix police say they are confident he is responsible for a string of murders, rapes and robberies that terrorized the city for 13 months.

Police are asking Maricopa County prosecutors to charge Goudeau with an additional 71 crimes, including nine murders, five sexual assaults and 12 armed robberies.

Maricopa County Attorney Andrew Thomas said Thursday that he will review the 15,000 pages of documents in the case and recommend charges. "I still believe this man should never again be able to walk the streets of this Valley," Thomas said.

Phoenix police Lt. Benny Piña said, "We've locked in on the one suspect. There isn't anybody else out there."

Police say ballistics, DNA and circumstantial evidence combined to point to Goudeau as the man who plucked random victims from public places after dark, often while wearing a disguise.

"The person who committed those crimes is in custody," Assistant Chief Kevin Robinson said.

The name Baseline Killer comes from the Phoenix street where some of the earliest crimes in the series occurred.

Police remain tight-lipped about the exact evidence they say links Goudeau to the attacks. Commander Joe Klima said authorities don't want to say too much before Goudeau is formally charged.

"We're confident with the evidence we have," Klima said.

Assistant Chief Tracy Montgomery said even though formal charges have not been filed against Goudeau, police decided to go public to put the community at ease that the right man is in custody.

"There's tons of women that are making decisions about the way they live their lives because they're not sure," Montgomery said. "This is the guy. "

Trying to link Goudeau to the attacks has been a painstaking process that has unfolded slowly in the months since he was arrested for the September 2005 sexual assaults of two sisters at a south Phoenix park. Goudeau has been indicted on 20 counts relating to that attack. He has pleaded not guilty.

The nine homicides all have been linked by ballistics, Piña said. Police have not found the murder weapon but they say they have DNA evidence from some of those homicides. Sgt. Andy Hill said two searches of Goudeau's home were "productive."

"When you put the pieces of the puzzle together, it all points to him," Piña said. "We've done a lot to make sure we were right."

The Baseline Killer case is one of two serial predator cases in the Phoenix area. In the other case, dubbed the "Serial Shooter," police arrested roommates Dale Hausner, 33, and Samuel John Dieteman, 31, in August.

The two men are accused of driving around the city and its suburbs at night, firing at people randomly from a car. Seven people were killed.

Prosecutors have charged Hausner and Dieteman with numerous counts, ranging from murder to arson. Both men have pleaded not guilty.

Pastor's Shooting Was Possibly Premeditated (WP)

By Joshua Partlow And Hamil R. Harris

The Washington Post, December 8, 2006

DOJ_NMG_0103982

Prince George's County police are looking into the possibility that a slain Suitland minister was not the victim of a random shooting but was targeted for personal reasons.

The Rev. Milton L. Moore, pastor of Warriors for Christ Ministries, was shot outside his ministry Wednesday morning. Police are following leads that the killing may have been premeditated, said a law enforcement source who spoke on condition of anonymity because the investigation is ongoing.

Police declined to discuss possible motives for the shooting.

No arrests have been made, said Cpl. Clinton Copeland, a police spokesman. Detectives are following leads from people who said they heard arguing outside the ministry building before the shooting took place. The ministry is in the 2400 block of Brooks Drive and shares a parking lot with Drew-Freeman Middle School.

Moore, 50, grew up in Albany, Ga., was married with four children, and had run the ministry since the late 1990s. In addition to being a religious center, the three-story building served as a transitional home for as many as 20 families, according to a ministry official.

The slaying outraged local religious leaders and focused attention on church security. The Rev. Jonathan Weaver, a pastor of the Greater Mount Nebo African Methodist Episcopal Church in Bowie, said that he has referred people to Moore's ministry and that his death is a "major tragedy."

"I am deeply saddened by what happened," he said. "It is not a question of size of the church, because the size of the problem has gotten so big in terms of the level of danger that it can affect any church."

Although police were focusing on personal motives, they have not ruled out the possibility of random street crime.

Weaver's church was robbed on Christmas Day last year, and he said police officers in his congregation help watch over other members.

"We used to not equate crime with a bedroom community or the faith community, but I am afraid that now we find serious crimes being perpetuated in these areas," he said.

In 2000, Monsignor Thomas Wells was fatally stabbed during a robbery and burglary at the Mother Seton Parish rectory in Germantown. A 26-year-old man who claimed that the priest had sexually assaulted him was convicted of second-degree murder in 2001.

The Rev. Jeffrey M. Defayette, pastor of St. Matthias the Apostle Catholic Church in Lanham, was based at Mother Seton before Wells's death, and the killing reinforced his awareness that security needs to be a top priority, he said. At St. Matthias, he added an alarm system and motion detectors, revamped outdoor lighting, trimmed overhanging limbs that obscured views from inside the church and installed a security camera so that the secretary can see who is at the door.

"We live, unfortunately, in an era where there are people . . . bent on doing some form of evil for their own means, whether that be for money or for property or for prestige," Defayette said. "We try to be accommodating to our parishioners but also conscious of the fact that we need to be security savvy."

St. Matthias has experienced some thefts -- two snowblowers, some garden equipment -- and vandalism during Defayette's six year tenure. "If that's the worst that happens to us, we consider ourselves blessed," he said.

In Moore's killing, police said approximately four shots were fired about 7 a.m., and the minister was struck once in the upper body. He was taken to a hospital in critical condition and died later that day.

Moore's wife and children, along with staff members at the ministry, have not talked publicly about his slaying. A family representative said yesterday that the family would speak to reporters today and discuss funeral arrangements.

Warriors for Christ is a grass-roots ecumenical ministry that focuses on providing assistance to poor and homeless families. Its Web site says the ministry is "training up a body of bold 'Warriors' to go forth . . . setting the captives free."

CIVIL LAW:

Army Retiree Files Suit, Claims Leave Was Denied (BSUN)

By Melissa Harris

The Baltimore Sun, December 8, 2006

A Northern Virginia man has sued the Department of Defense in federal court over the way it calculated his leave after he transferred from active duty to a civilian position at the agency.

By Mark Romaneski's count, he's out 240 hours, or 30 days, of leave after the Army decided to treat the retired colonel in the Judge Advocate General's Corps as if he were new to the agency rather than someone who was hired while finishing his military service.

Romaneski, now chief attorney at the Defense Department's installation management command, is representing himself in the case and said he estimates that "a couple hundred" people are in a similar position.

Romaneski and other affected employees at Aberdeen Proving Ground and Fort Meade have filed complaints about their leave calculations with the Army, said Doug Dribben, a civilian attorney at Fort Meade who estimates that the Army owes him 330 hours of leave, almost $16,000 if paid in a lump sum.

Dribben and Romaneski are asking the Department of Defense to take into account their decades of military service when calculating their leave as civilian employees.

"We want the Defense Department to treat us the same way any other federal agency would have if we had gone to work for them," said Dribben. The Pentagon is the only federal employer resisting this action, he said.

Before Sept. 11, 2001, it wasn't possible for someone in Dribben's situation to have his years of military service count toward his leave.

Military retirees were required to wait 180 days - a "cooling off" period - before being hired as civilian employees, making them new workers.

But after the terrorist attacks, the government needed to launch a considerable recruiting effort, and President Bush issued an executive order eliminating the 180-day wait and enabling the more generous leave calculation.

Dribben and Romaneski were hired while on terminal leave from the military, the final weeks of leave before being discharged. Such leave is designed to give soldiers time to look for jobs and shift their families to civilian life.

There is precedent for Romaneski's lawsuit. In January, the Office of Personnel Management ruled that a civilian Air Force attorney in a similar situation was entitled to the additional leave.

According to Department of Defense e-mails provided to The Sun, the Army disagreed with OPM's ruling in that case and has asked the Department of Justice to review it. A Nov. 21 e-mail from the Army's civilian personnel department states that Dribben's leave will be calculated based on the Department of Justice's decision.

A spokesman for OPM referred questions to the Justice Department, and the Department of Defense did not respond to a request from The Sun.

Although the post-Sept. 11 rules were in effect when Dribben and Romaneski became civilians, Congress changed the leave calculation rules this year to match the Defense Department's stricter guidelines.

That means that although Dribben and Romaneski might win hundreds more hours of leave through litigation or a favorable decision from the Department of Justice, people hired as civilians after Oct. 27, 2006, will not.

The change was outlined in one sentence in the behemoth, $532.8 billion defense spending bill that President Bush signed in October.

No hearing date for Romaneski's case in U.S. District Court has been set.

CIVIL RIGHTS:

2 Lucas County Sheriff's Deputies Indicted By Federal Grand Jury For Civil Rights Violations (TOLB)

Toledo Blade (OH), December 8, 2006

A federal grand jury in Toledo has indicted two Lucas County sheriff's deputies on charges they violated the civil rights of a 15-year boy who suffered a broken jaw and other injuries at the county Juvenile Justice Center last year.

Troy Jackson, 45, and Marc Odoms, 38, both of Toledo, were also charged with conspiring to obstruct, and obstructing a federal investigation into the incident. The two men work at the county Juvenile Justice Center.

If convicted, both men face a maximum sentence of 10 years in prison and fines of $250,000 on each criminal civil rights and obstruction charge. Deputy Odoms faces an additional five years in prison if convicted on a false statements charge.

In January, 2005, the boy was handcuffed and was being moved from a courtroom to a detention area when he head-butted a security employee. Deputy Jackson wrestled the youth to the ground.

In February, 2005, Sheriff James Telb cleared Deputy Jackson of any wrongdoing. He said he had not known about the broken jaw at the time. The FBI and the Lucas County Children's Service were continuing their investigation.

The incident was first reported by the boy's mother, who contacted Toledo police.

According to the U.S. Justice Department, prosecutors allege that Deputy Jackson physically assaulted the boy by striking him in the eye and the side of the face. Deputy Odoms allegedly watched the assault and failed to invervene.

Both men, the indictment alleges, agreed to, and did, obstruct the investigation by creating false written reports and making false statements. A preliminary court hearing date has not been set.

Former Officer Admits Jude Lie (MJS)

By Gina Barton

Milwaukee Journal Sentinel, December 8, 2006

He could face 10 years in prison for obstructing justice

Former Milwaukee police Officer Joseph Stromei told a federal judge Thursday that he lied about the beating of Frank Jude Jr., both to investigators and during a state trial of three former officers in April.

"I didn't cooperate with investigators and I failed to be forthcoming (about) . . . what happened on that night," Stromei told U.S. District Judge Charles N. Clevert Jr. in federal court in Milwaukee.

The statements came during a hearing at which Stromei, 33, pleaded guilty to a charge of obstruction of justice. He faces a maximum penalty of 10 years in prison and a fine of $250,000 when he is sentenced April 12.

Jude was beaten outside an off-duty officer's party in Bay View in October 2004. Jude, Lovell Harris and two women were invited to the party by another woman but quickly left. They were followed out, and Jude was accused of stealing a wallet and badge, which he denied. No badge has ever been found, and Jude was never charged with theft.

Jude and witnesses said up to a dozen off-duty officers beat and kicked him in the body and head, cut off his clothes, jammed something in both ears and threatened him with a knife. Jude, who is biracial, and Harris, who is black, both said their attackers, who are all white, used racial slurs during the beating.

Stromei admitted to Clevert that he lied during the Milwaukee County Circuit Court trial of three of those now-former officers - Jon Bartlett, Andrew Spengler and Daniel Masarik. They were acquitted. The jury deadlocked on a single count against Bartlett.

U.S. Attorney Steven M. Biskupic launched the federal probe soon after. Bartlett, Masarik and Spengler are among eight officers who have been federally charged. They and two others, Ryan Packard and Ryan Lemke, have pleaded not guilty.

In addition to Stromei, former officers Jon Clausing and Joseph Schabel have pleaded guilty to felonies and agreed to cooperate with prosecutors. Clausing and Schabel are scheduled to be sentenced in May, but U.S. District Judge J.P. Stadtmueller agreed to delay their sentencings if the other officers' trial is not over by then. Trial testimony is one way to gauge the value of defendants' cooperation and could influence the prosecutor's sentencing recommendations.

Clevert denied a similar request in the case of Stromei, even though both the prosecution and the defense agreed to it.

"I will set this case as I usually do," he told the lawyers.

Throughout the state investigation and trial, Stromei consistently said he did not see anyone punch Jude or threaten him with a knife.

But two months ago, Stromei confessed to the FBI that he saw one off-duty officer punch Jude and saw another brandish a knife at him. Stromei contends that he was intoxicated during the beating and cannot remember whether he touched Jude. Evidence indicates that Stromei held Jude down, according to his plea agreement.

"I witnessed the entire event," Stromei told Clevert on Thursday. "I was upstairs and when I came out, it looked like an arrest that started out all right and then was going awry."

In exchange for pleading guilty and cooperating with prosecutors, Stromei will not be charged with perjury in state court, according to records. However, his plea agreement states that if authorities gain credible evidence that Stromei beat Jude, he can be charged for that.

LAPD Officer Arrested For Holding Room Assault (LAT)

By Richard Winton And Patrick Mcgreevy

The Los Angeles Times, December 8, 2006

A veteran Los Angeles Police Department officer was arrested this morning for assaulting a handcuffed 16-year-old in a police holding room Tuesday.

Chief William J. Bratton said he decided to arrest Sean Joseph Meade, 41, after viewing a videotape from inside the station that captured part of the assault. Bratton said the attack was without any physical provocation.

"The video in essence depicts what the preliminary investigation and I believe to have been an assault on the juvenile that was totally unnecessary and was not in any color of law justified," Bratton said. "Based on what I and my command staff witnessed on the video, we felt the behavior was nothing that we as a department can tolerate or condone."

This is the third video to surface in the last month showing LAPD officers involved in alleged misconduct. But Bratton said unlike the other two, which are still under investigation, this one was so egregious that he ordered the officer arrested immediately.

Mayor Antonio Villaraigosa strongly condemned the officer's conduct after receiving a briefing by LAPD officials on the incident.

"I am deeply disturbed by the allegations," Villaraigosa said in a statement released by his office.

"I believe that abuse of authority in the use of force, especially when directed at a minor, is a grave violation of the trust we place in law enforcement and an insult to the values of the brave men and women of the LAPD who put their lives on the line to keep us safe," the mayor said.

Villaraigosa said the swift investigation and Bratton's order of an arrest were appropriate and a sign the system is working.

"I am confident that a full and thorough investigation is under way," Villaraigosa said. "If a crime was committed, I expect the case to be prosecuted to the fullest extent of the law."

Meade allegedly assaulted the 16-year-old Latino male after booking him into the LAPD Central Station. The youth had been detained about 1:30 a.m. Tuesday in Chinatown on a curfew violation and placed in a juvenile holding cell. After hearing a disturbance between Meade and the youth in the holding room, another officer alerted the watch commander, who immediately began an investigation into the incident, Bratton said.

The video was captured by a camera that had been set up in a detective's office to catch vandalism made to chairs in the detective's office. That office is near the juvenile holding room, which has no door. Other officers in the station were unaware of the camera.

A portion of the assault was caught on the camera, Bratton said. He declined to describe what exactly was on the tape other than to say it was an assault. Sources said the tape shows Meade appearing to choke the youth, whose hands were handcuffed behind his back. The 16-year-old told investigators that he had been slammed into a wall.

The youth was examined at a hospital and has no apparent injuries, Bratton said. The youth was returned to Juvenile Hall and remains there because no parents or guardians have been located for him.

Bratton ordered that Meade be suspended immediately. The department has also been in contact with the FBI. Because of state laws and internal restrictions, the videotape will not be released, Bratton said.

Meade was arrested early today at his home in southeast Los Angeles County by LAPD Internal Affairs officers.

Meade is a 13-year veteran of the department who had recently transferred from the Newton Division, which covers south Los Angeles, to the Central Station, which patrols downtown.

Meade was booked on suspicion of assault under the color of authority, which means assault on someone who was under the control of an officer. The district attorney has not yet filed charges against Meade, who is being held at the sheriff's station in Pico Rivera.

The latest allegation of police brutality stung city officials, including Police Commission President John Mack, who are frustrated that it comes on the heels of a series of controversial incidents of police force.

"It is just mind-boggling that we have a situation where a 16-year-old Latino kid is arrested and handcuffed and sitting in a room posing no threat to anyone and this officer just comes in and beats the hell out of him," Mack said. "It's unacceptable."

The commission president, a onetime civil rights leader, said the panel will discuss the incident at its meeting Tuesday and has asked its inspector general, Andre Birotte, to monitor the department's investigation.

"I applaud the chief for taking quick decisive action," Mack said. "People like that officer don't need to be police officers. His behavior crossed the line. It was criminal."

Tip From Drug Suspect Led Police To Johnston's House (AJC)

By Bill Torpy, The Atlanta Journal-constitution

The Atlanta Journal-Constitution, December 8, 2006

It was Fabian Sheats' third felony drug arrest in four months. But on the afternoon of Nov. 21, according to a police report, he was looking to curry favor, so he told officers they could find a kilogram of cocaine in a house at 933 Neal Street N.W.

That encounter led police to the home of Kathryn Johnston, an elderly woman who lived alone behind burglar bars and kept a rusty revolver. When officers burst into the house just three hours after talking to Sheats, a shootout ensued that left the woman dead and three officers wounded. No cocaine was found.

Sheats' arrest report, made public Thursday, sheds new light on why officers targeted Johnston's home.

Police say they used Sheats' tip to direct a confidential informant to the Neal Street house, where he made a drug buy, leading them to conduct the raid. A man named Alexis White later came forward to say he is a longtime informant and police asked him to lie after the shootings and say he bought drugs at the address. Police will not say who the informant was.

A tape of a 911 call released Thursday added a strange twist to the ever-changing tragedy.

On the tape, an insistent and anxious-sounding man identifying himself as White told an operator, "I have two cops chasing me. They're on the dirty side, two undercover officers."

Atlanta police declined Thursday to discuss the case, referring questions to federal authorities, who are not commenting.

DOJ_NMG_0103986

Eight narcotics officers have been put on administrative leave while federal, state and Fulton County authorities investigate the shooting.

Markel Hutchins, an activist who has become spokesman for Johnston's family, said the family "vehemently denies" knowing Sheats.

"Never heard of him at all. This is yet another story that comes out of the Atlanta Police Department," Hutchins said. "The reality: There was no cocaine found there. This whole notion that there were drugs in her house is wrong."

Sheats, 23, was arrested at about 4 p.m. that Tuesday afternoon about five blocks from Johnston's home, after police allegedly observed him selling marijuana in the 1100 block of Simpson Street. It was the third time since July that Sheats had been arrested near that block and charged with possession of drugs with intent to distribute.

According to the report, written by police investigator Arthur Tesler, Sheats "wanted to take us to a house that had a kilo of cocaine. Sheats directed us to 933 Neal Street N.W. where a buy of crack cocaine was later made and a search warrant drawn up for that location."

"Sheats did state he was in that house (933 Neal St.) at about 3 p.m. on November 21st and saw the kilo broken up in a shoe box," the report continued.

Sheats was familiar to Tesler. The officer had arrested him less than two months earlier.

Tesler is one of two officers who obtained a "no-knock" search warrant for the Johnston house. The officers obtained the warrant, which allows officers to kick the door in unannounced, about 6 p.m. the same day — two hours after Sheats' arrest.

An hour later, just before 7 p.m., a police team raided the home of Johnston, whose age has been given as both 88 and 92.

It took at least a minute to pry open the burglar bars at the home. When officers came through the door, police said, Johnston opened fire.

Sheats' grandfather, Tommy Brooks, who lives nearby, said he had heard a couple days after the shooting his grandson had "tipped them off, something like that. I don't think he'd do that, but I don't really know."

Another family member who lived nearby was more emphatic. "He's not a rat," said the man who did not want to be identified. "He's hard as a brick and very stubborn."

Sheats is being held at the Fulton County Jail on drug charges. A hold on Sheats by the U.S. marshal's office is listed in the jail records.

Sheats' arrest report, written by Tesler at 10 p.m. on the night of the shooting, does not say who made the alleged drug buy at the house. White, an acknowledged informant, told WAGA-TV and police that, after the shootings, narcotics officers told him to make up a story about buying drugs at the Neal Street house.

To obtain the search warrant, police told the judge that the informant told them that a man named "Sam" greeted him at the front door, went back into the house and came back with two bags of crack cocaine.

On the 911 tape police released Thursday, White said he was waiting for agents from the federal Bureau of Alcohol, Tobacco, Firearms and Explosives to pick him up on Nov. 22 when he was approached by Atlanta police. He got into the car with them, he told the operator, but jumped out when he talked to federal agents by cellphone and they told him not to get into the squad car.

"They came and picked me up they asked me about that killing yesterday," White told the operator. "But, ah, they tryin' to play it off. So ATF told me 'Don't get in the car with them.' By that time then, I was already in the car with 'em."

The operator sounded incredulous. "OK, so you're calling the police to say the police are chasing you?" she asked.

"Listen to me," the frustrated White responded. "I don't know who's on whose side; they're playing dirty," he said. "There's a lot of stuff going on."

A listing of the items found at Johnston's home included a small amount of marijuana. But Johnston's family is "denying on every level that any marijuana or any drugs of any kind were in that house," Hutchins said.

Obtaining a search warrant so quickly after Sheats' arrest is not unusual, said DeKalb County Magistrate David Wood, a vice chairman of the statewide Magistrate Court Training Council.

Police officers often begin the process of obtaining a warrant while a suspect is being detained at the alleged crime scene, Wood said. An officer at the scene will call another officer with information needed to get a warrant. The second officer types up the request for a warrant, then files it with a judge.

"We've had that happen where Officers 'A' through 'D' hold a situation. Officer 'E' types it up, and Officer 'F' brings it over," Cook said.

State law allows a search to be conducted the minute a warrant is signed by a judge, even before the warrant has arrived at the location to be searched, Wood said.

"Case law says that if a judge issues a warrant at, say, 7:01 p.m., the police can radio that a judge has signed the warrant and [police] can go in while the actual warrant is coming out to them," Wood said. "They don't have to wait for it to physically get there."

ANTITRUST:

Antitrust Policy Ambiguity To Be On Justices' Docket (NYT)

By Linda Greenhouse

The New York Times, December 8, 2006

WASHINGTON, Dec. 7 — The Supreme Court added two important antitrust cases on Thursday to its calendar for the current term. Both cases, granted at the request of defendants in private antitrust suits, are likely to lead to clarification of areas of antitrust law that have increasingly become unsettled.

One case has been closely watched on Wall Street. It is a class-action lawsuit against more than a dozen leading investment banks and institutional investors that took part in syndicates to underwrite the initial public offerings of hundreds of technology companies in the 1990s.

The suit, brought by purchasers of the stocks, charges that the sharing of information among the underwriters and the way in which they allocated shares to their customers amounted to an antitrust conspiracy.

The Federal District Court in Manhattan dismissed the lawsuit in 2003, finding that the defendants were entitled to antitrust immunity because much of the conduct they were said to have engaged in was explicitly permitted by the Securities and Exchange Commission.

The United States Court of Appeals for the Second Circuit, however, reinstated the suit last year, ruling that Congress had granted no such immunity.

The issue for the Supreme Court in this case, Credit Suisse First Boston v. Billing, No. 05-1157, is how to treat the inherently collaborative activity of an underwriting syndicate, activity that — while it would appear to violate the Sherman Antitrust Act — is permitted by the regulatory agency that oversees it.

While the eventual outcome of the case is uncertain, there is little uncertainty about the second antitrust case the court accepted. The question in that case, Leegin Creative Leather Products v. PSKS, No. 06-480, is how antitrust law should treat the minimum prices that manufacturers require retailers to charge for their products.

In a 1911 case known as the Dr. Miles precedent, this practice of "resale price maintenance" was deemed always illegal under the Sherman Act. The case asks the justices to re-evaluate the precedent in light of modern economic theory, and instead to make these arrangements subject to case-by-case analysis under what is known as the rule of reason.

In other areas of antitrust law, the court has steadily backed away from a categorical view of antitrust liability and is highly likely to use this case as a vehicle for doing the same for resale price maintenance.

Leegin, a privately owned company, manufactures the Brighton line of women's leather goods and does business only with retailers, mostly small specialty stores, who agree to abide by the suggested retail prices for the products. In 2002, after learning that Kay's Kloset, a store in Lewisville, Tex., was discounting Brighton products, Leegin suspended shipments.

The store brought an antitrust suit and won more than $1 million in damages, which are tripled under antitrust law. The United States Court of Appeals for the Fifth Circuit, in New Orleans, upheld the judgment. In August, the justices granted a stay to enable Leegin to file a Supreme Court appeal. Such a stay is a fairly unusual action that sends a strong signal that the justices believe that a case is worthy of their attention and that the lower court's decision was probably wrong.

Leegin's appeal argues that "the per se rule against resale price maintenance squarely conflicts with this court's modern antitrust jurisprudence" and has "no foundation in economic theory." It argues that minimum prices can enhance competition and help consumers by providing incentives to retailers to compete in such nonprice areas as customer service.

If the court accepts Leegin's argument, a decision about whether any particular minimum price arrangement actually confers a consumer benefit would be subject to case-by-case appraisal under the rule-of-reason analysis that the court already applies to the setting of price ceilings and nonprice retail conditions. Formerly, the court applied a rule of categorical invalidity to those practices as well.

In the securities underwriting case, the court will be scrutinizing a variety of practices that amount to standard conduct on Wall Street: forming a syndicate, ascertaining potential customer interest to determine the size and price of the offering, and then sharing information and markets among competitors. The plaintiffs contend that the underwriters inflated prices by improperly dividing the market and imposing unlawful conditions on their customers.

When the appeal reached the Supreme Court last spring, the justices asked the solicitor general's office to advise them of the federal government's view. That request presented a problem because there was no unified government view. Conduct that the Justice Department's antitrust division regarded as barred under the Sherman Act was seen by the S.E.C. as legal.

A carefully worded brief by the solicitor general, filed last month, urged the court to take the case and find a way to reconcile "two federal statutes critical to the efficient functioning of our economy."

The brief said the court of appeals failed "to make sufficient accommodation for the securities laws' policy of encouraging certain types of collaborative activity."

It added, however, that the district court was also wrong to consider all conduct connected with initial public offerings to be immune from antitrust liability. The brief said the complaint in this lawsuit needed to be examined carefully to make sure that it was based on something more than "conclusory or ambiguous allegations."

Briefs urging the justices to hear to hear the case were also filed by the New York Stock Exchange, NASD and other industry groups.

Investment Banks Get High Court Hearing On IPO Suit (Update1) (BLOOM)

By Greg Stohr

Bloomberg, December 8, 2006

Dec. 7 (Bloomberg) -- The U.S. Supreme Court will consider shielding securities firms from antitrust suits, agreeing to review an appeal from investment banks fighting accusations that they rigged initial public offerings.

The justices today said they will hear arguments from 16 investment banks and institutional investors, including Credit Suisse Group, Goldman Sachs Group Inc. and Merrill Lynch & Co. The group wants to overturn a decision by the New York-based 2nd U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals, which said the suits could go forward.

That ruling ``threatens the public offering process" by limiting the ability of underwriters to work together on initial public offerings, the firms contended in their appeal.

The appeal, which has the partial backing of the Bush administration, seeks immunity for investment banks from antitrust suits over underwriting and other activities heavily regulated by the Securities and Exchange Commission.

A victory for the securities firms might also help other regulated businesses, including the trucking, airline, natural gas and electricity industries, according to University of Iowa antitrust professor Herbert Hovenkamp, who is advising the securities industry in the case.

The case is one of two antitrust disputes the court added to its agenda today, giving it four such cases for its 2006-07 term. The court also agreed to reconsider a 95-year-old antitrust precedent that bars manufacturers and distributors from setting minimum prices for their products at the retail level.

`Epic' Conspiracy Alleged

The decision to hear the IPO fight comes two days after the 2nd Circuit dealt a blow to a separate set of cases that accuse CSFB, Goldman Sachs and dozens of other banks of violating federal securities fraud laws by rigging IPOs. The appeals court said those suits can't go forward as class actions.

In the antitrust dispute, the 2nd Circuit said the suits make allegations of ``an epic Wall Street conspiracy" to profit at the expense of the investing public by artificially inflating the prices of 800 Internet stocks that had just been offered. The companies allegedly demanded kickbacks from clients and engaged in ``laddering" -- requiring clients to buy more stock, at higher prices, after the securities were sold to the public.

The defendants also include Citigroup Inc., Morgan Stanley, Lehman Brothers Holdings Inc., Bank of America Corp., Fidelity Investments, Janus Capital Group Inc. and Comerica Inc.

Hundreds of Internet start-ups were rushed to market during the IPO frenzy of the late 1990s and 2000. First-day gains from IPOs averaged 87 percent in 1999 and 71 percent in 2000, according to IPO researcher CommScan LLC, and underwriters pocketed billions of dollars in fees and commissions.

Shield Sought

The dispute, if it goes forward, has the potential to be a multibillion-dollar case, said Christopher Lovell, the lead lawyer for one group of investors. Under federal antitrust law, damages are automatically tripled.

JPMorgan Chase & Co. in April agreed to pay $425 million to settle IPO-rigging claims.

The question for the Supreme Court is the extent to which SEC oversight immunizes the securities industry from antitrust claims. The industry is seeking a shield broad enough to bar the IPO suits, arguing that the SEC specifically authorized companies to work together in syndicates to share the risk of offerings.

The court should ``prevent the securities regulatory scheme from being undermined by antitrust litigation," the securities firms argued.

Lawyers for the investors say Congress didn't intend to immunize the type of conduct at issue in the case. They say their suit wouldn't conflict with SEC oversight because the alleged wrongdoing violates the securities laws as well as the antitrust laws.

Administration Stance

``Congress and the SEC have been trying to stop tie-ins and laddering agreements for seven decades," Lovell argued in court papers.

The Bush administration's top courtroom lawyer, U.S. Solicitor General Paul Clement, is taking a position that would bar antitrust suits from relying on conduct that is permitted under SEC rules. In the case before the court, that approach would mean the investors couldn't base their suit on the type of underwriter collaboration the SEC specifically permits in its underwriting syndication rules.

Clement says the investors ought to be given the opportunity to redraft their complaints. Still, lawyers for the securities industry say the U.S. position ultimately would require dismissal of the case.

The government ``says you have to disentangle the permitted conduct from the possible nonpermitted conduct and the complaint doesn't do that," said Roy Englert, who filed a brief at the high court on behalf of the Securities Industry Association and other business groups.

Compromise Brief

Clement joined the securities firms in urging the court to take up the dispute. His brief, which came at the request of the court, marked a compromise between the SEC, which backed the industry at the lower court level in the case, and the Justice Department's antitrust division, which supported the investors.

Lovell, the investors' lawyer, said he wasn't surprised the justices agreed to hear the case in light of Clement's brief.

``I was somewhat surprised at the solicitor general's position, but after that I'm not surprised," he said.

Chief Justice John Roberts didn't take part in the decision to hear the case. Although Roberts didn't give a reason, he owns stock in Citigroup and at least one company, XM Satellite Radio Holdings Inc., that held an IPO during the 1990s.

The justices likely will hear arguments in February or March and will rule by July. The case is Credit Suisse v. Billing, 05-1157.

Supreme Court To Hear Wall St Appeal (FT)

By Patti Waldmeir In Washington

Financial Times, December 8, 2006

The US investment banking industry on Thursday won the intervention of the Supreme Court in fighting off allegations that Credit Suisse and others broke antitrust laws by rigging initial public offerings in the 1990s.

Early next year, the court will hear an appeal by investment banks and institutional investors, including Credit Suisse, Goldman Sachs and Merrill Lynch, who say they deserve immunity from antitrust suits over underwriting activities that are heavily regulated by the Securities and Exchange Commission. A federal ap-peals court said such suits could proceed.

Paul Atkins, an SEC commissioner, urged the court to take the case Billing v Credit Suisse First Boston, saying that such lawsuits “could devastate America’s process of capital formation, wreak unprecedented havoc on the underwriting business, and accelerate the marginalisation of our capital markets”.

The courts should not allow plaintiffs to “trump the securities law with the antitrust laws”, he said. A federal appeals court said the suits make allegations of “an epic Wall Street conspiracy” to profit at the expense of the investing public by artificially inflating the prices of internet stocks.

The industry is seeking to bar the IPO suits, arguing that the SEC specifically authorised companies to work together in syndicates to share the risk of offerings. Lawyers for the investors say Congress did not intend to immunise the type of conduct at issue in the case.

The Credit Suisse case was one of two antitrust disputes the court added to its agenda on Thursday, giving it four antitrust cases for its 2006-07 term. The court also agreed yesterday to reconsider a 95-year-old antitrust precedent that bars manufacturers and distributors from setting minimum prices for their products at the retail level.

The decision to hear the IPO fight comes two days after the 2nd Circuit dealt a blow to a separate set of cases that accuse Credit Suisse, Goldman Sachs and dozens of other banks of violating federal securities laws by rigging IPOs. The appeals court said those suits cannot go forward as class actions.

The US chamber of commerce on Thursday welcomed that decision, saying “certifying a massive class of institutional investors with little or no showing that the class met federal requirements is a classic invitation for blackmail settlements”.

“Courts have a duty to ensure that litigants, and the courts themselves, are not subjected to frivolous, expensive class actions,” said Robin Conrad of the Nat-ional Chamber Litigation Center.

Sirius Sees Benefits In Potential Merger With XM (WP)

By Chris Kirkham

The Washington Post, December 8, 2006

Executives of Sirius Satellite Radio are again hinting at a potential merger with XM Satellite Radio that they say would bring strong gains for investors.

Their statements boosted the stock prices of Sirius and XM this week, though both settled by the end of trading yesterday.

In two speeches in New York on Wednesday, Sirius executives mentioned "significant benefits" and "value creation" from a combination of the two radio companies.

"Consolidation creates value . . . particularly when you are in the same industry as another company to be able to combine," Sirius chief executive Mel Karmazin said. He and David J. Frear, Sirius's chief financial officer, spoke to analysts at a conference.

It is not the first time Sirius has dropped such a hint. Karmazin began his tenure at Sirius in early 2005 with media speculation about merger talks, which both companies denied took place. Since then, he has referred to the logic of a merger in calls with analysts.

A spokesman for XM declined to comment on what he called "speculation," and officials from Sirius did not return calls yesterday.

XM and Sirius are both wrestling with slowing subscription growth and huge debt. Neither company has yet earned a profit, though XM projects it will break even next year.

XM has more subscribers. Analysts estimate that the company has about 8 million, compared with about 6 million for Sirius. But it has about $1.3 billion in long-term debt, $3 million more than Sirius.

The two companies have scaled back subscriber projections in recent months.

"Both companies are realizing that the period of hyper-growth may be coming to a completion, and the stage of growth combined with cash creation will require more efficiencies," said Frederick W. Moran, a media stock analyst with the Stanford Group based in Boca Raton, Fla.

"Both Sirius and XM could prosper much more easily if they took up the fight against terrestrial radio operators, rather than against each other," Moran said. Sirius has a deal with radio host Howard Stern and rights to National Football League games. XM has rights to Major League Baseball games.

If the companies proposed to merge, the Federal Communications Commission and the Justice Department would review the case for antitrust concerns. The biggest question would be how the market is defined.

Experts say a strict interpretation of the satellite radio market by regulators would make a merger more difficult because an XM-Sirius combination would have monopoly power. If the market is interpreted more broadly to include on-demand MP3s or podcasts or traditional radio, a merger might go through more easily.

"If you define the market narrowly to be satellite radio, it's a two-to-one merger, which would raise red flags all over the place," said Luke M. Froeb, a professor at Vanderbilt University's Owen Graduate School of Business who used to analyze mergers at the Federal Trade Commission.

The idea of a satellite radio merger recalls a similar proposal in 2002 by satellite TV providers EchoStar Communications and DirecTV. That deal was rejected by the FCC and the Justice Department, which defined the satellite television market as separate from cable television.

The Justice Department would consider whether an XM-Sirius merger would lead to price increases of more than 5 percent. But for two companies still operating at a loss, it's difficult to say how much power they would have over the industry, said Mark Cooper, director of research at the Consumer Federation of America. "Because the industry is so new, we don't really know what the price equilibrium should be," he said.

Sirius stock closed yesterday at $3.88 a share, up 5 cents. XM closed at $14.81 a share, up 11 cents.

Specter Wants To Revisit NFL's Antitrust Status (AP)

Associated Press

AP, December 8, 2006

The NFL's ability to negotiate exclusive sports packages is under fire from the outgoing chairman of the Senate Judiciary Committee.

Sen. Arlen Specter (R-Pa.) twice said he would introduce legislation in the next session aimed at eliminating the league's freedom from antitrust laws.

DOJ_NMG_0103991

Specter said the NFL should not use the exemption to negotiate exclusive programming packages such as DirecTV's Sunday Ticket, which allows viewers to watch teams outside their regional market.

"As I look at what the NFL is doing today with the NFL channel with the DirecTV . . . a lot of people, including myself, would like to be able to have that ticket," Specter said.

But the 1961 law that gives the NFL this freedom should not apply to DirecTV because it is not "sponsored programming," said Stephen Ross, a law professor at Penn State and chair of the school's sports law institute. He said Specter might be using the threat of legislation to pressure the NFL to make changes voluntarily.

Access to out-of-market football games was one of many consumer fairness issues addressed during the hearing. Another hot topic was whether cable providers should be forced to share sports broadcasting rights with every service provider in an area.

David Cohen, executive vice president of Comcast Corp., said his company has not made a local Philadelphia sports network it owns available to DirecTV because it is one way his company can stay competitive with the Sunday Ticket package.

"What is sauce for the goose is sauce for the gander," he said.

Â· HONORS: San Francisco 49ers cornerback Walt Harris was named NFC defensive player of the month for November. Harris, who played for the Redskins in 2004 and 2005, had nine tackles, three interceptions and five forced fumbles as San Francisco went 3-1. Dallas Cowboys quarterback Tony Romo was the offensive player of the month, and Seattle's Nate Burleson was the conference's special teams player of the month.

The AFC's players of the month were San Diego's LaDainian Tomlinson (offense), Miami's Jason Taylor (defense) and Buffalo's Brian Moorman (special teams).

Â· BEARS: Defensive tackle Tommie Harris, who made the Pro Bowl a year ago in his second year, could miss the remainder of this season with a severe hamstring injury.

Harris left Sunday's game against Minnesota in the third quarter with what was originally announced as a sprained left knee. On Monday, Chicago Coach Lovie Smith said the injury was not season-ending.

But yesterday, Smith said the hamstring injury was more severe than the knee sprain and that Harris was slated to go to Dallas to see a specialist.

Â· PANTHERS: Quarterback Jake Delhomme missed practice again yesterday with ligament damage in the thumb on his throwing hand, increasing the likelihood that backup Chris Weinke will start Sunday against the New York Giants.

Carolina Coach John Fox said the ligament is stretched and not torn from the bone, which is why Delhomme doesn't need surgery. Fox didn't rule out the possibility that Delhomme, who is listed as questionable, could play Sunday.

Running back DeShaun Foster, who has missed the past two games with a hyperextended elbow, practiced and remains probable.

Â· BILLS: Safety Donte Whitner is questionable after he hurt his hamstring in practice, leaving Buffalo potentially minus another defensive starter when it plays the New York Jets this weekend.

Cornerback Terrence McGee and running back Willis McGahee missed practice for the second straight day with ankle injuries. Both are listed as questionable.

Specter Seeks To End NFL Antitrust TV Deal Exemption (Update1) (BLOOM)

By Christopher Stern

Bloomberg, December 8, 2006

Dec. 7 (Bloomberg) -- U.S. Senate Judiciary Committee Chairman Arlen Specter is taking aim at the antitrust exemption that lets the National Football League negotiate television deals on behalf of its 32 teams.

Specter, who will hand his chairman's gavel to a Democrat early next year, said he wants to curtail exclusive NFL TV deals, such as DirecTV Group Inc.'s Sunday Ticket package. Specter said Sunday Ticket hurts consumers because it excludes cable and broadcast TV audiences.

``I'm going to introduce legislation in the next session to take the exemption from the NFL," said Specter, a Republican from Pennsylvania, where the biggest U.S. cable company, Comcast Corp., is based. The NFL has benefited from the exemption, passed by Congress in 1962, as it lets sports leagues negotiate contracts on behalf of their teams.

DirecTV's $249 Sunday Ticket provides subscribers with as many as 14 NFL games each Sunday during the football season. The package is not available to cable-television or other pay-TV providers, such as EchoStar Communications Corp.'s Dish network.

A league spokesman denied consumers are harmed by programming offered through DirecTV and cable-TV operators.

`No Basis'

``NFL Sunday Ticket and NFL Network support consumer choice, as well as broader competition in the overall television market," said Brian McCarthy, the league's spokesman in New York, in an e-mailed statement. ``There is no basis now to repeal statutory provisions that have supported the development of these pro-consumer and pro-fan policies."

Robert Mercer, a DirecTV spokesman, said the company's agreement with the NFL for exclusive rights to Sunday Ticket games will run through 2010. He said the five-year contract is valued at about $3.5 billion.

NFL games are the most-watched U.S. sport and the league is set to earn $3.73 billion this year from TV agreements with CBS Corp.'s CBS, News Corp.'s Fox network, Walt Disney Co.'s ABC and ESPN, General Electric Co.'s NBC and DirecTV Group Inc.

The NFL sued Comcast, saying the Philadelphia-based company's plan to move the NFL Network to a sports tier violated the terms of its contract with the league. The sports tiers costs $5 a month and have a much smaller subscriber base than the expanded basic tier where the NFL is now carried.

Specter made his comments today at a Judiciary Committee hearing on television sports programming and whether cable companies are excluding competition. The committee held a hearing last month on whether the NFL Network raises antitrust issues and how it may affect cable and satellite rates.

DirecTV shares rose 7 cents to $23.60 at 4 p.m. in New York Stock Exchange composite trading. Comcast fell 15 cents to $41.74 in Nasdaq Stock Market composite trading. EchoStar slipped 7 cents to $37.13.

Specter Says NFL Abuses Cable Viewers (PHI)

By Miriam Hill

The Philadelphia Inquirer, December 8, 2006

WASHINGTON - Sen. Arlen Specter's hearing yesterday was supposed to focus on whether cable companies such as Comcast Corp. can wield sports programming like a club to inhibit competition.

But at the end of the Senate Judiciary Committee hearing, Specter turned the tables in a way that took a lot of heat off Comcast. The Pennsylvania Republican, who is chairman of the committee, said he would sponsor legislation to eliminate the antitrust exemption that allows the National Football League to negotiate broadcast rights for all of its 32 teams.

Specter cited a list of grievances against the NFL, including its decision to move Monday Night Football from ABC to ESPN, a cable channel, and moves by teams such as the Colts from Baltimore to Indianapolis.

That history represented a philosophy of "fans be damned," he said. The programming changes suggest an attitude of "consumers be damned."

"Wouldn't consumers be better off if teams could negotiate?" Specter asked. "This is the NFL exerting its power right down to the last nickel."

In a written statement, the NFL said it was sensitive to Specter's concerns, but added that there was no basis for repealing its antitrust exemption. The league also defended its television practices as "consistent with the public interest and as delivering fans extraordinary amounts of programming at little or no cost."

The NFL Network is suing Comcast over the Philadelphia cable company's refusal to carry eight late-season football games in a programming tier widely available to customers. Comcast wants to put those games in its sports tier, which costs $5 more monthly, to compensate for higher fees the NFL wants to charge.

Comcast also has complained that it cannot buy rights to NFL Sunday Ticket, a popular package of games available only to DirecTV subscribers.

Comcast executive vice president David L. Cohen, who also testified yesterday, said he was not ready to agree that the NFL should lose its antitrust exemption.

It is not clear whether Specter's proposed legislation will go anywhere. When Democrats take control of the Senate in January, Sen. Patrick Leahy (D., Vt.) will replace Specter as committee chairman.

Specter said he would consider proposing that Comcast and other cable companies no longer be allowed to refuse to share sports programming with satellite competitors.

He said he was pleased to see that Comcast had agreed to sell its SportsNet content, which includes Phillies, Flyers and Sixers games, to Verizon Communications Inc. Verizon has started selling TV service in the Philadelphia region.

Cohen said his company agreed to share that content in part because it did not think Verizon would compete with Comcast in the city of Philadelphia. He also cited DirecTV's exclusive rights to NFL Sunday ticket.

EMI Nears Deal To Be Purchased By Private-Equity Group Permira (WSJ)

By Ethan Smith And Dennis K. Berman

The Wall Street Journal, December 8, 2006

EMI Group PLC, the world's third-largest music company by market share, was close to a deal last night to be acquired by a private-equity group, according to people familiar with the matter.

European private-equity firm Permira Advisers Ltd. was considered the likely buyer, according to people familiar with the situation. But the transaction, which would be the latest instance of a publicly traded company being brought under private control, wasn't finalized last night and could still fall apart, these people cautioned.

The situation remained fluid last night and it was unclear whether other private-equity groups would join Permira in the bid. EMI shares closed yesterday at 286.5 pence ($5.63), up fractionally, but down slightly from the 289.5 they hit after news broke last week of the possible deal.

Last week EMI confirmed it had been approached with an offer, but the company didn't identify the bidder. The value of the transaction was unclear, although some people close to the matter have placed it at about £2 billion ($3.9 billion).

EMI comprises two major U.S. labels, Capitol Records and Virgin Records, as well as extensive international operations. Perhaps its most valuable asset is EMI Music Publishing, a song catalog that controls the copyrights to more than a million songs. The company's U.S. labels distribute music by artists such as the Beatles, Norah Jones and the Beastie Boys, but in recent years have struggled to break major new artists.

The bid to take EMI private comes after a string of failed attempts to make a deal with Warner Music Group Corp. EMI and Warner have been attempting to acquire each other for several years, as conventional wisdom said that both companies need to bulk up to remain competitive in the consolidated music industry dominated by Vivendi SA's Universal Music Group and Sony BMG, a joint venture of Sony Corp. and Bertelsmann AG.

EMI and Warner Music rebuffed offers by the other in the spring and summer of this year. In the last round of those discussions, EMI rejected an offer from Warner of £2.52 billion, saying it wasn't big enough to be taken seriously. In July, both companies abandoned their efforts to buy each other, after the regulatory climate turned hostile toward such a deal. That happened when European Union regulators were forced by a court to re-examine the basis on which they approved the merger of Sony's and Bertelsmann's recorded-music companies in 2004.

EMI's heavy debt load and low credit rating have led many to consider it an unlikely private-equity target. But media-industry analysts have said that a buyer could offset those problems by breaking EMI up into its component recorded-music and music-publishing companies. EMI Music Publishing is currently the largest in the world.

Music publishers have seen their values soar in recent years. Universal Music Group recently agreed to pay more than $2.1 billion for Bertelsmann AG's BMG Music Publishing -- a far smaller player than EMI's unit.

A spokeswoman for EMI said: "We don't comment on speculation."

Yesterday, EMI artists -- including rock group Coldplay, singer-songwriter Corinne Bailey Rae and country singer Keith Urban -- received 43 Grammy nominations.

Tobacco Deals Might Be Imminent (WSJ)

By Jason Singer In London, And Andrew Morse And Amy Chozick In Tokyo

The Wall Street Journal, December 8, 2006

Japan Tobacco Inc.'s takeover approach to U.K. rival Gallaher Group PLC is likely to spark a bidding war for the maker of Benson & Hedges and Silk Cut brand cigarettes and to prompt other big combinations of tobacco companies across Europe.

Industry executives have been preparing for a round of mergers in Europe's tobacco industry for two years, since Japan Tobacco began to seriously consider a bid for Gallaher, of Weybridge, England, in late 2004. Driving the consolidation is the need to become more efficient and reduce costs in a mature, and in some places, shrinking market.

Nothing materialized over that time period because the industry was roiled by new smoking bans and tax increases, and some companies shifted their priorities to pursuing fast-growing Eastern European markets. Now that Gallaher is in play, it could jump-start that consolidation.

Gallaher late Wednesday said it had received an approach that people familiar with the situation said came from Japan Tobacco; the size of a potential bid is likely to be nearly £8 billion, or $15.7 billion. A Gallaher spokesman declined to comment. A Japan Tobacco spokesman said the company doesn't comment on speculation.

Meanwhile, people familiar with the matter say, Altadis SA of Spain, might try to link with Altria Group Inc. of the U.S., maker of Philip Morris and Marlboro brands, to bid jointly for Gallaher. A spokesman from Philip Morris International, Altria's international cigarette division, declined to comment.

Altria is already the market leader in many European countries and wouldn't be allowed to add Gallaher's brands in those places. But it has room to grow in the U.K., one of Gallaher's bigger markets. Altadis could buy the rest of the businesses, these people say.

Another option would be for Altria to join with British American Tobacco PLC and carve up Gallaher's business.

Meanwhile Altadis itself has long been considered a target for Imperial Tobacco Group PLC or British American Tobacco, both of the U.K.

Altadis has spent most of the past year reviewing its position in the industry. Its board recently concluded that the company, a product of a merger between French and Spanish tobacco concerns, is too small in its current state, people close to the board's thinking say. The company prefers to be an acquirer rather than sell itself to a larger rival, these people add. Altadis declined to comment.

Already one of the world's biggest cigar makers, Altadis could try to buy Swedish Match AB, which also has a strong cigar business. Pricey cigars command stronger margins and less regulatory risk than the embattled cigarette industry. Swedish Match also sells smokeless-tobacco products and has a market value of about 34 billion Swedish kronor, or $5 billion.

Altadis, which mainly sells local and European cigarette brands such as Gauloises Blondes and Gitanes, also controls some pre-eminent cigar labels. In the U.S. it sells Montecristo, Romeo y Julieta and Te-Amo. It also owns half of the Cuban maker of Cohiba cigars, Habanos SA.

Cigar sales at Altadis grew 8.3% last year, faster than cigarette growth of 5.5%. Many investors expect a big boost to Altadis if Cuban President Fidel Castro dies and a regime more favorable to U.S. interests succeeds him, leading to a lifting of the ban on Cuban products, particularly cigars.

For the U.S. market, Swedish Match sells Dominican Republic-made Cohiba and other cigars. Altadis has the rights to sell internationally many of the Dominican-made cigar brands that Swedish Match sells in the U.S.

A Swedish Match spokesman said the company is interested in making cigar acquisitions in Europe and the U.S. He declined to comment about Altadis.

Japan Tobacco's potential pairing with Gallaher underscores the growing pressure on cigarette makers in developed economies to keep profits rising even as sales sag in their home markets amid the waning popularity of smoking. Increasingly, they are looking to places like Eastern Europe and the Middle East, where smoking remains in style and a rising middle class has the spending power to buy cigarettes.

The two companies have a history of working together; Gallaher markets Japan Tobacco's Camel brands in the U.K. and Austria.

Japan Tobacco would find Gallaher's geographic reach compelling. Gallaher has a division that produces and markets cigarettes in Russia, Kazakhstan and Ukraine. Its largest factory is in Moscow, where it produces 65 billion cigarettes a year. Gallaher also has plants in Poland, Romania and South Africa.

Japan Tobacco's shares rose 4.8% in Tokyo, while Gallaher shares jumped 22% in London. Altadis gained 7% in Madrid and Swedish Match rose 1.9% in Stockholm.

SL Green Wins Approval Of Reckson Shareholders (WSJ)

By Jennifer S. Forsyth

The Wall Street Journal, December 8, 2006

After four months of contentious debate, shareholders of Reckson Associates Realty Corp. voted yesterday to approve its acquisition by SL Green Realty Corp., after Reckson's chief executive personally sacrificed $25 million to make sure the deal went through.

The deal is a significant victory for New York-based SL Green, as Reckson holds five coveted office buildings in Manhattan at a time when it would be almost impossible to acquire that much New York real estate piecemeal. With rental rates climbing and few additional buildings being constructed, New York office buildings are being sold for record prices. The acquisition gives SL Green bragging rights as the largest office landlord in the city.

Also a winner was Reckson Chief Executive Scott Rechler, who along with a group of his investors will end up with about one-third of the Reckson portfolio. Yet his success came at a price.

Yesterday morning, as the shareholder meeting resumed after a 24-hour delay, Mr. Rechler announced that Reckson, a Uniondale, N.Y., real-estate investment trust, would issue a special dividend of $25 million -- equal to about 29 cents per Reckson share -- if the merger closed.

That $25 million was the amount Mr. Rechler was due as a severance package in the merger agreement with SL Green. He volunteered to forgo that payment to ensure that the deal got done. (The holders of two-thirds of Reckson shares had to approve the merger agreement.)

Mr. Rechler said in an interview that he was willing to give up the severance because SL Green made it clear to Reckson it wouldn't increase its bid. When asked what he would do now, Mr. Rechler said: "I'm going to Vermont, to sit under a tree and contemplate life -- $25 million poorer."

That Mr. Rechler was forced to make such a gesture reflects his role as a lightning rod since the Reckson-SL Green deal was announced Aug. 3. SL Green announced it would buy Reckson for cash and stock then valued at $4.1 billion, not including debt assumption, but would sell back about one-third of the assets, all in the New York city suburbs, to Mr. Rechler and his investors for $2.1 billion -- a price some investors and shareholders believed was too low. At SL Green's 4 p.m. composite price yesterday of $134.24, the deal is valued at about $45.62 a share.

Even as the postponed shareholder meeting was about to begin, other suitors were still expressing interest in Reckson's assets.

According to people familiar with the situation, one last-minute bid was from financier Carl Icahn, whose second proposal for all of Reckson earlier in the week was rebuffed. This time Mr. Icahn bid only for the suburban property that was to be bought by Mr. Rechler's group. But once the meeting began, Mr. Rechler announced, without naming Mr. Icahn, that an 11th-hour bid had been rejected by Reckson's board. Reckson didn't disclose the amount of the bid.

Meanwhile, lawyers representing New York developer Harry Macklowe's Macklowe Properties worked through the night before the shareholder meeting, readying an offer of between $2.3 billion and $2.4 billion for another part of Reckson, according to a person familiar with that planned offer. The target: Reckson's Manhattan properties plus a building in Long Island City, Queens. But Macklowe dropped that plan after Reckson announced as the meeting began that Cohen & Steers, one of Reckson's biggest shareholders, had agreed to support the merger after Mr. Rechler gave up his severance payment. The special dividend increased shareholder value and also eliminated Cohen & Steers's concerns about the severance agreement, Cohen & Steers co-CEO Robert Steers said in an interview.

It would also have been a second run at Reckson for Mr. Macklowe. On Nov. 16, Mr. Macklowe teamed up with Mr. Icahn in a $49-a-share, all-cash offer for all of Reckson. That proposal had buoyed the hopes of some Reckson shareholders that a bidding war would force SL Green to pay substantially more to seal the deal. But over the weekend both Mr. Macklowe and another partner that had joined later withdrew, fearing the price was too high. That forced Mr. Icahn to shuffle the terms of his offer to a cash-and-stock deal, which was rejected by the Reckson board Monday night.

After the vote was finally tallied yesterday, SL Green issued a statement saying, "While the events of the past three weeks have not been easy, the decision validated the credibility of our bid in the strongest possible way."

MasterCard's Key Sponsorship Save (WSJ)

By Robin Sidel

The Wall Street Journal, December 8, 2006

MasterCard Inc. has scored a big point in Latin America -- at a time when the region's appetite for plastic is growing.

By retaining sponsorship of the World Cup tournament and other big soccer events for the next eight years, MasterCard, the U.S.'s second-largest payments network, after Visa International Ltd., can win coveted and exclusive exposure for its brand and products in a soccer-crazed region that is ripe for card growth. The eight-year pact, which starts in January, comes at a time when MasterCard is trying to compete more aggressively against Visa, which is far more dominant in the region.

Late Wednesday, a federal district court judge in New York ruled that the World Cup's organizing body can't award the sponsorship to Visa even though the two struck a deal earlier this year. Instead, the Fédération Internationale de Football Association, known as FIFA, must give the deal to MasterCard, which had sponsored the lucrative sports event for the past 16 years.

FIFA, which is based in Switzerland, said it would appeal.

In handing down the 125-page decision, U.S. District Court Judge Loretta Preska granted a permanent injunction filed by MasterCard, which had sought to block the Visa deal that was awarded last spring. Visa had agreed to pay $180 million for the sponsorship, which runs through the end of 2014, according to legal papers.

The ruling was the latest development in a fight that erupted after FIFA unexpectedly selected Visa to sponsor the soccer events. MasterCard sued FIFA to block the new deal shortly after the soccer organization awarded the sponsorship to Visa. The soccer organization and MasterCard argued the case in court last week.

In describing the impact of the sponsorship, the judge borrowed from MasterCard's well-known advertising campaign. "MasterCard's loss of the next FIFA World Cup sponsorship would be, in [its] now-famous words, 'Priceless,' " she wrote.

It isn't exactly clear when MasterCard will ramp up its efforts in Latin America. Previous sponsorships gave MasterCard the right to work with local banks to promote credit-card use through special offerings tied to the soccer tournament. MasterCard's sponsorship of last summer's World Cup in Germany, for example, gave it the right to be the only card accepted for advance-ticket sales.

"Right now, we're celebrating the court's recognition of our practices and our legal position," said Noah Hanft, general counsel at Purchase, N.Y.-based MasterCard. Shares of MasterCard rose 55 cents to $99.68 in 4 p.m. composite trading on the New York Stock Exchange.

MasterCard has plenty of catching up to do in Latin America. Of the 287.2 million Visa and MasterCard payment cards in the region last year, some 74.2% were branded with the Visa logo, according to the Nilson Report, a Carpinteria, Calif.-based newsletter that tracks the card industry. Customers rang up $301 billion on Visa cards last year in Latin America, compared with $98 billion of MasterCard transactions. Still, MasterCard notched a 32.5% gain in the dollar value of transactions from year-earlier levels, outpacing Visa's 21.1% increase, according to the data.

"Winning this case is a big positive for MasterCard because brand is of extreme importance when it comes to credit cards and payment processing," says Anurag Rana, an analyst with KeyBanc Capital Markets, a unit of Cleveland-based KeyCorp. Mr. Rana has a "buy" rating on the stock.

Visa expressed disappointment with the court ruling, saying it was "assured by FIFA that the agreement was valid and binding and did not conflict with any of MasterCard's rights."

In its motion for an injunction, MasterCard contended its previous sponsorship agreement with FIFA, which covered the period of 2002 through 2006, gave it right of first refusal for a new contract. MasterCard said FIFA violated those terms by signing a deal with Visa after it had already drafted a new agreement with MasterCard. FIFA disputed that argument, saying it had given MasterCard numerous opportunities to seal a new sponsorship deal. Negotiations for a new agreement fell apart, FIFA contended, due to an unrelated dispute over their logos.

"Because MasterCard and FIFA agreed on all terms of the 2007-2014 MasterCard agreement and the 'final version' of that agreement was sent by FIFA to MasterCard for execution, and the duly executed agreement returned to FIFA, it is fair and equitable that FIFA be required to specifically perform the 2007-2014 MasterCard Agreement," the judge wrote.

MasterCard was aggressive in challenging the sponsorship partly because the loss of the World Cup would mean that the card network wouldn't have sponsorship rights to any major global sports event. Visa owns sponsorship rights for the Olympics through 2012.

Greater Role For Nonscientists In E.P.A. Pollution Decisions (NYT)

By Felicity Barringer

The New York Times, December 8, 2006

The Environmental Protection Agency has changed the way it sets standards to control dangerous air pollutants like lead, ozone and tiny particles of soot, enhancing the role of the agency's political appointees in scientific assessments and postponing the required review by independent scientific experts.

The change, which largely tracks the suggestions of the American Petroleum Institute but also adopts some recommendations of the agency's independent scientific advisers, was announced yesterday afternoon by the agency's deputy administrator, Marcus Peacock. Mr. Peacock said it would streamline a cumbersome process and bring it "into the 21st century."

He also said the E.P.A. "is committed to a timely and transparent process that uses the most up-to-date science available." Under the new system, he said, it will "continue to adhere to the highest scientific standards and ensure we meet the agency's mission" of protecting public health.

The Clean Air Act requires that every five years, the agency review existing standards for the six air pollutants considered most dangerous to health. Two standards, for lead and ground-level ozone, are currently under review. A third, for lethal particles of soot, was left partly intact two months ago, a decision that ignored the consensus recommendation of the agency's scientific advisers that it be tightened.

The decision announced yesterday, the culmination of months of review and comment, drew a scathing response from environmental groups like the Sierra Club and Clean Air Watch, as well as the American Lung Association. Vickie Patton, a senior lawyer with Environmental Defense, said "the establishment of health-based standards are one of the single most important scientific decisions" the E.P.A. made.

The changes, Ms. Patton said, will compromise two aspects of the process "integral to scientific integrity and independence."

For one thing, agency scientists will no longer produce their own independent review of the latest science to start the process of deciding whether a pollution standard — for lead, say, or ozone — is tough enough to protect public health. Instead, initial reviews will now involve both agency scientists and their political bosses and will produce a synopsis of “policy-relevant” science, agency officials said.

“They are using this idea of streamlined and expedited decision-making as a Trojan horse to infect the most important decisions the administrator makes with politics,” Ms. Patton said.

In addition, she said, the role of the independent panel of scientific advisers — who act as auditors, reviewing the document produced by agency scientists and advising top management — has been diminished. The panel, the Clean Air Scientific Advisory Committee, will now comment on the agency’s proposed actions after the public has been notified of them, giving the scientists essentially the same kind of participation as industry lobbyists and environmental groups.

Rogene Henderson, the advisory committee chairwoman, said she believed that agency scientists could continue to provide recommendations they thought most appropriate, “but they will assuredly be asked to include some recommendation that is acceptable to upper-level management.”

Ms. Henderson said the agency had accepted her group’s recommendation that the review process include an early public workshop to review the current science and that the documents that result from the review be more concise.

Still, she said, “They will come out with their policy before we have a chance to comment on it.” But she added quickly, “They weren’t taking our advice” even under the old system, at least in the recent soot decision.

EPA Shortens Science Reviews, Angering Some (LAT)

By Janet Wilson

The Los Angeles Times, December 8, 2006

The U.S. Environmental Protection Agency on Thursday streamlined the way it updates regulations for the nation's worst air pollutants, a move that drew immediate charges that officials are trying to quash scientific review to benefit industry at the expense of public health.

The changes, some of which closely mirror requests by the American Petroleum Institute and Battery Council International industry groups, include shortening what is now an exhaustive scientific review, and replacing recommendations prepared by career scientists and reviewed by independent advisors with a "policy paper" crafted by senior White House appointees at the agency.

EPA officials said the changes were made in part at the request of its science advisors, who have complained that the process for reviewing new health standards is overwhelming.

The agency regularly misses deadlines for updating health standards, which has led to numerous lawsuits by environmental groups.

"EPA is bringing air rule-making into the 21st century … with a timely and transparent process that uses the most up-to-date science," said Deputy Administrator Marcus Peacock, who approved the new procedures. "Everyone has found the current process is inefficient, and current delays are unacceptable."

The pollutants covered by the changes include ozone and diesel soot, both of which continue to plague Greater Los Angeles, making it the nation's worst spot for deadly air pollution. Other affected pollutants include sulfur dioxide, carbon monoxide, nitrous oxides and lead.

Thursday's announcement came two days after the agency announced it would study whether lead should be taken off the list of the most serious pollutants.

It also follows controversial decisions this fall by EPA Administrator Stephen Johnson in which critics said he had ignored scientific counsel on tightening standards for deadly soot.

For 30 years under the Clean Air Act, agency scientists have reviewed and recommended health standards for six major air pollutants: ozone, particulate matter, sulfur dioxide, carbon monoxide, nitrous oxides and lead.

The standards, which limit amounts of the pollutants that can be released into the air, are designed to protect children, the elderly and other "sensitive" populations, and curtail damage to animals, crops, vegetation, views and buildings.

Congress members, environmentalists and past EPA staff from Republican and Democratic administrations swiftly condemned this week's actions, saying they could undermine public health protections.

"EPA is downgrading the role of its own career experts and making sure that political appointees are running the show from the beginning," said Frank O'Donnell of Clean Air Watch in Washington. "It is little wonder that the oil industry pushed for exactly this sort of 'reform' to the process."

O'Donnell called the lead assessment "a political gift to the lead-smelting lobby…. It could threaten thousands of children who breathe toxic lead fumes."

DOJ_NMG_0103998

Rep. Henry A. Waxman (D-Los Angeles), incoming chairman of the Government Reform Committee, said in a statement Thursday, "EPA's efforts to roll back … the most fundamental provisions in the Clean Air Act make no sense, and fly in the face of last month's elections."

On Wednesday, Waxman wrote to Johnson regarding the study of lead, urging him to "renounce this dangerous proposal immediately. This deregulatory effort cannot be defended."

The Chicago-based Battery Council International asked the EPA in July to delete lead from the list of "criteria" pollutants, which are subject to tough health standards. The council said other existing regulations would preserve protection.

Emissions of lead have declined by 96% since its use in gasoline was banned. Agency staff this year found only two sites in the country where lead emissions still exceeded limits, both near smelting facilities used as part of battery manufacturing.

Recent studies have suggested that lead is more harmful than previously thought. But EPA staffers said in a draft paper this week that they would assess whether tough health standards could be revoked.

The ban on leaded gasoline will continue no matter what, agency staff said, as will other rules.

"We need to evaluate whether there's a better way, a more effective regulation or way to better protect the public from lead exposure," EPA Press Secretary Jennifer Wood said.

Dr. Bernard Goldstein, a former EPA assistant administrator appointed by President Reagan and a former member of the agency's science advisory panel, said he was concerned about the changes announced Thursday, especially when coupled with Johnson's decision not to follow his own scientists' advice on deadly fine particulate matter, or soot.

During his time, administrators had "always taken the advice of their scientists," in fact choosing their most stringent recommendations, said Goldstein.

He said that though the regulatory process could be streamlined, it shouldn't be done by eliminating the core scientific recommendations.

John Walke, a former EPA attorney who is now clean-air director for the Natural Resources Defense Council, said, "Obviously the intended impact is to introduce industry desires … into the process."

The American Petroleum Institute this year wrote the EPA saying the long-established staff paper on each key pollutant should not be a science-based document but "is a policy document, and as such should have input from senior EPA management."

On Thursday, the agency eliminated the staff papers and replaced them with a separate science assessment that will no longer include policy recommendations, and a "policy assessment" to be prepared by senior EPA managers.

Neither the battery council nor the petroleum institute returned phone calls and e-mails requesting comment.

Acting Assistant Administrator Bill Wehrum, who helped formulate this week's changes, said the charges of industry influence were "silly" and "false."

He and Peacock defended the changes, saying that the new process, with its separate science and policy assessments, would make clearer what scientific research showed, and what politically appointed policy makers were seeking.

Keep The E.P.A. Libraries Open (opinion) (NYT)

By Leslie Burger

The New York Times, December 8, 2006

Princeton

IF you needed to find out how much pollution an industrial plant in your neighborhood was spewing, or what toxic chemicals were in a local river, where would you go? Until recently, you could discover the answer at one of the Environmental Protection Agency's 29 libraries. But now the E.P.A. has obstructed the American public — as well as its own scientists and staff — by starting to dismantle its crown jewel, the national system of regional E.P.A. libraries.

Until now, any citizen could consult these resources, which include information on things like siting incinerators, storing toxic waste and uncovering links between asthma and car exhaust. E.P.A. staff members and other scientists have counted on the libraries to support their work. First responders and other state and local government officials have used E.P.A. information to protect communities. In the age of terrorism, when the safety of our food and water supply, the uninterrupted flow of energy and, indeed, so much about our environment has become a matter of national security, it seems particularly dangerous to take steps that would hinder our emergency preparedness.

Although lawmakers haven't yet agreed to President Bush's proposed 2007 budget, which includes $2 million in cuts to the agency's library system, the head of the E.P.A. has already instituted cuts. The agency's main library in Washington has been closed to the public, and regional E.P.A. libraries in Chicago, Dallas and Kansas City, Mo., have been closed altogether. At the Boston, New York, San Francisco and Seattle branches, hours and public access have been reduced.

Anyone who needs to understand the environmental impact of, say, living downwind or downstream from a new nuclear power plant, or the long-term public health impact of Hurricane Katrina, cannot afford to find the doors barred to potentially lifesaving information. But neither can the rest of us, whose daily lives and choices will be affected by global warming. We all have a right to be able to get access to information about our air, water and soil.

"Libraries and their professionals are integral to the work of E.P.A. toxicologists," says an agency toxicologist, Suzanne Wuerthele. "Without access to their expertise and extensive collections, it will be difficult to explain to the public, to state agencies, industry and to the courts how and why E.P.A. is protecting the environment over time."

Some members of Congress have begun to bring these cuts to light. The Senate minority whip, Richard Durbin, urged the president to reopen the libraries and rethink his budget request. Eighteen senators sent a letter to the Senate Appropriations Committee asking it to make the E.P.A. keep the libraries open. Representatives John Dingell, Bart Gordon and Henry Waxman recently had the Government Accountability Office start an inquiry into the closings and requested that the E.P.A. administrator, Stephen Johnson, cease the destruction of library materials immediately.

The E.P.A. cannot hide behind the fig leaf of fiscal responsibility. While the agency says the closings are all part of a commitment to modernize and digitize, we are not assured that its public plan is adequate or its skills sufficient. Users within the E.P.A. and the American public need information specialists, like librarians, to manage paper collections and to help them get access to digital material and organize online information.

Fortunately, there's still time to reverse this dangerous threat to a healthy future. The administration could immediately reopen the closed libraries. Congress could conduct oversight hearings to reverse these decisions and prevent any more E.P.A. libraries — all of them containing invaluable information about our environment, all of them paid for by our tax dollars — from closing. The American public deserves no less.

FBI Releases Few Details On Death Of FBI Agent (RTD)

By Kiran Krishnamurthy, TIMES-DISPATCH STAFF WRITER

Richmond Times-Dispatch, December 8, 2006

FREDERICKSBURG -- FBI officials had little more to say yesterday about the shooting of an agent during a live-fire training exercise at Fort A.P. Hill on Wednesday. He later died.

The standard training exercise involved the bureau's Quantico-based Hostage Rescue Team. FBI Special Agent Ann Todd would not disclose the number of agents involved or what the training at the Army base in Caroline County involved.

Todd also would not say how many times FBI Supervisory Special Agent Gregory J. Rahoi, 38, had been shot. She clarified that Rahoi was raised in Wisconsin but was assigned to the unit at Quantico and lived in the area.

She said she did not believe anyone else was injured. The FBI's investigation is continuing.

Rahoi joined the FBI in 1997 and had served with the Hostage Rescue Team for the past six years. He was flown by helicopter after the Wednesday afternoon accident to Mary Washington Hospital in Fredericksburg, where he was later pronounced dead.

Fort A.P. Hill hosts about 60,000 soldiers, sailors, airmen and Marines annually at the 76,000-acre post's live-fire ranges and other training facilities. Federal law-enforcement agencies also use the facilities on a regular basis.

The last time someone died during live-fire training at Fort A.P. Hill was in December 2000, when a Marine was killed, said Ken Perrotte, a spokesman for the base.

Todd said Rahoi was the second Hostage Rescue Team member killed in the line of duty. In 1986, Special Agent James K. McAllister died after falling from a helicopter during training at Quantico.

F.B.I. Agent Is Killed During Training (NYT)

By David Johnston

The New York Times, December 8, 2006

An F.B.I. agent was accidentally shot and killed Wednesday during a training exercise at Fort A. P. Hill in Virginia. The agent, Gregory J. Rahoi, 39, was a member of the Hostage Rescue Team, an elite tactical unit that routinely trains using live ammunition. Mr. Rahoi was a nine-year veteran of the bureau. The hostage team uses the Fort A. P. Hill Army base for larger maneuvers. Officials of the Federal Bureau of Investigation said that the circumstances surrounding the death were being investigated.

Authorities Bust Gang Selling Drugs In Allentown, Easton (NBC10)

NBC10.com, December 7, 2006

Federal prosecutors said they've taken down a major drug gang operating in several suburban counties.

Federal, state and local law enforcement officers announced the busts in Allentown.

Police said they arrested nine members of the Mafia El Don gang.

The suspects allegedly ran a cocaine ring, selling drugs in Northampton, Lehigh, Berks and Lancaster counties, according to police.

Officers seized drugs, guns and $900,000 in cash.

According to investigators, the gang has sold 50 kilos of cocaine since summer.

"This investigation included a five-month wiretapping in which hundreds of calls were intercepted involving the buying and selling of cocaine, in amounts from 14 grams to kilos," U.S. Attorney Patrick Meehan said.

Prosecutors said most of the cocaine was sold from a store in Allentown and a restaurant in Easton.

This is the first case prosecuted under the "222 Corridor" initiative, which targets gang crime.

Massive Drug Ring Ends With 9 Arrests (ETPA)

By Bevin Milavsky, The Express-times

Easton Express-Times (NJ/PA), December 8, 2006

Operation spanned Lehigh Valley

ALLENTOWN | Officials toppled the drug gang running what authorities call the largest cocaine ring in the Lehigh Valley and took nine people in to federal custody.

Mafia El-Don distributed at least 50 kilograms of cocaine in the Valley since the summer, according to U.S. Attorney Pat Meehan.

"These are major suppliers to the area," he said Thursday.

The nine alleged gang members arrested this week include the leader, a main supplier and numerous drug runners. In addition to distributing cocaine and crack in the Valley, authorities said, the men had firearms they used to further drug trafficking.

The arrests were the result of an 18-month investigation that culminated Tuesday when officials executed 18 search warrants and seized $900,000, drugs, materials used for drug packaging and sales and firearms, at least one of which was reported stolen, according to court documents.

The case is the first prosecuted as part of the Route 222 Corridor anti-gang initiative. If convicted, the men face mandatory minimum sentences of 15 years up to life in prison.

"This is a kind of potential retirement plan for drug traffickers," Meehan said.

Five-month investigation

The investigation into the drug gang included a five-month wiretap that allowed officials to intercept hundreds of calls about buying and selling cocaine, Meehan said.

He said the wiretap also helped agents thwart a planned home invasion, money exchanges in public places and talk of buying and selling firearms.

The suspects are: Juan Francisco Minier, 42; Eduardo "Mafia" Jiminez, 35; Hilario "El-Don" or "Humberto" Tamarez-Canario, 34; Vladimir "Menor" Morales, 31,; Freddy Isaac "Kelvin" Gell, 39; Alejandro Martinez-Bassora, 40; Aldo Guzman, 44; Jose "Joselo" Cedeno, 35; and Jeffrey Riggins, 42.

Meehan described Mafia El-Don as a sophisticated organization that moved seamlessly from Allentown to Easton, most likely resulting in drugs reaching the streets in an even wider arc.

Northampton County District Attorney John Morganelli reiterated what officials have said over the past year: Drug and gang activity is not contained to one area but is a regional problem.

Meehan said Cedeno, the group's leader, has ties to New York, but dealers no longer wait for people to come to large cities to buy drugs.

"The drug dealers have created these businesses, and they're marketing their product," he said.

Officials said drugs were sold from multiple homes and businesses in Easton, Allentown and areas in between.

Alleged crime scenes

Easton locations tied to the drug ring include: Jiminez's restaurant, Cesar's Mexican Cocinar, in the 1100 block of Butler Street; a store in the 900 block of Ferry Street owned by Tamarez-Canario; his home in the 900 block of Spruce Street; Riggins' apartment in the 700 block of Walnut Street; and an unidentified drug storage facility in the 1000 block of Jackson Street.

Other places include: Cedeno's home in the 2000 block of Columbia Street, Whitehall Township; Jiminez's home in the 2600 block of Broad Street, Palmer Township; and the following Allentown locations -- Gell's home in the 600 block of Whitehall Street; Minier's home in the 1700 block of 31st Street SW; another home Minier owns in the 1800 block of Highland Street; and his garage, JM Collision, in the 400 block of Sumner Avenue.

Neighbor unsurprised

A man who lives across the street from Jiminez's restaurant said he has long suspected people who frequented the business were selling drugs.

"There was a lot of traffic, a lot of hanging out, but not many people come out with food," he said Thursday evening. "It was obvious."

The man, who declined to identify himself, said he's lived on Butler Street for about 14 years and began noticing suspicious activity at the restaurant a year ago.

"We're glad they're out of there," the man said. "It's about time."

Authorities identified the 1104 Butler St. site as Cesar's Mexican Cocinar, but signs outside the business read, "Caribbean Restaurant Spanish Food."

The entrance door was locked, and there were no signs indicating the restaurant's regular hours.

Officials credited collaboration among various federal, state and local agencies for removing the violent drug gang from the streets.

Authorities: Valley's Largest Cocaine Ring Busted (MORNCALL)

The Morning Call, December 8, 2006

Nine people have been arrested and about $1 million in cash has been confiscated, "shutting down" what authorities believe to be the Lehigh Valley's largest cocaine trafficking organization, U.S. Attorney Patrick Meehan announced today.

Meehan was joined by other federal, state and local law enforcement officials in announcing the arrests, which stemmed from 18 raids conducted throughout the Lehigh Valley earlier this week. Officials said it was the first case prosecuted under the federally funded Route 222 Corridor Anti-Gang Initiative started this year.

The Mafia El-Don organization, as it is known, distributed at least 50 kilograms of cocaine in the Lehigh Valley region since the summer. Seven of the nine were arrested for direct roles in the conspiracy, according to a press release, while two others were arrested for buying cocaine from the organization with the intent to resell.

Authorities said the arrests included some major players in local cocaine trafficking, including the group's leader, Jose Cedeno, 35, 2021 Columbia St., Whitehall Township, and the major supplier, Juan Francisco Minier, 42, president of JM Collision, an auto garage in Allentown.

Officials said they found about $1 million in cash at Cedeno's home that took two days to count. Minier used his business as a base of operations, officials said.

Others arrested were Eduardo Jiminez, 35, owner of Cesar's Mexican Cocinar, 1104 Butler St., Easton; Hilario Tamarez-Canario, 34; Vladimar Morales, 31, 913 Spruce St., Easton; Freddy Isaac Gell, 39; Alejandro Martinez-Bassora, 40; Aldo Guzman, 44, 204 Oak St., Walnutport; and Jeffrey Riggins, 42, 700 Walnut St., Easton.

Gordon Named Chairman Of House Science Committee (MURFPOST)

Murfreesboro Post, December 8, 2006

WASHINGTON, D.C. – U.S. Rep. Bart Gordon has been named Chairman of the U.S. House of Representatives Committee on Science, becoming Tennessee's first full House committee chairman in thirty years.

"I am honored by this assignment," said Gordon, who currently serves as Ranking Member of the Science Committee. "Under my leadership, the Science Committee will be the committee of good ideas and consensus. We will reach out to individuals and groups to participate at every opportunity, share ideas and work to keep America competitive in today's world."

Throughout his service in Congress, Gordon has been widely recognized for his commitment to responsible, bipartisan efforts to advance science, technology and education.

"We have an opportunity to put aside partisanship and positively affect issues from education and research to energy and security. This is an opportunity we must not neglect," said Gordon.

Gordon says one of the first orders of business for the Science Committee in the 110th Congress will be to continue efforts to ensure U.S. competitiveness in today's global marketplace. He cited measures to increase the nation's energy independence and legislation that will make sure American workers, teachers and students are equipped with the tools they need to compete with the rest of the world.

The congressman's efforts to fight Tennessee's meth abuse problem also are likely to resurface as the Science Committee has jurisdiction over the issue.

According to the Drug Enforcement Administration, more than 850 meth labs were seized in Tennessee last year, accounting for 75 percent of all lab seizures in the Southeast. Nationally, only three states had more meth lab seizures than Tennessee in 2005.

"We know that meth labs produce about six pounds of toxic waste for every one pound of meth that is cooked," said Gordon. "That chemical residue can coat the walls and floors of a meth lab, creating a potentially hazardous environment for the home's next occupants. To protect their health, we need guidelines for what constitutes a clean site."

Gordon, the dean of Tennessee's congressional delegation, will assume the Chairmanship at the start of his 12th term in Congress in January 2007.

The Science Committee maintains jurisdiction over all federal nonmilitary scientific and technology research and development programs, including those at the Department of Energy, NASA and the National Science Foundation. The committee also is charged with ensuring that federal investments in science and technology are focused in the right areas and are succeeding in boosting our nation's economy.

"I want to ensure our nation and our state remain at the forefront of scientific research, which delivers the technologies and innovations that drive our economy and aid in our well-being," said Gordon.

"In Tennessee, we have the opportunity to expand on research already taking place at federal facilities and university laboratories across the state. As Chairman of the Science Committee, I hope to capitalize on those opportunities by building on efforts already underway to establish a technology corridor linking facilities from Oak Ridge to Tullahoma."

Drug-tainted Coaches Targeted In Anti-doping Rules (USAT/AP)

By Bob Baum, The Associated Press

USA Today, December 8, 2006

The governing body for U.S. track and field is expanding its zero-tolerance anti-doping policy to coaches.

New regulations made public Thursday will require coaches to register with USA Track & Field, and coaches who have had athletes serve at least a two-year ban for doping or have been sanctioned themselves must be approved by a review panel.

The rules, to take effect sometime next year, are the federation's first concrete attempt to deal with coaches linked to doping cases, such as elite coach Trevor Graham.

This summer, the federation learned Graham's top athlete, Olympic and world sprint champion Justin Gatlin, tested positive in April for steroids and other performance enhancers.

Graham, whose former clients include five-time Olympic medalist Marion Jones and former world record holder Tim Montgomery, has had several athletes test positive for banned substances.

He also has been indicted on charges of lying to federal investigators in the BALCO drug probe and is the subject of an U.S. Anti-Doping Agency investigation. He has pleaded not guilty to the criminal charges and has denied supplying banned drugs to his athletes.

"While USADA remains responsible for issuing doping bans, the board of directors recognizes how critical it is that we do everything we can to deny USATF benefits to those who may be influencing athletes to use drugs," USATF chief executive officer Craig Masback said in a news release.

Agents and medical staff also will be subject to the new rules.

Coaches who choose not to register will not receive credentials for national championships, get stipends for training athletes or serve on national team coaching staffs.

Under current rules, coaches routinely receive credentials for national competitions and a coach for any athlete that ranks in the top 10 in the world in an event receives $2,000 from the federation.

"We think this is a step in the right direction," said U.S. Olympic Committee spokesman Darryl Seibel, "and it is an acknowledgment of the fact that responsibility and accountability must include not only an athlete but also his or her coach and agent."

The new rules also mean athletes of unregistered coaches will not be promoted by USATF to the media and sponsors.

Hershey was embarrassed this year when it made a deal with Gatlin to appear at its youth championships. Just before the meet was held, news broke of the sprinter's positive test.

Medical personnel on national teams will have to pledge they never have promoted nor will aid athletes to use banned performance enhancers. Agents will be required to sign a form stating they have not "nor will in the future counsel, encourage, aid or abet an athlete to use performing-enhancing substances."

It has not been determined what penalties medical staff or agents would face if they lie, Geer said.

Football Officials Dispute Thomas's Drug Defense (NYT)

By Michael S. Schmidt

The New York Times, December 8, 2006

Contrary to the explanation by New Orleans Saints defensive lineman Hollis Thomas that his positive drug test resulted from asthma medications, two football officials with knowledge of the case said a performance-enhancing drug was to blame.

The N.F.L. suspended Thomas for four games Tuesday for violating the league's banned-substance policy. A drug test on Aug. 7 found clenbuterol, a banned drug that helps burn fat and promotes muscle growth, in Thomas's body.

Thomas, a 6-foot tackle who is listed at 306 pounds and goes by the nickname Tank, has struggled with his weight and asthma for his entire career. He was traded to New Orleans in April after nine season with the Philadelphia Eagles and has flourished for the resurgent Saints, registering 3½ sacks and 43 tackles through 12 games.

The loss of Thomas, 32, comes at a crucial point for the Saints (8-4). New Orleans plays at Dallas on Sunday in a game that could help determine home-field advantage in the National Football Conference playoffs. He will miss the last four games of the regular season but will be eligible to return for the playoffs.

His agents, Michael Bauer and Ron Slavin, cited a letter used in their appeal in which the Saints' doctor, John R. Amoss, said it was "highly plausible" that asthma medications were responsible for the presence of clenbuterol in the urine sample. In the letter, Dr. Amoss wrote that Thomas's severe asthma required the treatment of high doses of inhaled steroids and other drugs. Dr. Amoss wrote that the combination of drugs probably produced a "false positive" result.

One football official, who was granted anonymity because he was not authorized to speak publicly about the case, said the drug found in Hollis's system could not have resulted from a combination of the medications. If the drugs that Thomas was prescribed by the team doctor were the only medications found in his system, he would have won his appeal, the official said.

N.F.L. players can seek medical exemptions after testing positive for a banned substance. If a drug has been prescribed by a doctor for a legitimate health reason, the violation can be settled and no suspension is issued.

Advair and albuterol, drugs that Thomas was taking for his asthma, are included on the N.F.L.'s list of prohibited substances. But they were not cited as violations because they were prescribed by the team doctor, the official said.

"As long as what is found in the system is what the doctor prescribed you, you are fine," he said. "But in this case, there was something else besides what the doctor prescribed."

The second football official, who was not authorized to speak publicly, independently confirmed what the other official said.

Drug-testing experts also questioned the team doctor's written argument. Clenbuterol is not a steroid, but it cannot be obtained legally for human use in the United States. Only veterinarians treating horses with severe breathing problems similar to asthma can prescribe the drug.

"I have never heard the proposition put forth that this combination of drugs would produce a positive test for clenbuterol," said Dr. Gary I. Wadler, an associate professor of medicine at New York University and an adviser for the World Anti-Doping Agency.

Clenbuterol is not more effective at treating asthma than the other medications Thomas was taking for his breathing problems, Wadler said. The drug is available for human consumption in some South American countries and has been used to increase muscle growth in show animals and athletes.

Wadler said that athletes had used clenbuterol before, most notably during the 1992 Barcelona Olympics, when two American shot-putters tested positive for the drug and were disqualified. The former pitcher Jason Grimsley told federal prosecutors that he used clenbuterol, human growth hormone, amphetamines and steroids during his Major League Baseball career.

In a telephone interview Wednesday, Slavin, one of Thomas's agents, said the extreme heat and humidity at the Saints' summer training camp at Millsaps College in Jackson, Miss., made Thomas's asthma worse and prompted doctors to recommend new drugs. Thomas was overweight when he arrived at minicamp in June and was still overweight when training camp began at the end of July.

In the appeal to the league, dated Nov. 17, his agents also argued that a suspension would violate the Americans with Disabilities Act because Thomas was treating "his chronic, life threatening asthma, in a contract year."

Dr. Amoss, the team doctor and an assistant professor at Louisiana State University, declined an interview request for this article. A team spokesman also would not comment.

More than 60 active players, and about 60 players who retired or were cut before their results were determined, have tested positive since the N.F.L.'s testing for performance-enhancing drugs began in 1989. So far this year, at least five players have tested positive for performance-enhancing drugs.

At the Eagles training facility Wednesday, Thomas's former teammates said they were surprised and dismayed by the positive test.

"I think everyone should hold their judgment until they actually know for sure that he did something wrong," defensive tackle Darwin Walker said. "I think he's a good character person. I just hate to see something like that happen. To be honest with you, I should educate myself more about the steroid policy, because I don't know much about it. I don't know much about asthma medications either."

Defensive tackle Sam Rayburn said he talked with Thomas and believed that he had not intentionally used a banned substance.

"Almost everything is against the rules in certain quantities," Rayburn said. "Even caffeine is considered a performance-enhancer if it's in a great enough quantity. You got to be careful. You can't even drink too much Mountain Dew. The easy way to stay out of trouble is not just to take anything." <NYT_TAGLINE>

Mexico's New Atty Genl Pledges Fight Against Corruption (DOW)

By Dow Jones Newswires

Wall Street Journal/Dow Jones, December 8, 2006

MEXICO CITY (AP)--Mexico's new attorney general took office Thursday promising to wage a "firm" fight against corruption and take on organized crime groups he compared to the Mafia.

Eduardo Medina Mora, who previously served as public safety secretary, acknowledged that "today, all indicators show that the public feels unsafe," an apparent reference to the wave of executions and kidnappings in several Mexican states.

He also promised to keep Mexican law enforcement clean.

"On this issue, we will be firm and categorical; there will be no room here for corruption," Medina said at his swearing-in ceremony, which came after the approval of his nomination by the Senate.

Medina Mora was nominated for the post by President Felipe Calderon, who took office on Dec. 1, and has promised to make law enforcement a top priority.

While the administration of former president Vicente Fox made some headway in arresting top leaders of the Gulf drug cartel and the Tijuana-based Arellano Felix gang, the man many consider the country's leading trafficker - Joaquin "El Chapo" Guzman - escaped from prison in 2001 and is still at large.

In the meantime, several drug cartels have formed alliances and are fighting bloody turf wars, assassinating policemen and even taking out newspaper ads to boost their image.

In the face of lawlessness, Medina Mora said the task of law enforcement would be "to affirm the Mexican government as the only power, above those who have to sought to challenge it."

On Wednesday, speaking before Senate members, Medina Mora said Mexico's drug cartels are seeking to expand into other illicit activities, as income from the cocaine trade declines in the face of competition from methamphetamines.

"They are seeking other forms of survival, which implies not only drug trafficking, but also Mafia activities, very similar to what the Cosa Nostra did in Palermo (Sicily), very similar to what happened at one point in Colombia, in Cali and Medellin."

Public Optimism Fades In Afghanistan (NYT/AP)

By The Associated Press

The New York Times, December 8, 2006

Filed at 9:14 a.m. ET

WASHINGTON (AP) -- Optimism is starting to fade among the people of Afghanistan five years after the fall of the Taliban and amid rising violence in the country, a poll found.

The number of people who think the country is on the right track has dropped 22 points -- to 55 percent -- in the last year, according to a poll done in Afghanistan by ABC News and BBC World Service. The reasons cited most often for the pessimism were a bad economy and the resurgent power of the Taliban militia, whose severe Islamic rule was ended by a U.S.-led invasion in 2001.

The highly unpopular Taliban is increasingly seen as posing the greatest danger to Afghanistan, with 57 percent naming the militia, up from 41 percent a year ago.

Acceptance of growing opium poppies has grown in the last year, however, with 40 percent saying it is acceptable if a grower has no other way to earn a living. That is up from 26 percent who felt that way a year ago.

More than four in 10 report violence in their local areas, a number that is higher in some regions of the country.

Optimism had declined on a variety of fronts compared with a year earlier: a 17-point drop in the belief that security has improved since the Taliban was in charge of the country to 58 percent; a 13-point drop in the belief that life in Afghanistan will get better in the next year, to 54 percent; and a 15-point drop in the job approval rating of Afghan President Hamid Karzai, to 68 percent.

That approval level would be welcomed by most politicians in the United States.

Most in Afghanistan still think the U.S.-led invasion five years ago had positive effects on their country. Almost nine in 10 call the invasion a good thing for their country. Three-fourths have a favorable opinion of the United States and almost nine in 10 prefer the current government to the Taliban.

The poll of 1,036 adults was conducted in 31 of Afghanistan's 34 provinces, excluding some of the most violent regions in the country, and has a margin of sampling error of plus or minus 3.5 percentage points.

Afghanistan Poll: The Full Report (ABC)

ABC News, December 8, 2006

Dec. 7, 2006 — Five years after the fall of the Taliban, public optimism has declined sharply across Afghanistan, pushed by a host of fresh difficulties: Worsening security, rising concerns about a resurgent Taliban, troubled development efforts, widespread perceptions of corruption and reduced faith in the government's effectiveness in facing these challenges.

The U.S.-led invasion remains highly popular, the Taliban intensely unpopular, and the current Afghan government retains broad support. Yet this extensive ABC News/BBC World Service survey makes clear the country's profound problems, including renewed Taliban activities five years after the fall of their last redoubt, Kandahar, on Dec. 7, 2001:

More than four in 10 Afghans report Taliban violence in their own local area, including killings, bombings, torchings of schools or government buildings and armed conflict with government or foreign troops. That number soars in specific regions, notably in southern Helmand and Kandahar provinces, where eight in 10 report poor security.

One in six Afghans say people in their area provide Taliban fighters with food or money — and that number jumps to more than a third in the northwest, nearly half in the country's southwest provinces overall, and two-thirds specifically in Helmand and Kandahar.

Most Afghans — 57 percent — now call the Taliban the single greatest danger to their country, up 16 points from the first ABC News poll in Afghanistan a year ago. Only in the eastern provinces does the Taliban have a rival threat, drug traffickers.

Drugs

Views on the drug front also are not promising. Signaling frustration with the slow pace of development, there's been a jump in the acceptance of growing opium poppies, the country's illicit cash crop. Nationally, 40 percent now call it acceptable if there's no other way to earn a living, up sharply from 26 percent last year. And in the top-producing opium provinces, more — a 59 percent majority — endorse poppy cultivation.

Despite eradication efforts, Afghanistan is the world's top opium poppy producer — and nearly three-quarters of Afghans suspect the Taliban is protecting the trade.

Deterioration

Compared to a year ago, this poll finds deterioration in a range of public perceptions about the country's condition: a 22-point drop in views that it's headed in the right direction, a 17-point drop in the belief security has improved since the Taliban was in control and a 13-point drop in personal optimism for the year ahead. Trust in parliament is down 18 points while approval of Afghan President Hamid Karzai is down 15 points.

Some of these ratings, to be fair, have fallen from probably unsustainable levels. Sixty-eight percent approve of Karzai's work — down from 83 percent last year, but still a level most national leaders would envy. Fifty-nine percent think the parliament is working for the benefit of the Afghan people, down from 77 percent but still far better than American approval ratings of the U.S. Congress.

Others are lower: Positive ratings of the performance of the United States in Afghanistan are down by 11 points, to 57 percent. Provincial governments are rated positively by 52 percent.

Perhaps most troubling in terms of governance: 78 percent of Afghans call official corruption a problem in the area where they live — and 55 percent call it a big problem. One in four report that they or someone they know has had to pay a bribe to receive proper service from the government — and that jumps to four in 10 in the country's northwest, where corruption is particularly severe.

There are, however, positives. Most Afghans say the government and local police alike have a strong presence in their area. Few say so of the Taliban — and trust the current authorities, at least somewhat, to provide security. Again, likely reflecting the Taliban's broad unpopularity, big majorities continue to call the U.S.-led invasion a good thing for their country (88 percent), to express a favorable opinion of the United States (74 percent) and to prefer the current Afghan government to Taliban rule (88 percent).

Indeed eight in 10 Afghans support the presence of U.S., British and other international forces on their soil; that compares with 5 percent support for Taliban fighters and 11 percent for jihadi fighters from other countries. In the south, however, just three in 10 say international forces have a strong presence. And while just a quarter overall say U.S. forces should leave within a year, that is up from 14 percent a year ago.

Fifty-five percent of Afghans still say the country's going in the right direction, but that number is down sharply from 77 percent last year. Fifty-four percent remain optimistic rather than pessimistic about their future, but that's down from 67 percent. Hopes for a better future can provide an important element of social stability; a decline is cause for concern.

In one sense, optimism at all is remarkable in Afghanistan, given the security problems and deep poverty. (Barely two in 10 Afghans, for example, live in homes that receive electricity from power lines.) But, again, views of today's conditions are balanced by recollections of the repressive Taliban regime. Whatever the current problems, 74 percent say their living conditions today are better now than they were under the Taliban.

That rating, however, is 11 points lower now than it was a year ago.While 58 percent say security, in particular, is better than it was under the Taliban, that's down from 75 percent a year ago. And fewer than half — 43 percent, about the same as last year — say the availability of jobs and economic opportunity has improved.

Confidence Down In Poll Of Afghans (UPI)

UPI, December 8, 2006

KABUL, Afghanistan, Dec. 7 (UPI) -- Optimism and confidence have fallen greatly in the past year among Afghans living in a war between Taliban insurgents and a multi-national NATO force.

The poll of 1,036 randomly selected Afghan citizens was conducted face-to-face for the BBC and ABC News, and found those who are optimistic about their own future fell 13 percent since last year to 54 percent.

Asked if their country is going in the right direction, that number also fell to 55 percent from 77 percent a year ago.

Just 58 percent of Afghans said security is better now than under the Taliban, compared with 77 percent in December 2005.

On the domestic side, nearly 80 percent of people polled said they are worried about government corruption. While the majority still oppose allowing the cultivation of opium poppies, 40 percent said it was acceptable, compared with 26 percent a year ago.

Feds Aim Legal Volley At Gun Dealer (CTPOST)

By MICHAEL P. MAYKO

Connecticut Post, December 8, 2006

BRIDGEPORT — An offer is on the table.

But if Frank D'Andrea, a Milford gun dealer, does not take it in the next few weeks, he faces indictment on additional charges, according to a federal prosecutor.

And if his case goes to trial, the prosecution intends to call Frankie Estrada, the incarcerated drug kingpin, as their key witness against him.

"We're very actively trying to resolve this case," Assistant U.S. Attorney Stephen Reynolds told U.S. District Judge Janet C. Hall Wednesday. "If that fails, we'll likely supersede the indictment."

D'Andrea, 61, of Soundview Drive, Shelton, already faces 12 charges of violating licensing laws by failing to report gun sales and not conducting proper background checks.

The charges stem from an audit and resulting investigation conducted by agents from the U.S. Bureau of Alcohol, Tobacco, Firearms and Explosive Devices at D'Andrea's Gun Case while it was located on Barnum Avenue in Stratford. The business moved to Woodmont Road in Milford earlier this year.

It is anticipated that D'Andrea, who has operated gun stores in the greater Bridgeport area for 35 years, will sell the store.

In a document filed in federal court, Reynolds said he intends to call Estrada as a witness.

Estrada will testify that between 1986 and 1990, he "purchased well over 100 firearms" from D'Andrea using buyers who were not convicted felons and had valid gun permits, the document claims. Such buyers are called straw purchasers.

Estrada

would tell the jury he picked out the guns, paid for them and then had the straw purchaser fill out the ATF forms.

Estrada confessed that two of the guns were used in a murder, according to Reynolds and the witness. Estrada, who is serving a 29-year sentence on federal drug, assault and murder charges, claims he purchased AK-47s, AR-15s, shotguns, handguns and two streetsweepers for his organization. The guns were used to arm his captains, lieutenants and soldiers for protection of his drug-trafficking business in the P.T. Barnum Housing project, according to the document.

Once the guns were used in a shooting, Estrada said they were traded for cash or drugs in New York, according to the document.

Additionally, Reynolds has a second witness he intends to call who will say he rented himself out as a straw purchaser for $250 a gun.

This individual, who is not identified in the court documents, claims he purchased at least 18 guns from D'Andrea's store for others.

Store's Call Led To Bomb Sweep (PPG)

By Torsten Ove, Pittsburgh Post-gazette

Pittsburgh Post-Gazette, December 7, 2006

Parts found in man's Upper St. Clair home, dorm room at Cal U.

Federal agents were trying yesterday to figure out why a college student stashed more than a dozen devices that appeared to be pipe bombs or components of bombs at his parents' house in Upper St. Clair and in his dorm room at California University of Pennsylvania.

Whatever Michael Blattner was up to, if anything, authorities said that employees at the Home Depot in Bridgeville, where he bought some of the materials Saturday night, did the right thing in calling the cops.

"It was very, very commendable," said James Tanda, supervisory agent with the Pittsburgh office of the U.S. Bureau of Alcohol, Tobacco, Firearms and Explosives. "For a retailer to take the time to call us is always appreciated."

ATF, Upper St. Clair police and the county bomb squad went to the Blattner home on Harrogate Road Tuesday night and removed several devices that could have been assembled to form pipe bombs from Mr. Blattner's bedroom.

Earlier in the day, campus police had found an array of similar devices spread out on the floor of his dorm room in Residence Hall A. The devices, which he apparently kept in a foot locker without his roommate's knowledge, were in various phases of assembly.

Mr. Blattner has been cooperative from the start, telling police and agents that he was experimenting with the materials as a hobby and that none of them would really work.

On campus, where he was a freshman honor student, he had a reputation as something of a loner who liked to play around with firecrackers.

Police have found no evidence that he had intentions to blow anything up, but authorities are withholding judgment until an analysis by the county bomb squad and ATF is complete.

If the devices turn out to be operable, Mr. Blattner could end up charged in either state or federal court.

Regardless of how the case turns out, it was a suspicious clerk who got the ball rolling. Local Home Depot employees said they aren't allowed to talk, and the corporate public relations office in Atlanta issued a statement saying only that "we commend our associates for their actions in this matter."

But Collier police said they would recommend commendations for the store manager, the clerk and the investigating officer, Robert Ferrence.

ATF and police have protocols for monitoring purchases from gun dealers and companies that sell specific items that could be used by bomb makers, particularly ammonium nitrate fertilizer. But law enforcement relies on retailers to pay attention to more routine purchases that could be suspicious.

Home Depot wouldn't say what it was about Mr. Blattner that raised eyebrows, but police said the clerk thought something wasn't right because Mr. Blattner appeared to be a juvenile. He's 18 but looks younger. So why was a kid buying black pipe and end caps?

On Monday, the store manager called Collier police, who then contacted Mr. Blattner's parents. They did not return a message yesterday, but they explained to police that their son was a "handy kid."

After learning he was a student, Collier police contacted campus police, who went to the dorm Tuesday morning and found the bomb pieces on the floor.

Upper St. Clair police said they don't believe anyone in the community was in danger. Campus authorities said the same.

Mr. Blattner has been suspended from school but will have a hearing within 10 days. Until then, he's not allowed on campus.

With Victories, City Challenges More Gun Sales (NYT)

By Damien Cave

The New York Times, December 8, 2006

Mayor Michael R. Bloomberg said yesterday that the city had reached agreements with six out-of-state gun dealers, who agreed to let court officials monitor their operations to prevent illegal gun sales. He said that New York had sued 12 additional gun stores to demand similar oversight.

The expansion of New York's legal attack from 15 to 27 gun dealers, in Ohio, Pennsylvania, South Carolina, Georgia and Virginia, reflects the city's growing confidence that its novel approach to battling illegal gun traffic is gaining momentum.

The agreements with the gun dealers — reached over the last four months, with the latest one signed on Wednesday — give officials broad monitoring powers over the individual stores.

They let a court-appointed special master scour their financial records, put up video cameras, and require that employees take part in training sessions on when gun sales are prohibited. The city may also send undercover investigators into the six stores at any time, to make sure that all relevant gun laws are being followed.

The suits resulted from a two-month effort in April and May in which private investigators posed as buyers at 40 stores that had sold guns linked with more than 800 crimes in New York City between 1994 and 2001.

The teams, usually a man and woman, conducted what law enforcement officials describe as a straw purchase: one customer would deal with the seller until the last moment of the sale, when the second customer would step in to pay and fill out the forms for a background check.

Federal law prohibits a seller from handing over the weapon in such cases, because it lets people obtain guns without federal scrutiny of their criminal record Mr. Bloomberg said that straw purchases were one of the most common schemes used by gun traffickers, giving the city the right — with a bold interpretation of public nuisance laws — to go after out-of-state dealers for their weapons' deadly consequences.

"This is about law enforcement, plain and simple," Mr. Bloomberg said. "And it's about keeping guns out of the hands of criminals."

The court cases have emerged as the most successful tactic in Mayor Bloomberg's drive to undermine the illegal gun trade, an effort that has included lobbying Washington to tighten gun laws, convening mayors from around the country at Gracie Mansion to plot political strategy, and persuading Albany to pass a law creating a mandatory minimum sentence of three and a half years for illegal gun possession.

In October, the judge overseeing the lawsuits, Jack B. Weinstein of the Eastern District of New York, named as the special master Andrew Weissmann. Mr. Weissmann, a former assistant United States attorney for the Eastern District of New York, also directed a task force created to investigate the Enron scandal.

The dealers who settled have admitted no wrongdoing. The agreements expire after three years without a reported violation. And some of the store owners say they welcome the chance to clear their names.

"Although it is an intrusion into the privacy of my customers, the thing of it is, I don't feel that I or they have anything to hide," said James T. Farmer, owner of Jim's Guns and Whatever in Dayton, Ohio.

But over all, Mr. Bloomberg's antigun efforts have had only limited success. No other city has yet filed cases like New York's, although Philadelphia is considering it. The effort to change the gun laws in Congress has hit Republican opposition.

Some law enforcement officials have also chafed at Mr. Bloomberg's zeal in taking the fight against gun trafficking outside city limits.

The first wave of 15 lawsuits, filed in May, caught the Bureau of Alcohol, Tobacco, Firearms and Explosives by surprise. City officials had to smooth ruffled feathers just to get the agency — which is responsible for shutting dealers down — to look at the evidence investigators collected. This time, city officials tipped off the agency before filing the additional dozen cases.

Some gun owners, meanwhile, have fought back, denying Mr. Bloomberg's description of them as "bad guys."

In telephone interviews, several owners of shops named in the new set of lawsuits said that they were innocent. Adam Tullis, manager of Toccoa Pawn and Variety in Toccoa, Ga., said had he sold two guns to undercover investigators because he believed they were a married couple.

"They were both together," he said, recalling the sale a few months ago. "As far as I know, they were husband and wife."

A handful of gun dealers have countersued the city as well. Bob Barr, a former Georgia congressman, for example, filed a case on behalf of Adventure Outdoors of Smyrna, Ga., arguing that Mr. Bloomberg had conspired to harm the business.

Larry Mickalis, owner of Mickalis Pawn Shop in Summerville, S.C., said that he was also suing the city because he did not trust New York's ability to trace weapons to his store.

He said that the guns found in New York, used or carried illegally and linked to his shop, might have been bought and sold several times, or stolen, before they ended up on New York streets.

"Their interpretation and their facts on trace data are wrong," he said.

He blamed New York's gun problem on violent movies and the lucrative nature of New York's gun market.

"The prices of guns on the street in New York are enticing," he said.

But John A. Feinblatt, the mayor's criminal justice coordinator, said that the gun shops that were sued clearly violated the straw purchase law and had repeatedly sold weapons linked to crimes in New York City. A typical gun dealer has only one gun involved in a crime traced back to his store over a two-year period, Mr. Feinblatt said. Mr. Mickalis's rate is 49 guns in seven years linked to crimes.

Mr. Bloomberg — after showing reporters a video of a sale at Toccoa Pawn, which showed the female investigator filling out a background check while her male counterpart paid for the weapons — also emphasized that the city planned to address the problem both at the source and on the street.

In addition to the lawsuits, he said, a new ad campaign will appear this winter in subways, saying that illegal possession of a gun would lead to a mandatory prison sentence of three and a half years.

And Mr. Mickalis conceded that Mr. Bloomberg's efforts had forced dealers hundreds of miles from New York to take a closer look at their buyers.

"No one in their right mind," he said, "is going to sell someone from New York a gun."

IMMIGRATION:

Border Patrol Agent Sentenced For Helping Smugglers Of Drugs, People (AP)

AP, December 8, 2006

Agent convicted of accepting $5,000 bribe to allow truck carrying cocaine through Falfurrias.

HOUSTON — A former U.S. Border Patrol agent was sentenced Thursday to 14 years in federal prison for helping cocaine and immigrant smugglers and selling immigration documents.

David Duque Jr., 36, pleaded guilty in September to bribery and three counts of unlawfully transferring identification documents.

Prosecutors showed that Duque accepted $5,000 to allow a vehicle hauling nearly 5 kilograms of cocaine through the Falfurrias checkpoint on June 14. An FBI agent testified that Duque also assisted in immigrant smuggling and sold identification documents he acquired while working.

U.S. District Judge Gray H. Miller sentenced Duque to 14 years for the bribery conviction, to be followed by three years of supervised release and a $2,500 fine. Miller imposed five years on each of the three counts of unlawfully transferring identification documents with the sentences to run concurrently.

During the hearing, Duque was taken into the custody of the U.S. Marshals Service.

An FBI agent said Thursday that Duque had been allowing cocaine and illegal immigrants through the Falfurrias checkpoint for several years and sold almost 70 identification documents including passports, birth certificates, green cards and Social Security cards.

Lawmakers Implore Bush To Commute Agents' Sentences (OCR)

By Dena Bunis, The Orange County Register

Orange County (CA) Register, December 7, 2006

Border Patrol members face 11- and 12-year prison terms for shooting admitted smuggler.

WASHINGTON – Rep. Dana Rohrabacher joined 48 other Republican lawmakers today in sending a letter to President Bush, urging him to commute the sentences of two Border Patrol agents convicted of shooting an illegal immigrant at the border.

Border Patrol agents Ignacio Ramos and Jose Compean are scheduled to begin serving 11- and 12-year prison terms, respectively, next month. The two Border Patrol agents were convicted of shooting an admitted drug smuggler in the buttocks as he ran away from them near the Rio Grande in February 2005.

"These Border Patrol agents are heroes," Rohrabacher, R-Huntington Beach, said at a news conference this morning. "Because of their actions, over a million dollars in illegal drugs were stopped from being sold to our children. Bringing felony charges against them is a travesty of justice beyond description. The president needs to send the right message by showing they are on the side of law enforcement, not drug traffickers."

In the letter being sent to Bush today, Rohrabacher and his colleagues "implore" the president "to become personally involved in this case, and bring a holiday miracle to these agents and their families." Area Reps. Ken Calvert, R-Corona; Gary Miller, R-Diamond Bar; and Ed Royce, R-Fullerton, also signed the letter.

A group of lawmakers has been trying for months to persuade GOP leaders to hold congressional hearings on the circumstances surrounding this case. But neither House Judiciary Chairman James Sensenbrenner nor Senate Judiciary Committee Chairman Arlen Specter was willing to hold such hearings.

In August, Sen. Dianne Feinstein, D-Calif., sent a letter to Specter asking for a hearing. In it she said that after reviewing that case, she believes "there may have been a serious miscarriage of justice." She said "it appears the facts do not add up or justify the length of the sentence for these agents."

Rohrabacher has spoken with family members of the agents and said he's hoping in this holiday season to persuade Bush to commute the sentences. Rohrabacher said he has spoken with Justice Department and White House officials without any satisfactory responses.

Department of Justice and Judiciary Committee officials have not returned Orange County Register calls this morning to comment on the case.

In October, Homeland Security officials told congressional leaders that they were convinced of the agents' guilt. The Texas U.S. attorney who prosecuted the case said in October that the two officers shot at unarmed suspects.

"Being a United States Border Patrol agent is not a license to shoot people," Texas U.S. Attorney Johnny Sutton told reporters at the time. "It is especially not a license to shoot unarmed ... suspects who are running away from you."

"The U.S. Attorney wrongly focused on the minor mistakes of the officers instead of on the illegal drug trafficker," Rohrabacher said today. "When American citizens see an illegal alien narcotics trafficker being given immunity and free health care while the officers who risked their lives to stop him are going to prison, they must believe we in Washington either do not care about the uncontrolled flow of criminals or illegals or they just think we have lost our minds."

Runoff Candidates Avoid Immigration (USAT)

By Alan Gomez, Usa Today

USA Today, December 8, 2006

EAGLE PASS, TEXAS — The border between Texas and Mexico is as fluid as the river that separates them.

Signs hanging outside American storefronts read "Pesos welcome." Parking lots in U.S. schools are filled with Mexican license plates. Pregnant mothers from Mexico go to U.S. hospitals to give birth while American residents cross the border for cheaper prescription drugs and doctor visits.

"I'd say 90% of our customers are Mexican," said Armando Jose Zertuche in a men's fashion store on the U.S. side of the border.

One would expect that a special election being held Tuesday for a congressional seat between Republican Rep. Henry Bonilla and Democratic challenger Ciro Rodriguez would be rife with debate on the issue of illegal immigration.

The GOP has tended to favor strong enforcement of current laws to catch illegal immigrants, and a fence to keep them out. Democrats, who could strengthen their hold on the House with a Rodriguez win, have mostly opposed the fence and favored a measure that would allow the millions of illegals here to remain and become citizens.

Yet the two candidates campaigning to represent Texas' 23rd District have made it a point to avoid any discussion of immigration.

Neither of their campaign websites mentions the issue or the nearly 700 miles of fencing approved by Congress. At rallies in San Antonio and along the border recently, the candidates spoke of health care, education and taxes, but not of immigration.

Bonilla and Rodriguez each cite the importance of other issues and the diversity of the district — the largest in Texas at more than 400 miles wide and 300 miles north to south — when asked why they have avoided the debate.

The U.S. Border Patrol estimates that roughly a quarter of the Mexicans they apprehend entering the country illegally are in Texas.

"How can you resolve a problem if there's no dialogue," said Juan Maldonado of the Southwest Voter Registration Education Project. "They treat it like racism. You just can't talk about it."

So why is the topic being ignored?

"They're scared of it," said Rosie Carrillo, a Del Rio resident.

Or, as University of Texas government professor Sean Theriault put it, "It cuts too hard both ways.

"For as many people in the district that would be pleased with a hard line for immigration, you're going to rally as many people to vote against you, (and vice versa)," he said. "It strikes at the heart of so many people that it would be hard to garner political traction on either side of the issue."

The topic becomes touchier as the race tightens.

Bonilla has represented the district for 14 years, but his hold has been weakened by the national tide against Republicans and a state Supreme Court decision to redraw the district.

The high court ruled that the Republican-controlled state Legislature unfairly repressed the Latino vote when it redrew the 23rd District, so it added heavily Hispanic areas.

Bonilla got more than 70% of the vote in 2004 and outraised his six opponents by a 2-to-1 margin this year. But because of the changing landscape, he only got 48% of the vote in November.

That prompted the Dec. 12 runoff with Rodriguez, who is now getting help from the Democratic Congressional Campaign Committee. The DCCC sent down campaign staffers and purchased a TV ad that started airing this week.

Both candidates are of Mexican descent but Bonilla is the only Mexican-American Republican in Congress. He calls himself a business-friendly, fiscally conservative Republican and shudders at what he calls "pseudo-intellectuals" who try to stereotype him.

"They always think that the color of your skin should dictate what your political philosophy is," Bonilla said. "Nothing can be more insulting."

Rodriguez is a former four-term congressman who paints Bonilla in the "stay the course" brush strokes that worked for other Democrats nationwide.

Of their many differences, immigration is one of the most clear.

Bonilla voted for the border fence and for the House bill that would have made it a felony to be an illegal alien. Rodriguez is strongly against both measures.

Some here say that despite the many illegal immigrants coming, the issue is not a big deal here as it is in the north.

"When (illegals) come across, there are eyes on them all over the place. They're trying to get as far away from the border as they can," said Jerry McNeese, 74, who is retired from an El Paso oil field. "They can get lost in places like Chicago … places up north."

But "up north" could be as close as San Antonio, where a majority of the district's population lives. Many in that area believe a wall may be the only way to stop the wave of illegal immigration.

"It's making a mockery out of our nation," said Bonilla supporter Thomas Marburger, a retired tax attorney. "It's putting tremendous pressure on our social services, hospitals are shutting down, and our taxes are going up because we can't handle that influx."

People along the border agree that the system must be fixed, but they laugh at the idea of a fence.

"If you build a 10-foot wall, they're just going to build an 11-foot ladder," said Democratic state Sen. Carlos Uresti, whose district overlaps most of the congressional district.

Uresti questions his fellow Democrats' decision to avoid the debate.

"It should be an issue," he said.

Off The Fence (LAT)

The Los Angeles Times, December 8, 2006

NEW MEXICO Gov. Bill Richardson, the California-born son of a Mexican mother, traveled to Washington on Thursday to declare his interest in two of the most elusive goals in American politics: comprehensive immigration reform and the presidency. The second may be more realistic than the first.

"I come here as a border state governor and a Hispanic American who knows that our nation can no longer afford to ignore the issue of illegal immigration," Richardson told a Georgetown University audience. "We need to stop exploiting the immigration problem and start solving it. We need to pass realistic laws and then enforce them rigorously."

Richardson's thoughtful speech was both a rebuke to Republican immigrant bashers and a challenge to Capitol Hill Democrats. But few will likely read beyond this line: "Securing the border must come first — but we must understand that building a fence will not in any way accomplish that objective."

That language may be on the absolutist side, but the New Mexico governor is absolutely right to point out that a multibillion-dollar border wall, on its own, is no "reform" at all. It would merely shift the strain on the system elsewhere and fail to address the 45% of illegal immigrants who enter legally but overstay their visas.

For this, Richardson was given the usual treatment — surrealistic bashing from CNN's millionaire working-class hero, Lou Dobbs. Dobbs' website asked readers: "Do you believe, as New Mexico Gov. Bill Richardson suggests, that efforts to secure our borders and ports are nothing more than demagoguery?"

In fact, Richardson has unusual credibility on the issue.

It wasn't long ago that restrictionists were singing his praises for declaring a state of emergency along the border and calling in his state's National Guard to patrol it. He would double the number of Border Patrol agents, mandate a tamper-proof employment card and make any "path to citizenship" expensive in time, money and effort. Yet Richardson would also more than double the number of annual work and family visas, and he has introduced driver's licenses for illegals in New Mexico.

Certainly the governor isn't right about every one of his proposals, and how his speech will affect his presidential aspirations remains to be seen. But he couldn't be more timely in reminding his party that comprehensive immigration reform is no less urgent now that Democrats control Congress.

CONGRESS-ADMINISTRATION:

Lawmakers Try To Renew Tax Breaks (USAT/AP)

By Andrew Taylor

USA Today, December 8, 2006

WASHINGTON — Lawmakers on Thursday pieced together legislation extending popular tax breaks and saving doctors from a cut in Medicare payments as Republicans prepared to cede control of Congress to the Democrats.

The legislation also contained several trade-related measures, including extending normal trade status to Vietnam.

House GOP leaders delayed a vote Thursday after it became clear it couldn't occur until well after midnight. The House vote was rescheduled for today. In the Senate, GOP leaders were experiencing lingering unhappiness with the bill from several GOP senators, especially over extending trade benefits for textile exports from Haiti.

Action on the tax and trade legislation and a subsequent vote on a bill to keep the government running through Feb. 15 were the chief obstacles to concluding the turbulent 109th congressional session.

The massive measure — containing much to please lawmakers and their constituents — also generated opposition. Sen. Judd Gregg, R-N.H., for example, was unhappy about its cost and a multibillion-dollar move to expand health care for retired coal miners.

Under Senate rules, a single senator can force days of delay once a bill comes over from the House.

"It's no better than 50-50 right now," said Senate Minority Leader Harry Reid, D-Nev.

Lawmakers from states such as Georgia, Illinois and Massachusetts were unhappy that House Republicans cut out a plan to ease looming budget shortfalls in a federal-state program providing health insurance to low-income children.

Democrats mostly went along with extending expired tax breaks. They include a research and development tax credit, worth $16.5 billion, and a sales tax deduction for people in states without income taxes, at a cost of $5.5 billion.

Democrats criticized Republicans for leaving behind more than $460 billion in unfinished agency budgets, requiring passage of a third stopgap spending bill to keep the government running.

The House and Senate planned votes for today to avoid a government shutdown. Government agencies, except for the Defense and Homeland Security departments, have been on autopilot at or below 2006 budget levels since the new spending year began Oct. 1.

The clampdown is affecting agencies such as Veterans Affairs, which would receive a $3.1 billion influx for medical care under its moribund budget bill. Lawmakers promised the VA would get more flexibility to work around the problem, but veterans' groups are upset.

Democrats are unhappy that the budget impasse is being dropped in their laps next year, when it promises to clutter their early agenda.

"They are going to leave a mess as they go out," said incoming Speaker Nancy Pelosi, D-Calif. "It's been a do-nothing Congress and as they go out the door they are going to validate" voters' decision that change was needed.

Besides the sales and research tax breaks, the tax and trade legislation would extend deductions or credits for college tuition, hiring welfare recipients and buying solar energy equipment.

Both parties support the breaks, but their extensions have been blocked by attempts to link to other, more contentious bills. They include trade legislation affecting Haitian textile imports and an abandoned coal mine reclamation program, estimated to cost up to $5 billion over 10 years.

Also driving the massive bill forward was an effort to hold off a 5% cut in Medicare payments to physicians and a plan to allow oil and gas drilling along the Gulf of Mexico.

The Vietnam bill would end the Cold War mandate that trade with the communist state be reviewed every year. While supported by the Bush administration, the proposal has run into opposition from critics of Vietnam's human rights record and those worried about the impact on American jobs.

Republicans Push For Quick Action (WSJ)

By David Rogers, Sarah Lueck And Greg Hitt

The Wall Street Journal, December 8, 2006

WASHINGTON -- Eager to adjourn, Republicans are pressing for quick congressional approval of a $45.1 billion tax-and-trade package after late-night bargaining affecting timber, energy and health-care industries.

The House is preparing to consider the massive package today in two pieces, one focused on the trade provisions and the second dealing with taxes, offshore oil drilling and an adjustment in payment rates for physicians under Medicare, the federal health-care program for the elderly and disabled.

Driving the train is the tax portion, which renews scores of expired tax breaks, most notably a deduction for college tuition, a deduction for state and local sales taxes in states without income taxes, and the corporate tax credit for research.

Procedural arguments delayed House action last evening, but if approved today, the two bills would be merged again before going to the Senate, where the leadership is poised to quickly file a motion to limit debate. The White House is optimistic, but as a precaution, a separate must-pass spending bill is being held back in case the tax-and-trade package collapses and a new legislative vehicle is needed.

"I think we're there. It feels good right now," said Senate Majority Leader Bill Frist (R., Tenn.) who with Speaker Dennis Hastert (R., Ill.) helped shepherd the talks on what is one of the last major actions of the 109th Congress. But Mr. Frist conceded that the trade chapters are contentious and even last evening language was being added to appease individual senators, including a Western lands amendment for Democratic Leader Harry Reid of Nevada.

In the final bargaining, the coal industry won a $4.9 billion provision to boost federal spending for retiree health benefits and abandoned mine reclamation. To appease conservatives angered by the costs, new tax language was added to promote use of health savings accounts, a priority for House Republican leaders.

New York was a big loser when tax credits to help finance a proposed rail connection between lower Manhattan and John F. Kennedy International Airport were killed. House Ways and Means Committee Chairman Bill Thomas (R., Cal.) had linked the Senate initiative, worth an estimated $682 million over 10 years, to a $477 million tax break for the timber industry, initiated by the House last summer and important to companies such as Weyerhaeuser Co.

When senators objected to the timber measure's cost, New York's proposal, part of the city's effort to redevelop the World Trade Center area, was also dropped. Critics called it a tit-for-tat by Mr. Thomas. "It's just so stupid and high school," said Rep. Charles Rangel (D., N.Y.), who succeeds Mr. Thomas as committee chairman in the new Congress. "It's full of spite, but I view this as the end of a long nightmare."

The lingering tensions over the timber and New York decision appeared to contribute to delays last night. But looking ahead, the bigger flashpoints in the Senate are the trade provisions, especially those related to Vietnam and Haiti.

The U.S. Chamber of Commerce has strongly supported the Vietnam agreement, which is needed for U.S. companies to take advantage of trade concessions Hanoi made as part of its pending entry into the Geneva-based World Trade Organization. But labor has protested Vietnam's weak record on workers' rights, and the AFL-CIO fears the U.S. will lose leverage to effect changes in Vietnam's labor standards.

The Catholic Church has emerged as a strong champion for the Haiti provision, which to help spur industry there allows fabric from other countries to be used in the manufacture of duty-free goods destined to the U.S. Domestic textile producers say it creates an effective loophole for low-cost apparel makers in China, but the Catholic bishops argue that Haiti, the poorest country in the Western Hemisphere, deserves special attention.

Elsewhere in South America, the bill extends Andean trade preferences, but under terms that put pressure on Ecuador and Bolivia to move closer to the U.S. on trade promotion.

The coal provisions, by helping United Mine Workers, were calculated to diffuse some of the labor opposition to the trade portions of the package. But the deal was expensive, and its price tag only grows with the addition of the health savings tax provisions to appease the House.

Altogether, the HSA-related tax breaks add up to more than $1 billion over 10 years, for example. Among the largest is a substantial increase in the amount of money individuals are allowed to set aside tax free each year for their health-savings accounts, thereby making them a more attractive savings vehicle.

The change, which in 2007 would allow contributions of up to $2,850 annually for an individual and $5,650 for a family, would cost Treasury $712 million over 10 years, according to preliminary estimates.

Apart from coal, oil has a stake in the tax package and in language that would open up millions of acres for exploration in the Gulf of Mexico. The health-care industry also has a lot riding on provisions affecting both Medicare and the federal-state Medicaid insurance program for the poor.

Physicians would escape a scheduled 5% cut in Medicare reimbursements next year, and the bill promised a bonus payment of 1.5% for the last six months of 2007 for those doctors who participate in new reporting requirements to help Medicare collect quality-of-treatment data.

In the case of Medicaid, the nursing home and hospital lobby won language intended to block the administration from using new regulations to close a loophole used by states to claim a greater federal contribution for services for the poor. But to help Medicare pay physicians, negotiators raided a once sacrosanct "stabilization fund" the administration could have used beginning in 2007 to shore up certain health insurers.

The cuts from the fund will have little immediate impact on the health plans, but some in the health insurance industry worry that it would leave the Medicare plans more exposed to future payment cuts in the new Democratic-controlled Congress that takes power in January.

Tax Break Bill May Open Gulf Drilling (AP)

By H. Josef Hebert

AP, December 8, 2006

An agreement on a tax package Thursday moved Congress closer to opening a vast area in the Gulf of Mexico, 125 miles south of Florida's panhandle, to oil and gas drilling.

Both the House and Senate attached the drilling legislation to a package of popular tax measures expected to win approval by week's end as Republicans wrap up the 109th Congress and turn control over to Democrats next year.

The drilling legislation also revamps revenue sharing from Gulf oil and gas production, sending hundreds of millions of dollars to four Gulf states for restoring coastal wetlands and repairing hurricane damage.

Environmentalists opposed the measure, calling it a gift to large oil companies. Drilling supporters — including a cross-section of the business community — argued it would provide access to badly needed energy resources, especially natural gas, and perhaps drive down prices.

The 8.3 million acres that would be opened to drilling are believed to contain 1.3 billion barrels of oil and 6 trillion cubic feet of natural gas, enough gas to heat 6 million homes for 15 years. The country uses about 21 million barrels of oil a day.

The drilling area was carefully crafted to gain support of Florida's lawmakers, with its eastern edge more than 200 miles from state beaches.

"This protects Florida," said Sen. Mel Martinez, R-Fla.

Sen. Mary Landrieu, D-La., called the drilling legislation critical to Louisiana and other Gulf Coast states recovering from hurricane Katrina and trying to restore storm-damaged wetlands. The measure would steer 37.5 percent of federal royalties to the four Gulf oil-producing states, with about half going to Louisiana.

While Louisiana's share would be about $100 million a year initially, the amount would dramatically grow after 2017 to more than $650 million annually because of increased production from not only the 8.3 million acres but elsewhere in the Gulf.

Some lawmakers and the Bush administration have raised concerns about shifting eventually billions of dollars in royalties from federal oil and gas to the four states — Louisiana, Mississippi, Alabama and Texas.

Nonetheless, the administration has supported the measure.

The Senate approved the bill last summer but House Republicans held out for broader access to oil and gas beneath the country's Outer Continental Shelf. A House bill passed earlier in the year would have lifted the long-standing moratorium that has barred offshore drilling in 85 percent of the country's coastal waters.

After suffering losses in last month's election, House GOP leaders accepted the Senate-passed bill that was limited to the Gulf region.

"I don't believe it represents the answer to our country's worsening supply situation," said Rep. John Peterson, R-Pa., who had been a co-sponsor of the broader drilling plan. But he said he now supported the Senate version as a first step to broader offshore drilling.

House GOP leaders had planned to bring up the legislation separately earlier in the week but shifted tactics because they could not get the two-thirds vote needed for passage under an expedited process.

Lawmakers Unexpectedly Take Up Postal Service Overhaul (WP)

By Stephen Barr

The Washington Post, December 8, 2006

In a round of unexpected dealmaking, the House and Senate began moving yesterday toward passage of legislation that would overhaul the business operations of the U.S. Postal Service for the first time since 1970.

DOJ_NMG_0104015

The measure stalled in September over objections lodged by a union, and one of the chief sponsors, Sen. Susan Collins (R-Maine), held out little hope that a compromise could be reached before the lame-duck session ended.

But key Senate and House leaders, including Rep. Henry A. Waxman (D-Calif.), came up with an agreement, and congressional aides said the measure could be approved no later than today under expedited procedures. Some aides, however, said they were worried that last-minute snags could develop that might sink the bill.

The measure would replace the lengthy and litigious process used to raise the price of stamps for first-class mail and to set rates for magazines and other products, and would free up billions of dollars to finance the health-care costs of postal retirees.

"This legislation will help us avoid disastrous future postal rate hikes and put the Postal Service on firm financial footing for the 21st century," Sen. Thomas R. Carper (D-Del.) said last night.

He predicted the bill would help the post office "survive at a time when more and more people communicate and do business through faxes, e-mail and electronic bill-pay rather than hard-copy mail."

The compromise, congressional aides said, would:

? Create a cap for raising postal rates by linking adjustments to increases in the consumer price index, giving mailers some predictability about postage increases. The price cap would be reviewed after 10 years by a newly created Postal Regulatory Commission, which could modify the cap or adopt an alternative rate system if necessary.

? Repeal a law that requires the Postal Service to make payments, originally intended for postal pensions but no longer needed, into an escrow fund. That essentially would release $78 billion over 60 years, money that would be used to cover retiree health-care liabilities, pay off postal debts to the Treasury and perhaps lower rate increases.

? Put in place a three-day waiting period before an employee is eligible to receive workers' compensation for job-related injuries. The waiting period is a feature of most state workers' comp programs, and at one point had been dubbed a deal-breaker by the National Association of Letter Carriers union. The NALC had no comment. Other federal employees are not subject to a waiting period.

To reach the compromise, House negotiators agreed to keep the waiting period, as sought by the Senate, and Senate negotiators agreed to give way to the House on whether the rate cap could come up for review and possible modification.

In addition to Collins, Waxman and Carper, negotiators on the bill included Reps. Thomas M. Davis III (R-Va.), John M. McHugh (R-N.Y.) and Danny K. Davis (D-Ill.), and officials from the White House and Treasury Department, aides said.

Some aides pointed to Carper as a central player in pulling together the compromise by reaching out to Waxman, Collins and White House officials this week.Dental-Vision Web Site Falters

An Internet site for enrollment in a federal dental and vision program has balked at loading Web pages and "timed out" users, apparently because it could not handle the large number of employees and retirees trying to sign up for the new benefits.

The Office of Personnel Management said, "A late surge of interest in the final week of the open season has slowed access" to Benefeds.com and jammed telephone lines that also can be used to enroll. Employees and retirees have until Monday to sign up for the benefits, being offered for the first time this year.

Robert F. Danbeck, an associate director at the OPM, said, "We are doing everything possible to improve the site functionality and phone access times."

People unable to enroll "due to a cause beyond their control" will be allowed to register after the Monday deadline, he said.

About 325,000 people have signed up for the new dental and vision coverage, officials said.Talk Shows

Democrats Will Try To Block Pay Raise (AP)

By David Espo

AP, December 8, 2006

Members of Congress are in line for a $3,300 pay raise effective Jan. 1 unless they block it, and Democrats said Thursday they intend to try.

Officials said Rep. Nancy Pelosi of California and Sen. Harry Reid of Nevada, the party's leaders, had notified Republicans they will try to add the anti-pay-raise provision to a bill that provides funds for most government agencies through Feb. 15.

Congress must pass the funding bill before it adjourns for the year, and the target for that is Friday.

Democrats won control of Congress in last month's elections after a campaign in which they frequently criticized majority Republicans for taking pay raises while blocking numerous attempts to raise the minimum wage.

"It is unconscionable that members of congress would get yet another pay raise while the minimum wage has been stuck at $5.15 an hour for the last 10 years. Senator Reid intends to do all he can to ensure that Congress won't get a raise until working families do," said his spokesman, Jim Manley.

Democrats have made legislation to increase the minimum wage one of their priorities for the new Congress that convenes in January.

Under federal law, lawmakers, like many federal employees, receive a cost of living increase on each Jan. 1. The increase for 2007 is pegged at 2 percent, and would put the salary for rank-and-file lawmakers at $168,500.

The maneuvering is often intense around the politically sensitive issue of pay raises, and this year has been no different.

Rep. Jim Matheson, D-Utah, sought this summer to block the increase from taking effect as part of debate on legislation to provide funds for the Transportation Department.

"I do not think that it is appropriate to let this bill go through without an up or down vote on whether or not Congress should have an increase in its own pay," he said at the time.

But by a 249-167 procedural vote, the House decided not to allow the vote Matheson wanted.

The pay raise would also apply to the vice president — who is president of the Senate — congressional leaders and Supreme Court justices.

President Bush's salary of $400,000 is unaffected.

US Congress Likely To Back India Nuclear Bill (FT)

By Jo Johnson

Financial Times, December 8, 2006

Top officials in New Delhi and Washington were on Thursday confident that US legislators would approve a historic but controversial bill that will end India's isolation as a nuclear power. It would also secure President George W. Bush a much-needed foreign policy success in the last hours of the "lame duck" session on Capitol Hill.

The only main uncertainty left was a clause reportedly in the reconciled version of the bill, which had yet to be made public, making nuclear co-operation conditional on India's continuing to toe the US line on Iran.

The Bush administration and the Indian government have urged lawmakers to remove the condition. At a press conference in New Delhi, Nicholas Burns, under-secretary for political affairs, said he expected the final text to be "well within the parameters" of the two main headline agreements reached by Mr Bush and Manmohan Singh, the Indian prime minister, in July 2005 and March 2006.

Thanking the US Congress for its bipartisan support of the bill, Mr Burns said: "It was right to welcome India into the international non-proliferation mainstream, to allow the barriers to come down and to see co-operation that we haven't had since the 1970s . . . It's time India was given its rights. We saw this as an issue of strategic liberation."

The reconciled text would reportedly require the US president to determine that India is "fully and actively" co-operating with US efforts to confront Iran's nuclear ambitions before he could allow nuclear co-operation with India. It is understood the arrangement would be subject to an annual review.

India twice this year voted with the US in recommending that Iran's nuclear programme be referred to the United Nations Security Council. Indian officials have argued that the clause would only bind the US, a line of argument that has failed to reassure some in New Delhi.

Mr Burns said that India's stance on Iran, which he noted had been aligned with that of China and Russia, had been "in the mainstream" of international opinion. "No one wants to infringe on India's right to make sovereign decisions. It's important Iran is sent one message on its nuclear programme," he said.

Several more critical approvals - by the International Atomic Energy Agency and the 45-nation Nuclear Suppliers Group - are needed before the agreement can take effect and several countries, including China and Japan, have yet to give unambiguous support. But approval in the US Congress would mean India is getting closer than it has been in three decades to being able to purchase US nuclear fuel, reactors and related technology.

Even though it has nuclear arms, India never signed the nuclear Non-Proliferation Treaty. As existing US law prohibits Washington from selling nuclear technology and fuel to non-NPT signatories, the proposed changes would reverse a 30-year-old approach to US attempts to stop the spread of nuclear weapons.

Hill Accord Reached On Nuclear Fuel For India (AP)

AP, December 8, 2006

Lawmakers reached agreement yesterday on allowing U.S. shipments of civilian nuclear fuel to India, clearing the way for overturning decades of American anti-proliferation policy.

DOJ_NMG_0104017

After several days of talks, congressional negotiators signed off on the measure, which reconciles separate versions previously endorsed overwhelmingly by the House and the Senate, said a spokesman for House Majority Leader John A. Boehner (R-Ohio).

Both chambers of Congress must vote again on the bill before sending it to President Bush to sign into law. Boehner's office said the House was expected to consider the bill today. Details of the final bill were not immediately available.

The bill's passage would be a rare victory for Bush, whose popularity has tumbled. He will also have to deal with a Democratic-controlled Congress in January after his Republican Party was defeated in the Nov. 7 midterm elections.

The White House promotes the India plan as a major shift in U.S. policy toward a country that is strategically an important Asian power, one that has long maintained what the United States considers a responsible nuclear program. Critics say the extra nuclear fuel that the deal would provide could free India's domestic uranium for use in its weapons program. India developed its nuclear weapons outside the Non-Proliferation Treaty, which it has refused to sign.

Congressional aides said the bill became bogged down this week when Boehner halted action, apparently in an attempt to attach unrelated legislation. The majority leader's office said he was not holding up the bill.

Undersecretary of State R. Nicholas Burns and his Indian counterpart, Foreign Secretary Shiv Shankar Menon, yesterday expressed confidence that each side would be satisfied with the outcome of Congress's work.

Senate Approves FDA Chief Nomination (AP)

AP, December 8, 2006

The Senate on Thursday confirmed cancer surgeon Andrew von Eschenbach to head the Food and Drug Administration, but only after breaking a filibuster in which he was accused of impeding congressional investigations.

The vote was 80-11.

Von Eschenbach, a former head of the National Cancer Institute, has been acting head of the FDA for more than year. He was approved in September by the Senate Health, Education, Labor and Education Committee, but members of both parties had stalled a final vote on his nomination.

The secretary of health and human services, Mike Leavitt, said he was pleased the "critical agency" would now have permanent leadership.

"Andy has the energy, vision and expertise that will help the agency to improve product safety, spurring innovation and helping lifesaving therapies reach patients faster," Leavitt said.

Democrats blocked it until the FDA decided to allow nonprescription sales of the morning-after pill now on the market.

But von Eschenbach still faced formidable opposition from Senate Finance Committee Chairman Charles Grassley, R-Iowa, who mounted a filibuster broken in a 89-6 vote earlier Thursday.

Grassley has been investigating the FDA's handling of the antibiotic Ketek, which has been linked to severe liver problems and several deaths.

Von Eschenbach has resisted release of full information about Ketek, saying it could have a chilling effect on the FDA's ability to evaluate drug safety and other issues independently and objectively.

Before Thursday's vote, Grassley attacked what he called "the cozy relationship between some drug companies and the Food and Drug Administration."

"This nominee is not likely to serve well because he just doesn't seem to get it," Grassley said. "First and foremost, he is supposed to do the right thing on behalf of Americans. Dr. von Eschenbach has other interests to serve and they are not always the interests of John Q. Public."

Others voting against advancing the nomination included Sens. Jim DeMint, R-S.C., and David Vitter, R-La. DeMint wants the FDA to suspend sales of the abortion pill RU-486 and investigate whether it increases the likelihood of infection by a rare but deadly bacterium. Vitter wants the agency to allow importation of some prescription drugs from Canada.

The FDA has been without a permanent head for all but 18 months of the Bush administration.

Former FDA Commissioner Lester Crawford abruptly resigned from the job last year, which led von Eschenbach to be tapped.

Crawford pleaded guilty in October to conflict of interest and false reporting of information about stocks he owned in food, beverage and medical device companies he was in charge of regulating. Crawford admitted to falsely reporting that he had sold or did not own stock when he continued holding shares in the firms governed by FDA rules.

New Leader Of The F.D.A. Is Confirmed By The Senate (NYT)

By Stephanie Saul

DOJ_NMG_0104018

The Senate confirmed Dr. Andrew C. von Eschenbach as commissioner of the Food and Drug Administration yesterday, with some lawmakers expressing hope that his leadership would bring stability to an agency hobbled by turnover and accused of poor oversight of the nation's drug supply.

Dr. von Eschenbach, 65, a surgeon, became acting commissioner in September 2005 after the abrupt resignation of Dr. Lester Crawford. Previously, he had served as chief academic officer at the M. D. Anderson Cancer Center in Houston and had led the National Cancer Institute.

In the past 10 years, no commissioner has served more than two years. A report released in September by the Institute of Medicine, part of the National Academies, deplored a "lack of stable leadership" at the agency. The report said that turnover at the helm would compromise efforts to improve the effectiveness of the agency, which the report criticized as rife with internal squabbles, poor management and outdated rules.

Dr. von Eschenbach was formally nominated to the position of commissioner in March, but his confirmation was delayed by a series of objections in the form of "holds" by senators from both parties who said they were protesting everything from the agency's delay of Plan B emergency contraceptives to the administration's stance on drug reimportation, or the purchase of prescription drugs in countries where they are cheaper.

By Senate tradition, any member may delay a nominee through a hold, but the majority leader has the discretion to override it.

Before delivering a farewell speech on Thursday on the Senate floor, Senator Bill Frist, the retiring majority leader, called for a procedural vote to bring Dr. von Eschenbach's name before the full Senate for confirmation, ignoring remaining "holds" from two fellow Republicans.

Senator Frist of Tennessee, who was a cardiac surgeon before he joined the Senate, said Dr. von Eschenbach had done a "superb" job as acting commissioner.

Dr. von Eschenbach's confirmation, by a vote of 80 to 11, came despite the strong objections of Senator Charles E. Grassley, an Iowa Republican who has been an outspoken critic of the agency.

Senator Grassley had placed a hold on Dr. von Eschenbach's nomination, accusing him of refusing to turn over evidence needed for a Senate Finance Committee investigation of an antibiotic, Ketek.

Ketek, which is manufactured by the French company Sanofi-Aventis, was approved in 2004 despite the misgivings of employees at the drug agency. It has since been linked to liver problems and deaths. The F.D.A. has scheduled advisory panel hearings for next week on whether to keep it on the market.

Former employees of the agency have told Senator Grassley, who leads the finance committee, that Dr. von Eschenbach held a meeting and, using sports metaphors, hinted that they would be retaliated against, or be "off the team," if they discussed their complaints about Ketek outside the agency. Dr. von Eschenbach has said he did not intend the comments as a threat.

"The American people don't want the government making decisions about what's good for them behind closed doors," Senator Grassley said.

Senator Michael B. Enzi, a Wyoming Republican who heads the Health, Education, Labor and Pensions Committee, urged Dr. von Eschenbach's confirmation, citing the need for a permanent leader.

"The F.D.A. has been without a confirmed commissioner for all but 18 months of the last five and a half years," Mr. Enzi said. "Ever see a business that could run for five and a half years without a boss except for 18 months?"

Dr. von Eschenbach, a urologic surgeon who has been treated for melanoma and prostate cancer, has said he believes that new drugs should be made available as quickly as possible, particularly those intended to treat life-threatening illnesses.

As acting commissioner, Dr. von Eschenbach moved this year to make Plan B, the emergency contraceptive, available to adults without a prescription. This silenced some administration critics who had complained that conservative political interference at the agency had previously blocked the drug's broader availability.

Senator David Vitter, a Louisiana Republican who had also put a hold on the confirmation, said he was protesting the administration's policy that prohibits Americans from buying their drugs in Canada, where they are up to 50 percent cheaper.

Dr. von Eschenbach succeeds Dr. Crawford, who resigned from the post after questions about discrepancies in his financial disclosure forms. Dr. Crawford pleaded guilty in October to federal misdemeanor charges of lying on those forms about stock holdings in companies regulated by the agency.

Senate Confirms New FDA Chief As Agency Braces For Scrutiny (WSJ)

By Anna Wilde Mathews

The Wall Street Journal, December 8, 2006

WASHINGTON -- Andrew von Eschenbach was confirmed as head of the U.S. Food and Drug Administration, giving the agency greater stability at its top as it heads into a difficult year of scrutiny and likely legislative changes on Capitol Hill.

Dr. von Eschenbach, a 65-year-old oncologist and surgeon as well as the former director of the National Cancer Institute, has been the acting head of the FDA since September 2005. Dr. von Eschenbach's nomination faced a series of holdups from senators raising concerns about hot-button issues including emergency contraception, drug importation and a continuing investigation of the antibiotic Ketek. Last night, however, the Senate appeared to put those issues behind it and approved his nomination on an 80-11 vote.

In his public speeches, Dr. von Eschenbach, a cancer survivor, has emphasized the importance of emerging new technologies in health care, and in the past he has spoken about wanting to examine whether the drug-review process needs changes to "streamline and accelerate" the approval of promising new therapies. At the National Cancer Institute, part of the National Institutes of Health, he was identified with a high-profile goal of eliminating suffering and death caused by cancer by 2015.

In a statement, Dr. von Eschenbach said that he was "humbled by the responsibility with which I have been entrusted" and "committed to leading this agency in a manner that continues to earn" Americans' trust and respect.

Dr. von Eschenbach will face tough challenges over the next year, as the new Democratic-controlled Congress is expected to perform aggressive oversight of many aspects of the FDA, with focuses on drug safety and issues surrounding generic medicines. The legislation that authorizes the industry user fees that fund much of the work of the agency's drug and device centers must be renewed in 2007. Those bills could become vehicles for a variety of broad-based changes to the agency.

At the same time, the new commissioner will probably press for increased federal funding that agency staffers and industry officials have said is vital -- particularly if the FDA is asked to take on significant new regulatory responsibilities. That will be a tough sell amid budget pressures sparked by the Iraq war and other costly government commitments.

FEC Chairman To Resign From Agency (AP)

AP, December 8, 2006

Michael Toner, the Republican chairman of the Federal Election Commission, announced Thursday that he will resign from the regulatory agency this winter to pursue unspecified professional opportunities.

Toner's term as chairman ends Jan. 1 and his term as commissioner expires in April.

A longtime Republican political legal adviser, Toner was general counsel to the 2000 Bush-Cheney presidential campaign and chief counsel to the Republican National Committee before President Bush placed him on the FEC in March 2002 in a recess appointment. The Senate confirmed him in 2003.

Labor Presses For Measure To Ease Unionizing (NYT)

By Steven Greenhouse

The New York Times, December 8, 2006

Claiming a major role in the Democrats' victory last month, labor leaders are pressing Congressional Democrats to enact a measure to make it easier for workers to unionize.

Labor leaders see the measure as pivotal to stop a slide in union membership that has lasted decades. But many businesses and Republicans oppose the bill, which would allow employees at a workplace to unionize as soon as a majority sign cards expressing support to join a union.

The A.F.L.-C.I.O. plans to flex its muscles for the bill by holding a rally today on Capitol Hill that it expects to include the incoming Democratic chairmen of the Senate and House labor committees, Senator Edward M. Kennedy of Massachusetts and Representative George Miller of California.

Even before the Democrats won control of Congress, the bill, the Employee Free Choice Act, had 216 co-sponsors in the House, including 14 Republicans, just 2 short of a majority.

With the Democrats capturing both houses, labor and its allies voice confidence that the bill will pass in the House, but they fear a formidable battle in the Senate, where some foresee a Republican filibuster.

"We want to remind Congress that this is the A.F.L.-C.I.O.'s No. 1 priority, and we're going to push as hard as we can," said Stewart Acuff, organizing director of the labor federation. "Congress has an obligation to restore the right to organize."

With the percentage of workers in unions sinking to 12.5 percent, the lowest in more than 70 years, labor leaders say the right to organize has been severely compromised, especially by aggressive antiunion campaigns that companies mount for organizing drives.

Viewing the climate as right for reversing the decline, the A.F.L.-C.I.O. is sponsoring an organizing summit meeting today, bringing together 700 leaders and organizers to discuss how to recruit more members.

"The freedom to join a union is the key to holding onto the middle class in this country," said John J. Sweeney, the A.F.L.-C.I.O.'s president. "We think the best antipoverty tool is a union card. Research shows that nearly 60 percent of workers would form a union tomorrow if given the choice."

Labor officials say relying on signed cards rather than the traditional secret-ballot elections will make it easier for workers to unionize. Such elections frequently turn into months of battles between management and labor, with union supporters often being fired.

Charlie Norwood, a Georgia Republican who is chairman of the House Subcommittee on Workforce Protections, denounced the bill for card checks.

"It is very telling that first up on the Democrats' agenda after taking power is rolling back voting rights," Mr. Norwood said. "Democrats and their big labor bosses are seeking to steal workers' rights to cast ballots in a private voting booth."

In calling card checks unfair, Mr. Norwood said union thugs had used physical force to have workers sign pro-union cards. Opponents of card checks also say they are conducted so quickly that companies do not have a chance to explain to workers why they should not join unions.

Representative Nancy Pelosi, the incoming speaker, said yesterday that the bill would probably go to the House floor in the early spring.

"We certainly will be passing the card check, the Employee Free Choice Act," Mrs. Pelosi, Democrat of California, told reporters.

Defending the Employee Free Choice Act, Mr. Acuff said, "This legislation only says that when workers want a fairer, quicker, cleaner, more just process, that they can have their wishes honored more quickly and cleanly."

Under the bill, workers would choose to unionize through card checks or a secret-ballot election. Companies would have to honor the decision.

Pointing to the benefits of card checks, Larry Cohen, president of the Communications Workers of America, said his union had organized 22,000 workers at Cingular Wireless using them over the past two years. Mr. Cohen said a big problem with secret-ballot elections was that in the weeks leading up to them companies often terrorized pro-union workers by spying on them and firing or demoting them.

"We're not trying to eliminate secret-ballot elections," said Mr. Cohen, who is chairman of the A.F.L.-C.I.O. organizing committee. "Essentially, we're trying to create two parallel tracks for union recognition."

Upon Retiring, Frist Urges Senators To Work Together (WP)

By Lois Romano

The Washington Post, December 8, 2006

As man-hugs go, this one was definitely uncomfortable to watch.

Apparently taking the Democrats' pledge of civility seriously, Sen. Harry M. Reid of Nevada bearhugged a startled Sen. Bill Frist yesterday, as Frist, the outgoing majority leader, bid farewell to his colleagues on the Senate floor. As the two men firmly shook hands, the Democrat unexpectedly reeled Frist in closer. After an awkward two-step, Frist even hugged back a little.

The fuzzy moment starkly contrasted with Democratic Senate leader Thomas A. Daschle's farewell two years ago -- when few Republicans even showed up. Frist's goodbye was positively warm and was attended by about 25 Democrats. Even liberal Sen. Edward M. Kennedy (D-Mass.) showered praise on the GOP leader. And all gave him a long standing ovation.

Frist, retiring from the Senate after limiting himself to two terms, delivered a final address to a hushed gallery, urging his colleagues of 12 years to work together and warning against "destructive partisanship."

"We are moving toward a body with a two-year vision," the Tennessee Republican said, "governing for the next election -- rather than a body with a 20-year vision. . . . I urge that we also consider what our work in this chamber is really all about. Is it about keeping the majority? Is it about red states versus blue states? Is it about lobbing attacks across the aisle? Is it about war rooms whose purpose is not to contrast ideas but to destroy? Or is it more?"

Frist, a physician, has ended his political career for now, announcing last week that he will not run for president as he had planned and instead would return to his home state. He had a meteoric rise as a "citizen legislator," as he called himself, who jumped into the business of politics after a career in medicine. He was elected majority leader after Sen. Trent Lott (R-Miss.) was forced out over racially insensitive remarks.

But a string of missteps and defeats, not the least of which was the GOP loss of the Senate, left Frist with a mixed legacy as he contemplated the White House. That he was perceived to have carried water for an increasingly unpopular president did not help.

He was ridiculed for declaring that Terri Schiavo, a Florida woman whose medical case began a national spectacle, had not suffered irreversible brain damages, though he had not examined her -- and he is a heart surgeon. As a national debate raged, Frist said he was basing his diagnosis on a videotape he had viewed of the brain-damaged woman.

Later, Frist alienated the conservatives he would need to launch a presidential bid when he said he would support expanding federal funding of embryonic stem cell research, contrary to the Bush administration's position.

Yesterday, Frist was escorted into the chamber by Vice President Cheney, Senate Minority Leader-elect Mitch McConnell (R-Ky.) and outgoing House Speaker J. Dennis Hastert (R-Ill.). Frist's wife and their three sons watched from the gallery.

Reid said that he and Frist are friends, despite partisan differences.

"Over the years, we have had our ups and downs," he said. ". . . We've had problems over budgets or committee structure, disagreements about schedules." But Reid said he never doubted that Frist did what did "because he believed in his heart it was the right thing."

Aspirations Dashed, Frist Says Farewell (NYT)

By Carl Hulse

The New York Times, December 8, 2006

WASHINGTON, Dec. 7 — In the end, Senator Bill Frist found it easier to master the science of medicine rather than that of politics.

Mr. Frist, a Tennessee Republican who bid the Senate farewell on Thursday after four years as majority leader, is departing with his party's majority in last month's elections and his presidential hopes dashed against some questionable political calculations, legislative missteps and uncertainty about his own drive for another campaign.

There was significant pomp as Mr. Frist made his goodbye, and potent symbolism as well. He was preceded into the chamber by Vice President Dick Cheney, representing the White House that helped install him in the leadership job in 2002 and was seen as holding strong influence over him. Then came Speaker J. Dennis Hastert, the leader of the House, where corruption and gridlock helped spell the end of Republican control.

It was not the triumphant finale Mr. Frist, a former heart-and-lung surgeon, envisioned, having counted on his pedigree of medical and public policy expertise to provide the foundation for a presidential bid in 2008. Like others before him, Mr. Frist discovered that leading the Senate — and the accommodations requisite in the job — proved to be a political impediment. In Mr. Frist's case, his methodical physician's demeanor was not always suited to the black art of Senate wheeling and dealing.

"In the doctor-patient relationship, you don't take someone's heart out and put another one back in without 100 percent trust," Mr. Frist said in an interview before his Senate speech, which ended with an awkward hug from his Democratic counterpart, Senator Harry Reid of Nevada. "But trust around here is very rare. That is an adjustment for me."

Mr. Frist scored some legislative successes, helping create the Medicare prescription drug program and winning confirmation for two conservative Supreme Court justices at a time of bitter partisanship over judicial nominees. But even he acknowledged he might be best remembered for invoking his medical credentials to urge Congressional intervention in the case of Terry Schiavo, the Florida woman who became a cause célèbre but was later found to be beyond medical help.

To Mr. Frist, that was "five minutes on the floor, total." But it helped define his public image. And there were other failures, including the collapse this year of a gasoline rebate program and his insistence on pushing initiatives and nominees with no chance of success.

Colleagues in both parties admired Mr. Frist's drive in switching from the demands of high-pressure medicine to the equally daunting field of national politics. But they also say he lacked the Senate experience and personal relationships that can help a majority leader organize the disorganized Senate.

"I think he would be the first to tell you he is not a longtime politician or anyone with a long history in the Senate or Capitol Hill," said Senator Richard J. Durbin of Illinois, the No. 2 Democrat in the Senate. "As a result, I think it was a tough job, a hard assignment for him. Many times he struggled with the ebb and flow of business in the Senate. He had to learn on the job."

Mr. Frist was virtually a political novice when he won his Senate seat in 1994, and he noted in his Thursday speech, attended by most of the Senate, that when he arrived he could not even find the Senate's Russell Office Building. But he quickly gained a high profile as an up-and-comer, and in 2002 demonstrated his fund-raising ability as chairman of the Republican Senatorial Campaign Committee. In that role, he helped the party regain the Senate majority.

That new prominence led to Mr. Frist being selected as the majority leader in December 2002 when Senator Trent Lott of Mississippi was forced to step aside after making what many considered a racially insensitive remark at the 100th birthday party of Strom Thurmond. Mr. Frist had the support of the White House, strengthened by his work with Karl Rove in the 2002 elections. As time went by, though, the perception that he was too tightly aligned with the White House dogged him.

"I think it is very important that the majority leader work cooperatively with the White House, very important," said Senator Jeff Sessions, an Alabama Republican and Frist ally. "But perhaps we were tied too closely."

Mr. Frist said his first obligation was always to the Senate and that he was willing to clash with the administration both privately and publicly, as when he made a high-profile break from President Bush and supported expanded embryonic stem cell research.

"I have been very open and expressed my opinions many times at meetings," he said Thursday. "Sometimes my advice is heeded, such as on H.I.V.-AIDS funding, while on stem cells it was not."

After Republicans picked up more seats in 2004 — with Mr. Frist actively campaigning to defeat Senator Tom Daschle of South Dakota, who was then the Democratic leader — Mr. Frist set out to stop Democrats from filibustering Mr. Bush's conservative judicial nominees. Anticipating Supreme Court openings, Mr. Frist promised to execute what came to be known as the "nuclear option" by changing Senate rules to prohibit such tactics.

Democrats were incensed, saying Mr. Frist was destroying Senate traditions. Hoping to avoid a showdown, a bipartisan group of senators cut a side deal that allowed certain judges to move forward. The Senate later confirmed two Supreme Court justices nominated by Mr. Bush. Mr. Frist and fellow Republicans said the results proved his maneuver had been successful. "Because we acted, the sword of the filibuster was sheathed," he said this week.

But Democrats portrayed the threat of the nuclear option as evidence that Republicans were abusing their power, an argument that Democrats say helped them win back the Senate in November. "The American people knew that was beyond the pale," Mr. Reid said.

Though he has ruled out a 2008 presidential race, Mr. Frist said he doubted he was through with politics. And he said he hoped his decision to stick to his two-term commitment inspired successful people in other fields to consider politics. He said that some colleagues had urged him to rethink his self-imposed limits, but that he thought the Senate would be better served if more people had less focus on the next election.

"We're moving toward a body that has too much of a two-year vision of governing for the next election rather than a body with a 20-year vision governing for the future," he told his colleagues. "I urge that we ask ourselves what it is that our forefathers envisioned. Is today's reality what they foresaw?"

Retiring Frist Bids Farewell To Senate (AP)

By Laurie Kellman

AP, December 8, 2006

Their farewell hug was awkward at best. When Democratic leader Harry Reid held open his arms to the man he battled and will replace, retiring Majority Leader Bill Frist, the Tennessee doctor hesitated before returning the embrace. Loosely. Frist, serving the last days of a self-imposed two-term limit, held the Senate itself at a bit of a distance during four years as majority leader. The Tennessee Republican made no secret of the fact that his first occupational love was heart transplant surgery and practicing medicine in general — fields in which he had already made a name before defeating Democratic Sen. Jim Sasser in 1994.

The partisan warfare and scheduling minutiae of the Senate's top job often exasperated Frist. He recently reported suffering what sounded like a case of burnout, and abandoned a nascent bid for president.

His farewell speech Thursday offered a glimpse of the questions Frist asked himself at weary moments during his tenure. He urged his colleagues to do the same.

"What is it really all about," this Senate service, Frist said. "Is about keeping the majority? Is it about red states versus blue? Is it about lobbing attacks in some way across the aisle? ... Is it about war rooms whose purpose is not to contrast ideas but to destroy?

"Or is it more?" Frist intoned to more than 40 Republicans and 20 Democrats in attendance.

Frist's Senate career bookended a Republican revolution. Never having run for office, the Harvard-trained doctor ousted Sasser as part of the storied class of 1994 and helped turn Democrats out of the congressional majority for the first time in 40 years.

In between, Frist rose from 100th in seniority to its top job when Sen. Trent Lott, R-Miss., was forced to step down as majority leader over remarks interpreted as supporting segregationist policies. Frist was elected to that post with the White House's blessing — and Lott's resentment.

But on Thursday, with Lott returning to GOP leadership as Republican whip and past bitter battles with Reid over judicial nominations, Frist and his colleagues bid pleasant and respectful farewells.

Sen. Edward Kennedy, D-Mass., admitted not trusting Frist at first, but came around to hold him in great regard. Reid saluted Frist's commitment to his family — wife, Karen, and sons Harrison and Bryan — who watched from the gallery.

DOJ_NMG_0104023

Sen. Pete Domenici, R-N.M., an old Senate bull who admitted to calling Frist "Sen. First" in his early days, revealed that during private meetings Frist secretly also gave the older senator medical care.

So back to practicing medicine Frist will return when the 109th Congress concludes this week.

"You're not going to be some little country doctor, you're not even going to be a regular doctor. It'll be something bigger than that," Domenici predicted.

Panel May Be Near To Issue Foley Report (AP)

By Larry Margasak

AP, December 8, 2006

The House ethics committee could be close to finishing its report on ex-Rep. Mark Foley's improper conduct with former pages. Committee members would not comment on when they would issue their findings. Committee leaders said in early October the investigation would be finished in weeks, not months, and members have said privately they did not want to carry the matter over until next year.

The findings would have far greater impact if Republicans had retained control of Congress because questions were raised over the lack of strong action by Speaker Dennis Hastert, R-Ill., and his top aides.

Foley, R-Fla., became overly friendly with male pages when they served as errand-runners for lawmakers and — after they left Congress — sent some of them inappropriate e-mails and lurid instant messages.

The committee has heard from dozens of witnesses, and was presented with several conflicts over when Hastert and his staff learned of Foley's conduct.

Hastert's aides could have learned of Foley's inappropriate e-mails as early as 2002 and as late as 2005, depending on who is recounting the events.

Hastert said his aides first learned in 2005 of questionable e-mails between Foley and a former page from Louisiana. Foley's former top aide said he told Hastert's chief of staff about the Florida lawmaker in 2002 or 2003.

Also, Majority Leader John Boehner, R-Ohio, and the House Republican campaign chief Tom Reynolds, R-N.Y., said they told Hastert about Foley's inappropriate behavior last spring. Hastert said he could not recall those conversations, and did not learn of Foley's conduct until late September when the whole matter became public.

Foley resigned from Congress on Sept. 29.

VA Mental Health Spending Is Faulted (WP/AP)

By Suzanne Gamboa

The Washington Post, December 8, 2006

The Department of Veterans Affairs did not spend all of the extra $300 million it budgeted to increase mental health services and failed to keep track of how some of the money was used, a government report says.

VA launched a plan in 2004 to improve its mental health services for veterans with post-traumatic stress disorder and substance-abuse problems. To fill gaps in services, the department added $100 million for mental health initiatives in 2005 and $200 million in 2006. That money was to be distributed to its regional networks of hospitals, medical centers and clinics for new services.

But VA fell short of the spending, by $12 million in 2005 and about $42 million in fiscal 2006, said the Government Accountability Office, the investigative arm of Congress.

It distributed $35 million in 2005 to its 21 health-care networks but did not inform the networks that the money was supposed to be used for mental health initiatives. In fiscal 2006, VA medical centers returned $46 million to headquarters because they couldn't spend it.

In addition, VA cannot determine to what extent about $112 million was spent on mental health services improvements or new services in 2006.

VA reported in September that more than a third of Iraq and Afghanistan veterans who sought medical treatment from the agency in the previous 18 months reported symptoms of stress or other mental disorders.

Longer and multiple deployments, unpredictable daily attacks and roadside bombings, and efforts to reduce the stigma of post-traumatic stress disorder have been cited as reasons for the increased reports.

VA said at the time that it had increased funding for mental health services and hired 100 more counselors and thus was not overwhelmed by the rising demand.

Agency spokesman Matt Burns said in a statement that the GAO looked at the agency's Mental Health Strategic Plan as an accounting exercise. "In contrast, VA's emphasis has been on building mental health care capacity and high quality programs to support and treat veterans. VA expends resources for programs that meet these criteria," Burns said.

He said VA has taken steps to make sure mental health money is used for its intended purpose.

The money is only a portion of what VA spends on mental health; it planned to spend about $2 billion on mental health services in fiscal 2006. But the additional spending from existing funds was trumpeted by the agency as a way to eliminate gaps in mental health services now and those that would be needed in the future.

"While we are at war, we do have to make sure we spend the resources that are allocated for our veterans," said Rep. Michael Michaud of Maine, the ranking Democrat on the House Veterans Affairs health subcommittee.

He said he thinks VA is overwhelmed. Along with the increased reports of mental stress from Iraq and Afghanistan veterans, Vietnam veterans are experiencing flashbacks and recurrences of combat stress problems because of the ongoing wars, he said.

Democrats have said that when they take over Congress next year, they want to increase funding for veterans' health care, in particular mental health counseling for returning Iraq and Afghanistan vets. They also have said they want to increase the department's oversight and get detailed budget accounting from VA.

Costly Fleet Update Falters (WP)

By Renae Merle And Spencer S. Hsu

The Washington Post, December 8, 2006

A multibillion-dollar effort to modernize the Coast Guard's fleet has suffered delays, cost increases, design flaws and, most recently, the idling of eight 123-foot patrol boats that were found to be not seaworthy after an $88 million refurbishment.

The sidelining of eight of 10 Miami-based cutters worsens a patrol-boat crisis while the Coast Guard is preparing for an exodus of Cubans that could happen when dictator Fidel Castro is no longer in power, Coast Guard leaders acknowledge.

More broadly, congressional critics warn that early mistakes in the 25-year modernization program, called Deepwater -- the Coast Guard's largest contract ever -- are hobbling the service's transformation into a front-line homeland security force.

With the failure of the retrofitting program, eight of 49 boats in the service's workhorse fleet of Island-class patrol boats are out of action. Coast Guard leaders reported last year that only 25 percent of the aging cutters were fully "mission capable," because of maintenance problems and deployment of some boats to Iraq. In reports submitted to Congress, the Coast Guard projected that the fleet would be able to log about 80 percent of its targeted 98,200 operational hours a year.

Meanwhile, a Coast Guard plan to fill the gap by accelerating development of its next-generation cutter by 10 years has stalled because of technical problems.

House members tried to cut $121 million of the $1.1 billion appropriated this year for the $24 billion Deepwater modernization program, but the attempt was defeated by the program's defenders in the Senate. Citing plans for some of the replacement cutters to be built in Mississippi, critics said some decision making was influenced by Coast Guard attempts to curry favor with Mississippi GOP senators Thad Cochran, chairman of the Appropriations Committee, and Trent Lott, the incoming minority leader.

The program's failures are spelled out in a series of Government Accountability Office and Department of Homeland Security inspector general's reports and in congressional testimony, which point to the leeway given to the program's contractors, Lockheed Martin Corp. and Northrop Grumman Corp. Through their joint venture, Integrated Coast Guard Systems, the companies declined to comment, referring all questions to the Coast Guard.

But congressional critics are also raising fresh complaints of rising costs and failed ships in one of the largest national security contracts awarded after the Sept. 11, 2001, terrorist attacks.

"Deepwater is a mess. Over the last five years the Coast Guard procurement has been riddled with problems," said Rep. David W. Obey (D-Wis.), incoming chairman of the House Appropriations Committee. "Coast Guard needs to put in place a plan to fix this problem immediately."

"The big problem here is the boat doesn't work," said Sen. Judd Gregg (R-N.H.), outgoing chairman of the Senate Appropriations subcommittee on homeland security. "The people who manufactured these boats are going to have responsibility for their failure. . . . Someone's got to figure out who's responsible."

The Coast Guard has taken criticism of the program seriously and made significant improvements in the past few years, said Rear Adm. Gary Blore, head of the modernization program, which also includes Coast Guard aircraft. For example, the project that led to the sidelined patrol boats was approved without an independent review, which he said would not happen today.

"There is never a good time to not have enough patrol boats," Blore said. "I just regret that we haven't delivered an asset from when those management reforms were put in place."

Deepwater, awarded in 2002 and modified in 2005, lays out an ambitious plan to modernize and greatly expand the Coast Guard's aging fleet of ships, planes and helicopters, equipping the fleet with more modern technology in the process. The aim is to carry out expanded homeland security missions, including offshore patrols, port protection, and vessel boarding and escorting duties, which the Coast Guard said will consume 68,500 operational hours a year for its Island cutters. In that time, Deepwater's cost grew from $17 billion to $24 billion.

The first problems appeared in 2004, when the patrol boat Matagorda was fleeing Hurricane Ivan off the coast of Florida. The Island-class ship had just undergone an $11 million upgrade that included extending its hull from 110 feet to 123 feet. Adm. Thomas H. Collins, then commandant of the Coast Guard, called it the "leading symbol of our service's transformation."

Soon after the hurricane, the Coast Guard found a six-inch crack in the ship's deck and buckling in its hull.

The Coast Guard abandoned plans to overhaul all 49 of its 110-foot boats. In 2005, the eight ships already converted were put on restrictive duty that prohibited them from operating in seas higher than eight feet.

Last month, the Coast Guard found new structural problems beneath the main engines of some ships -- a safety risk. All eight boats were pulled out of commission. Officials said they are now figuring out how to fix them, acknowledging that it will probably require more money.

To make matters worse, the proposed replacement ships for those cutters have also run into technical problems.

The 140-foot Fast Response Cutter is meant to be speedier and tougher than its predecessor, capable of operating in higher seas and for longer periods, and resupplying less often. Responding to a Coast Guard demand to fast-track up to 58 new cutters, contractors proposed a hull design using composite materials instead of steel, which they said would weigh less and be cheaper in the long run. The Coast Guard approved the approach despite having never used such material, a Coast Guard spokesman said.

But, according to a GAO report, concern soon emerged within the service about the form and design of the hull, which was to be built at a Gulfport, Miss., shipyard owned by Northrop Grumman's Ship Systems of Pascagoula, Miss. By February 2006, those concerns had been confirmed by an independent review, and the Coast Guard suspended work on the $3 billion program after spending $25 million.

The Coast Guard is now looking for another stopgap measure, perhaps even ordering an existing ship that would be deployed by 2010, agency officials said.

House Democrats have discussed exerting more control over Deepwater projects. But Gregg said the answer is more money to accelerate Deepwater, not less. "My view is, we're going to spend what it takes to get the nation up to speed," he said.

The program's problems have been compounded by the Coast Guard's hands-off management. The primary contractors, Bethesda-based Lockheed and Northrop Grumman of Los Angeles, have been given unusual authority to run the program through Integrated Coast Guard Systems, according to several government reports. The companies make many of the important decisions, including which ships and aircraft are needed and which subcontractors will design and build them, according to GAO and inspector general reports.

In August, the Homeland Security inspector general reported that the companies had not consistently followed information-technology testing procedures and that the Coast Guard had "limited influence" over some contractor decisions.

One contracting official told the inspector general that the Coast Guard, because of personnel shortages, struggles to review documents within the 30 days the contractors allow. By the time it reviews the documents, the companies may have moved ahead with their plans, leaving the agency to accept the work or try to change it at additional cost, the report said.

The Coast Guard said it is on a "learning curve."

"We continue to make the contract more rigorous," said Mary Elder, the Coast Guard's spokeswoman for the program. "The contractor is learning lessons, as are we, about how best to interact with each other."

Time To Party In The Capital. Just Bring The Checkbook. (NYT)

By Robert Pear

The New York Times, December 8, 2006

WASHINGTON, Dec. 7 — Lights glowed late in the Capitol dome on Wednesday night, indicating that the House and the Senate were in session. But the real action was taking place elsewhere on Capitol Hill, in wine bars, restaurants and town houses where lobbyists paid for the opportunity to meet and greet lawmakers.

Some politicians had just won election, or re-election, and needed to pay off campaign debts. Others were raising money for 2008, hoping that a fat campaign war chest would discourage serious challengers.

The Sonoma wine bar was particularly popular. No sooner had lobbyists left a reception there for Representative Rahm Emanuel of Illinois, newly elected chairman of the House Democratic Caucus, than another platoon of them arrived at the same place to pay tribute to Representative Eric Cantor of Virginia, chief deputy whip for House Republicans.

DOJ_NMG_0104026

Within a period of 12 hours, Mr. Cantor held two fund-raisers in one block of Pennsylvania Avenue SE. For contributions of $2,500, lobbyists had coffee with him in a private room at Starbucks from 8:30 to 9:30 a.m. For donations of $250 to $1,000, they attended his "holidazzle" party at the wine bar from 6 to 8 p.m.

Representative Nancy Pelosi of California, who is to become speaker of the House, has promised new lobbying and ethics rules to end "the culture of corruption" that she says has infected Congress under Republican control. But lobbyists attending fund-raisers this week said they did not expect radical changes.

"There will be some changes on the margins that will be relatively short-lived," said Erick R. Gustafson, a vice president of the Mortgage Bankers Association.

Of the effort to purge politics of special-interest money and influence, Mr. Gustafson said: "It's like trying to keep water out of your basement. It's a structural problem. You may find a temporary solution, but the water will find a way in. Influence is like water. Money is just a means of influence."

Many lobbyists stopped by three or four events on Wednesday evening. At a fund-raiser for Democrats newly elected to the House, Portia Reddick White, a lobbyist for the Transport Workers Union, said: "There's a mood of euphoria, of excitement here. We sense that change is coming, that Congress might actually do something on a bipartisan basis for the working people of America."

Dan Glickman, formerly a Democratic congressman from Kansas and now chairman of the Motion Picture Association of America, hobnobbed with Representative-elect Paul W. Hodes, Democrat of New Hampshire, who is an entertainment lawyer, songwriter and champion of the arts. Mr. Hodes said the event would help him retire his campaign debt, which he estimated at $100,000.

Friends of Representative Charles B. Rangel — blacks and whites, Democrats and Republicans, bankers, insurers and health care advocates — gathered in a nearby town house to hear what he plans to do next year as chairman of the House Ways and Means Committee.

"We really don't believe that voters suddenly fell in love with the Democrats," Mr. Rangel said in his gravelly voice. Rather, he said, the voters want change and bipartisan cooperation, and he hopes to meet that demand by working with Republican members of Congress and the Bush administration on taxes, trade and health legislation.

The contributors to Mr. Rangel included Norman F. Lent, a Republican lobbyist whose official-looking business card notes that he was a member of Congress from 1971 to 1993. Mr. Lent, who used to represent residents of Nassau County, N.Y., now represents Pfizer, Chevron and Texaco, among other companies.

Mr. Lent said the payoff scandal surrounding the lobbyist Jack Abramoff had made life more difficult for honest lobbyists like himself.

"We have all been tainted by this Abramoff," he said, noting with some irritation that former members of Congress were no longer allowed to use the House gymnasium if they were registered lobbyists.

Such concerns did not dampen the festive atmosphere at the Charlie Palmer steakhouse, where lobbyists held "a special birthday reception in honor of Senator Max Baucus," Democrat of Montana.

Mr. Baucus turns 65 next week, becomes chairman of the Senate Finance Committee next month and is up for re-election in 2008.

He knew what he wanted for his birthday. The invitation requested contributions of $1,000 from individuals, $2,500 from political action committees and $5,000 from big donors willing to sponsor the reception.

John D. Raffaelli, a veteran tax lobbyist, said: "Any member of Congress up for re-election in 2008 wants to be able to file a good financial report for the end of this year. Max's goal is to bring his revenue numbers up, to discourage challengers in 2008."

Campaign contributors who missed the birthday party will have opportunities to show their support next year. The senator has invited them to spend weekends with him in Big Sky, Mont. — skiing in February, fly fishing and golfing in June, horseback riding and hiking in August.

Bob Corker, a Tennessee Republican newly elected to the Senate, has clearly learned the ways of Washington already. On Wednesday, he held two fund-raisers — a "debt retirement lunch" and, in the evening, a "debt retirement reception" — to pay campaign debts totaling nearly $1.9 million. He was requesting contributions of $1,000 to $5,000.

The feverish fund-raising pace continued on Thursday, with events for two Democrats up for re-election in 2008, Senators Mary L. Landrieu of Louisiana and Tim Johnson of South Dakota.

Surveying the week's activities, Frederick H. Graefe, a veteran health care lobbyist with friends on both sides of the aisle, said, "There is no free event with the Democrats or the Republicans."

Bush Names 10 Recipients Of Top Honor For Civilians (NYT/AP)

By The Associated Press

DOJ_NMG_0104027

The New York Times, December 8, 2006

WASHINGTON, Dec. 7 (AP) — President Bush on Thursday announced this year's recipients of the Presidential Medal of Freedom, the nation's highest civilian award.

These people will be honored at a White House ceremony on Dec. 15:

¶Ruth Johnson Colvin, a literacy advocate who has traveled the world to help people learn reading and language skills.

¶Norman C. Francis, the president of Xavier University of Louisiana for nearly 40 years. He has also played a lead role in helping the people of the Gulf Coast recover from Hurricane Katrina.

¶Paul Johnson, a historian and journalist who is being honored for writings that have "captivated and educated people around the world."

¶B. B. King, the singer and guitarist who is considered the King of Blues and an American legend.

¶Joshua Lederberg, a Nobel Prize winner for his work in bacterial genetics. He has also helped develop advanced computer technology, worked with the National Aeronautics and Space Administration in the search for life on Mars, and been a scientific adviser to national policy makers.

¶David McCullough, the author and historian who is considered a foremost expert on the American presidency.

¶Norman Y. Mineta, the former transportation secretary; appointed to that job by President Bush. He also served as a mayor, as a congressman and as President Bill Clinton's commerce secretary.

¶Buck O'Neil, a former professional baseball player in the Negro Leagues. Mr. O'Neil, who died this year, was the first black coach in Major League Baseball and a co-founder of the Negro Leagues Baseball Museum.

¶William Safire, the writer and commentator, whose "On Language" column appears in The New York Times Magazine, is being honored for polishing the nation's language and elevating the debates of the day.

¶Natan Sharansky, a former prisoner of the Soviet regime, punished for advancing religious liberty and human rights. He had previously been invited to the White House by Mr. Bush to discuss his book, "The Case for Democracy: The Power of Freedom to Overcome Tyranny and Terror."

The Medal of Freedom was established by President Harry S. Truman in 1945 to recognize civilians for their efforts during World War II. The award was reinstated by President John F. Kennedy in 1963 to honor distinguished service.

Bush Lights National Christmas Tree (AP)

By Ben Feller

AP, December 8, 2006

In traditional fashion, President Bush presided over the lighting of the national Christmas tree Thursday by asking the country to remember and honor its troops.

"Many of those who have answered the call of duty will spend this Christmas season far from home and separated from family," Bush said to a crowd gathered just south of the White House on a frigid night.

"We honor their sacrifice," the president said. "We are proud of their service and that of their families. We will keep them close to our hearts and in our prayers."

With that, Bush led a short countdown as thousands of people rose to their feet on the Ellipse. The crowd roared when the 42-foot blue spruce came alive in color — reds, blues, greens, and a golden star on top.

The president and first lady Laura Bush then joined Santa Claus, a children's choir and other entertainers for a rendition of "Jingle Bells" as the hourlong program came to end. The scene drew members of the Cabinet and Congress, along with invited guests of the White House and plenty of school-age children with parents.

Every president has presided over the tree lighting since Calvin Coolidge in 1923.

The ceremony starts the "Christmas Pageant of Peace." Each night through Jan. 1, the national Christmas tree will be lit from dusk until 11:00 p.m, with musical entertainment Dec. 9-23.

There is no shortage of Christmas pageantry inside the White House, either.

In the Blue Room, the White House Christmas tree is an 18-foot Douglas fir, adorned with glass ornaments, red satin bows and cotton snow.

Ten-foot-tall Nutcrackers stand at the entrance to the East Wing. Ribbons, garland and wreaths are everywhere. At the end of the ground floor corridor, there are even ivy topiaries shaped like the pets of the president and the first lady — Scottish terriers Barney and Miss Beazley, and the first cat, Willie.

Roughly 45,000 people will tour the White House during the holidays.

For those invited to a series of private parties hosted by the Bushes, the catering demands add up. The White House expects to go through 2,100 pounds of sweet potatoes, 4,000 pounds of shrimp, 4,000 pounds of crab claws, plus 100 cases of asparagus, 15,000 chocolate truffles and 20,000 cookies.

The Last Gasp Of A Smoke-Filled Room? (WP)

By Lyndsey Layton

The Washington Post, December 8, 2006

When the District goes smoke-free Jan. 2, at least one nicotine haven will remain: the U.S. Capitol. Lawmakers, several of whom enjoy a good cigar, have exempted themselves from the city's smoking ban, not to mention rules that forbid lighting up in federal buildings across the country.

But winds of change may be blowing on the Hill.

Rep. Nancy Pelosi, the Democrat from smoke-free California and the next speaker of the House, is thinking of banishing tobacco from the most popular smoking spot in the building: the Speaker's Lobby outside the House chamber. "I'm not an advocate of smoking," Pelosi said yesterday, adding that she hadn't yet decided on a ban. "I think it's dangerous to your health."

Smoking is permitted in lawmakers' offices, in two cafeterias in the House and Senate buildings and in an unmarked, cramped room in the basement of the U.S. Capitol.

But the Speaker's Lobby, the ornate space dotted with fireplaces and chandeliers, is the real smoke-filled room, the biggest and most visible space where smokers gather. The lobby, where lawmakers relax between votes and debates, is blue with smoke most days. You can smell it from the approaching hallways. Cigarette smokers claim the leather wing chairs during the day, filling the ashtrays with butts. At night, the cigar smokers take over. A smoky film clings to an oversize mirror.

"I can't breathe when I step in there," said Rep. Henry A. Waxman (D-Calif.), who has been a lonely scold against smoking for years, trying to get the Republican leaders to stamp out tobacco.

But his efforts went up in smoke.

As many as 25 percent of House members smoke, and one of the heaviest smokers is Majority Leader John A. Boehner (R-Ohio), who frequently emerges from the House floor and heads straight to the Speaker's Lobby to consume his favorite brand, Barclay. Yesterday, when he stepped out of the chamber, he gestured to an approaching reporter that he needed a moment before talking. He made a beeline for the southwest corner of the room, pulled a cigarette from his breast pocket, lit it and inhaled deeply.

"When Boehner ascended, we figured it was hopeless," said Angela Bradbery, co-founder of Smokefree DC, which successfully lobbied for the city's smoking ban and had considered trying to direct the same effort toward Congress.

"It just seemed like too big a hill to climb," she said. "It's always amazing to me that Congress makes up the laws and rules for itself. It kind of smacks of arrogance that they don't have to abide by laws in the city in which they're working. When you walk by the cafeteria and you see people smoking, it's like a throwback to the 1950s."

Waxman says Pelosi's rise to power means the match has been lit. "When the Democrats take over, I expect this to change," he said. "She understands the consequences of secondhand smoke and she's coming from California."

Still, the situation is hazy.

Aides say Pelosi detests smoking but doesn't want to burn the Blue Dog Democrats, or conservative members of her party -- several of whom are cigar smokers but none of whom wanted to publicly stand up for smoking. "I don't really smoke," said Rep. Ben Chandler, a Democrat from the tobacco state of Kentucky, as he blew smoke rings from a cigar in the Speaker's Lobby earlier this week.

Some Republicans are privately fuming, although none wanted to admit so publicly and most asserted they can live with the change.

"Most people are resigned to the reality that there are fewer and fewer places to do this," said Rep. Thaddeus McCotter (R-Mich.), who smokes one to two packs of cigarettes a day. "Behind every smoker is one who wishes they never started. The problem in this town is if you drop one vice, you'll get a worse one."

'Shameful, Sad And Worse' (WP)

The Washington Post, December 8, 2006

DON'T BELIEVE for a second the excuse that a lack of time doomed the chances for legislation giving voting rights in the House of Representatives to the District of Columbia. Or that the decision was put off because of worries that a D.C. voting seat would not pass constitutional muster. At this point, the only plausible explanation for the demise of the bill is that Republican leaders in Congress and the White House oppose democracy for anyone who happens to live in the nation's capital.

President Bush sat on his hands as House GOP leaders spurned a valiant effort by Rep. Thomas M. Davis III (R-Va.) to get a floor vote on the issue. Never mind four years of careful negotiation; never mind broad bipartisan support. Never mind, for that matter, that it is only fair to give all citizens, no matter their addresses, a say in their government. "Shameful, sad and worse" is the way former Republican congressman Jack Kemp, a longtime advocate of D.C. voting rights, characterized the bill's death at the hands of his party.

Republican leaders in Utah, believing they had an understanding with their national counterparts, had rushed to hold a special session to adopt a congressional map carving out a new seat for Utah that was key to the bill. The beauty of the compromise crafted by Mr. Davis and Eleanor Holmes Norton, the city's Democratic nonvoting delegate to the House, was that party politics was taken out of the equation, as two new seats would have been added to Congress -- one for the mostly Democratic District and one for predominantly Republican Utah.

The people of the District will get another chance in January when Congress convenes under Democratic control. Mr. Davis has promised that the bill will be reintroduced. Incoming House speaker Nancy Pelosi (Calif.) and majority whip Steny H. Hoyer (Md.) should commit to an early vote; there's no need for more hearings. They should make clear that they won't countenance any talk of stripping Utah of its seat, which would kill the deal.

D.C. citizens pay federal taxes. The District's young men and women go off to the Middle East to fight for a democracy they are denied at home. Republican leaders blew a perfect opportunity to remedy this disenfranchisement. Many Americans, and not just those in the District, will be watching to see whether the next Congress can do better.

Watergate Reform, R.I.P. (NYT)

The table stakes for the next presidential campaign are now estimated by the reigning consultant-croupiers of politics at $100 million for openers. That sad fact suggests that the 2008 contest will likely go down in history for seeing to the effective demise of one of the most encouraging post-Watergate reforms, the creative use of public financing as an alternative to big-money donors.

Public financing had worked well for decades, inviting fresh arrays of candidates. But it was left half-dead in 2004 when President Bush and Senator John Kerry declined the $44 million subsidy for the presidential primaries. This freed them to raise more than $200 million each in private, unlimited money. They did opt for public subsidies in the general election, accepting $74 million each as the spending limit. But that formula is expected to be extinct in 2008 as the finalists wage a far more expensive campaign — one that could hit $1 billion.

The breakdown of the public system need not have happened if Congress had acted to update the formula to keep pace with campaign inflation. Larger spending limits and subsidies are needed, along with a more generous checkoff donation than the current $3 per taxpayer.

A strong repair bill is in the works, along with proposals to re-educate taxpayers about the sleaze-free bargain of public financing. The bill is too late for the '08 campaign, but the new Democratic majority in Congress has a good opportunity to rescue the formula for 2012. Otherwise the nation will slip back toward the Watergate era's politics for sale.

Why The Achievement Gap Persists (NYT)

The New York Times, December 8, 2006

The No Child Left Behind education act, which requires the states to close the achievement gap between rich and poor students in exchange for federal aid, has been under heavy fire since it was passed five years ago. Critics, some of whom never wanted accountability in the first place, have ratcheted up their attacks in anticipation of Congressional hearings and a reauthorization process that could get under way soon after the new Congress convenes in January.

Those critics were empowered by a spate of recent studies showing that the nation has made slight overall progress in closing the achievement gap since the law went into effect. (A handful, including New York and New Jersey, are said to have made moderate progress.) The data has been seized upon as evidence that Congress set the bar too high.

Generally, the opponents do not argue that impoverished children can never be educated up to the same standards as the wealthy. They simply say it will take much longer than the law permits. In the world of education reform, where ambitious programs generally last only as long as it takes for the schools to fail to meet the first target, endless deferral of deadlines would be a death knell for No Child Left Behind.

And the country can't afford that. Unless we improve schools — especially for minority children who will make up the work force of the future — we will fall behind our competitors abroad who are doing a better job of educating the next generation.

It's impossible to brand No Child Left Behind as a failure, because its agenda has never been carried out. The law was supposed to remake schools that serve poor and minority students by breaking with the age-old practice of staffing those schools with poorly trained and poorly educated teachers. States were supposed to provide students with highly qualified teachers in all core courses by the beginning of the current academic year. That didn't happen.

The country would be much further down the road toward complying with No Child Left Behind if the Department of Education had given the states clear direction and the technical assistance they needed. Instead, the department simply ignored the provision until recently and allowed states to behave as though the teacher quality problem did not exist. Thanks to this approach, the country must now start from scratch on what is far and away the most crucial provision of the law.

Getting up to speed will not be easy. Most states lack even the most basic systems for overseeing teacher training and the teacher assignment process. Worse still, the practice of dumping poorly qualified teachers into the schools that serve the poorest, neediest children has become second nature in many places.

The battle for teacher quality is just getting under way. The country can either win that battle or watch its fortunes fade as the national work force becomes less and less competitive. Given what's at stake, the teacher quality provision of No Child Left Behind deserves to be at the very top of the list when Congress revisits the law.

Housing Slump Whittles Equity; Stocks Lift Assets (WSJ)

By Christopher Conkey

The Wall Street Journal, December 8, 2006

WASHINGTON -- The housing slump is slightly eroding a key driver of consumer spending, but stock-market gains are boosting the average household's net worth, new Federal Reserve data show.

Homeowners had $10.9 trillion in equity stored up in their properties at the end of the third quarter, an amount that was essentially flat compared with the previous quarter and down from a nearly 3% rate of growth during the same period last year, the Fed said. Home equity -- the difference between a home's value and the amount owed on its mortgage -- fell to 53.6% of the value of household real estate, down from 54% in the second quarter and 54.6% a year ago.

Steady home-price appreciation in recent years swelled the amount of equity built up in houses, and consumers tapped it to finance home improvements, college educations and other purchases. But the data from the Fed's "flow of funds" report suggest the housing market's slump has whittled away the growth of home equity.

So far, the impact on consumer spending has been modest. But many economists worry that further weakness in the housing market, particularly if it leads to an outright drop in house prices, could shrink home equity and lead consumers to pull back in the months ahead.

There are bright spots, though. The competitive labor market is boosting wages, and the stock market has produced big gains for many investors so far this year. After declining slightly in the second quarter, the value of household financial assets rose nearly 2% in the third quarter to $40.5 trillion, the Fed said. That combination helped lift household net worth, which was flat in the second quarter, by 1.5% in the third quarter to $54.06 trillion.

It looks like households are still in pretty good shape," said Robert Mellman, senior economist at J.P. Morgan Chase & Co. "The fundamentals for consumer spending are really quite good."

That may be true, but they also appear to be turning cautious. In a separate report yesterday, the Fed said consumer borrowing decreased by 0.6% in October, the largest monthly drop in 14 years. "In the grand scheme of things, households are stepping back a bit and being more conservative," said Daniel Jester, an economist at Moody's Economy.com.

Meanwhile, the Labor Department said the number of people filing initial claims for unemployment insurance fell by 34,000 last week to 324,000. Economists said the big weekly drop was because of seasonal factors surrounding the Thanksgiving holiday, which may have artificially boosted jobless claims last week. Over the past four weeks, claims have averaged 328,750, a level suggesting moderate growth in the job market. The Labor Department will release figures for November job growth today.

Dow Eases 30.84 As Investors Await New Economic Signals From Jobs Data (WSJ)

By Peter A. Mckay

The Wall Street Journal, December 8, 2006

Stocks slipped for a second straight day as investors continued to fret -- and disagree -- over where the U.S. economy is headed.

Many held off on placing big bets ahead of the release of jobs data due out today. The result was another lackluster finish for key stock-market measures, punctuated by moves reflecting news that affected a few big-name companies.

The Dow Jones Industrial Average rose more than 50 points in the first half hour of trading, briefly crossing its Nov. 17 record close. But by the end of the day, the blue-chip average was down 30.84 points, or 0.3%, at 12278.41 points, up 15% on the year and 64.15 points away from the record set last month.

Shares in Home Depot, a Dow component, tumbled 2.5% after it disclosed late Wednesday that it had backdated executives' stock options, making the home-improvement giant one of the largest firms to have admitted engaging in the controversial practice.

Throughout the day, the Dow fluctuated in the opposite direction of crude oil, which opened lower but finished up to snap a three-day losing streak. The stock market often moves inversely to oil prices because higher energy costs can sap consumers' purchasing power, threatening corporate profits.

Concerns about supply from the Organization of Petroleum Exporting Countries pushed crude futures for January delivery up 30 cents, or 0.5% on the day, to $62.49 a barrel, at the New York Mercantile Exchange.

The oil rise stopped a three-day losing streak for the commodity. Despite its 2.4% gain for the year, crude is now off 19% from its Nymex record close on July 14.

Dow component Boeing slipped nearly 1% on concerns about oil prices.

The broad Standard & Poor's 500-stock index fell 0.4%, or 5.61 points, to 1407.29, up 12.7% on the year. The technology-stock-heavy Nasdaq Composite Index fell 0.7%, or 18.17 points, to 2427.69, up 10.1% on the year.

The market's focus today will be on monthly data from the Labor Department due out at 8:30 a.m. Eastern time. Wall Street is expecting to see that nonfarm payrolls grew by 110,000 jobs in November, with the unemployment rate rising to 4.5% from 4.4% in October.

Between the lines, individual investors and the professionals examining such data lately have been trying to figure out what the Federal Reserve might do next regarding interest rates, and when.

Many believe the situation became murkier last week, after Fed Chairman Ben Bernanke signaled a rate increase to keep inflation in check was still possible in the months ahead. But fresh manufacturing data then signaled the economy is slowing so much, the Fed might be prompted to cut rates.

"The year we're coming into is as uncertain as we've had in a while," said strategist Douglas Peta, of the investment-management firm J. & W. Seligman & Co. "It does look like we're coming into an inflection point for the economy."

Outside the U.S., stocks rose in dollar terms, including new records in India, Mexico and Canada. The Dow Jones World Stock Index, excluding U.S. shares, rose 0.27%, or 0.64 point, to 239.67.

In major U.S. market action:

Stocks dropped1 and bonds declined2. The 10-year note fell 2/32 point, or 62.5 cents for each $1,000 invested, pushing the yield up to 4.491%. The 30-year bond fell 6/32 to yield 4.607%.

The dollar rose3, to 115.25 yen, compared with 115.23, as the euro fell to $1.3286, from $1.3287.

Markets Sink As Economic Report Looms (USAT)

USA Today, December 8, 2006

NEW YORK — Stocks sagged Thursday as traders anxiously waited to see what today's November jobs report might reveal about the health of the overall economy.

The Dow Jones industrial average fell 30.84 points, or 0.3%, to 12,278.41. The Standard & Poor's 500 index was down 5.61 points, or 0.4%, at 1407.29. The Nasdaq composite index fell 18.17 points, or 0.7%, to 2427.69.

Thursday's action was all about the economic news today and beyond. The skittishness came despite upbeat news from the Labor Department, which said, as expected, that the number of newly laid-off workers seeking unemployment benefits fell last week by the largest amount in six months.

"The economy is at a very tenuous place, and we're getting very important news in the next 10 days, starting with the jobs report," says Richard Williams, director of equity research at interdealer broker ICAP in New York.

Today, the Labor Department will report on November employment, which could give some clues about the economy's strength. Economists believe that the report will show a moderate gain of 105,000 workers, slightly better than the 92,000 jobs added in October, and that the unemployment rate, which fell to a five-year low of 4.4% in October, will edge up slightly to 4.5%.

Election Controversy Hits Florida, Again (CSM)

By Amy Green And Ben Arnoldy

The Christian Science Monitor, December 8, 2006

SARASOTA, FLA.; AND BOSTON

The Sunshine State is once again the scene of a messy election controversy, and residents of Sarasota, an affluent beachside community, aren't the least bit amused.

More than a month after polls closed, the certified loser for the congressional seat is refusing to concede, given an extraordinary wave of ballots with no vote cast in that race and a margin of victory as skimpy as a bikini.

But determining just what went wrong, if anything, has proved difficult given the voting machines involved: touch-screen computers with no printout for voters to confirm. The problems roiling Florida's 13th Congressional District may be one reason that a federal advisory board on Tuesday recommended that the next generation of electronic voting machines be "software independent." In essence, that means creating an independent auditing trail.

Thus, six years after a messy presidential election forced Florida and many states to spend millions of dollars to bring in electronic voting systems, an influential elections panel is urging better-designed systems that may bring back an element of paper. The recommendations will inform new guidelines drawn up in 2007 by the Elections Assistance Commission, of which the panel is a part. Nearly 40 states require that their voting systems meet those guidelines.

"What needs to be figured out [now] is what can we cobble together for a medium-term solution that is not too expensive," says Steven Hertzberg of the Election Science Institute, an election research group based in San Francisco. Then, "we need to innovate in this industry."

So far in Florida's 13th District, there's no evidence that the machines malfunctioned. Sarasota County has already done a machine and a manual recount. Neither significantly budged Republican Vern Buchanan's 369-vote lead over Democrat Christine Jennings. The Sarasota Herald-Tribune has also reviewed every ballot cast.

But suspicions remain because 18,000 ballots, or 13 percent of the votes cast, recorded no votes in the congressional race.

"It's a huge embarrassment," says Ron Basescu, a local resident who had trouble voting. After filling out his ballot on the county's touch-screen machines, which were installed in 2002, a review screen showed that he had either skipped the congressional race or his vote was not recorded. He went back and filled it in. The same thing happened to his wife. Now, he's not sure if their votes really counted.

"If 18,000 people don't cast a [complete] ballot, there must be something wrong," he says. "There should be a revote."

In the manual recount, officials printed out the records of each vote cast, says county elections supervisor Kathy Dent. Undervotes were found in all county precincts, she adds.

But the paper trail is suspect because it's not independent of the software. So if the computer system malfunctioned, this paper trail might have an error, and the voter is no longer there to catch it.

The state has tested for any problems 10 computers, five of which were used in the election. Officials are also testing the software to make sure it is identical to the program certified by the state. Once these tests are finished, the state should be able to say with certainty if the computers malfunctioned, Ms. Dent says.

But some election experts disagree. A comprehensive testing regime would be too complicated to be done quickly, says Mr. Hertzberg, and even then, testers may never know.

"The entire result is 100 percent reliant on the software itself, and there's no way to validate the vote total," he says. The bottom line: "You can't trust the result."

Last week, the National Institute of Standards and Technology came to the same conclusion about all electronic voting machines that do not have an independent voter-verified audit trail. Officials ultimately must trust that the software has remained error-free. "Verifying that this is the case is so complex as to be infeasible; current testing methods could not guarantee this," the report said.

Ken Fields, a spokesman for Election Systems & Software, the company that makes the machines used in Sarasota, says computer malfunctions can be ruled out through testing. The machines "have been proven time and time again to accurately record votes," he says.

The equipment has safeguards, including two different digital records of the votes that can be compared. Voters are also given a chance on-screen to verify their selections.

However, Mr. Fields says, "the security and accuracy of an election depend not only on the equipment, but on the processes used" by the jurisdictions.

In its review, the Sarasota Herald-Tribune reported Tuesday that it found only one significant pattern in the undervotes: A disproportionate number came from straight-ticket voters in both parties. The report surmises that such voters were probably moving quickly through the ballot and, because of poor ballot design, missed the House race. The newspaper notes that the undervote distributions suggest no computer problems, but "machine error can't be completely ruled out."

Some voters will probably use the same touch-screen machines in 2008 and beyond. Election officials are wary of current paper-trail systems on the market because printers have been known to jam, printed records can be difficult to interpret, and few voters actually look at the printouts, says Doug Lewis, executive director of the National Association of State Election Directors.

Voters in Sarasota, however, decided last month to replace their touch screens with optical scanners, an electronic system that counts paper ballots.

But there's still this year's House race to sort out. The losing candidate, Ms. Jennings, is contesting the election in the hopes of getting a judge to order another. The case is scheduled for Dec. 15. Jennings could also appeal to the House for a new election.

Some residents feel that Jennings's efforts are just prolonging a bitter race. "It was a very nasty campaign," says Ruth Bellaire, a retiree. "I think a lot of people didn't want to vote, to tell the truth."

Longtime Lawmaker, Under Cloud, Fights To Stay On (NYT)

By Adam Nossiter

The New York Times, December 8, 2006

NEW ORLEANS, Dec. 7 — One of the last undecided House races has played out here as the fierce bid for survival of a veteran politician whose career is threatened by a federal corruption investigation.

On Saturday, for the second time in two months under Louisiana's idiosyncratic runoff system, Representative William J. Jefferson has to present himself to the voters.

The outcome will not affect the balance of power in Washington, as Mr. Jefferson's opponent, Karen R. Carter, a lawyer in the Louisiana House, is also a Democrat.

But if Mr. Jefferson wins, his victory will have the potential to embarrass the Democrats and Louisianans eager to prove to federal aid officials that they have left behind the corrupt past.

Having been rejected by his own state party and become a pariah to the financial establishment here, Mr. Jefferson is counting on his inner-city base to look past the F.B.I. accusations and rally around him as it has since he was first elected in 1990.

Court documents depict Mr. Jefferson as trying to use his position to extract cash from a businessman whom he was helping win contracts.

Mr. Jefferson, who has not been charged with any crimes, has denied wrongdoing.

For months, he has been promising an "honorable explanation."

There is every evidence that Mr. Jefferson's base would accept it whenever it comes. Loyal supporters put Mr. Jefferson on top in a crowded primary when he won 30 percent of the vote.

Blue and red "Re-elect Congressman Jefferson" signs dot the ramshackle blocks of the Central City, and Mr. Jefferson received a hero's welcome when he showed up last week at a stormy meeting of displaced tenants of public housing.

"Being poor is not a crime!" Mr. Jefferson told the crowd, which remains angry at being kept out of the mostly shuttered projects. "Not making money is not a crime!"

He was warmly cheered.

"I voted for you, Sir, because I have faith in your abilities," said Jocelyn Marshall, a tenant, and he embraced her.

Whether that support can pull him through in the runoff has been questioned by political analysts here.

There is no question that Mr. Jefferson is the favorite of African-Americans. Last month, he picked up four times as many votes in black precincts as Ms. Carter, who is also black, according to Greg Rigamer, a demographer working for Ms. Carter.

Ms. Carter, a lawyer known for detailed approaches to legislative issues, was the overwhelming choice of white voters. They gave her more than seven times as many votes as they did for Mr. Jefferson.

In Baton Rouge, Ms. Carter was known for spearheading a risky fight in 2004 to overhaul the foundering public schools in New Orleans. In siding with the reform-minded superintendent at the time, she bucked leading figures here.

DOJ_NMG_0104034

In this race, she has raised nearly five times as much money as Mr. Jefferson. The Congressional Black Caucus is among his last remaining sources of financial support.

His connections to the poorest neighborhoods through allies, charities, community agencies and relatives run deep. Federal prosecutors are looking at the financing of inner-city charities with ties to the Jefferson family, state officials said several weeks ago.

It is just this reliance on one slice of the black electorate that constitutes Mr. Jefferson's principal difficulty, particularly since Hurricane Katrina turned this once heavily majority-black city into one where the two races are more nearly equal in population.

Some 45 percent of black voters did not choose him in the primary, Mr. Rigamer said.

Whites in Orleans Parish turned out at nearly twice the rate of blacks in the primary, a trend that if it continues portends serious trouble for Mr. Jefferson.

"If black turnout is low, then Carter should win," said Edward F. Renwick, director of the Loyola University Institute of Politics here.

With the prospect that he may face the federal investigation as a private citizen, Mr. Jefferson has taken off the gloves, calling Ms. Carter "an ambitious young woman" and tacking sharply to the right for the first time in his career.

Many African-American ministers here have endorsed Mr. Jefferson.

He is now criticizing Ms. Carter for what he calls her "support of same-sex marriage, late-term abortion and human cloning," all "at odds with our values," he says in a television advertisement.

Oddly, Mr. Jefferson has generally received high ratings from gay and abortion-rights groups, as Ms. Carter's campaign points out.

She is swinging back hard, hammering at the corruption accusations at every opportunity, forcing Mr. Jefferson to declare in one advertisement: "I have never taken a bribe from anyone."

In one advertisement, children at a spelling bee are heard spelling out the word "hypocrite," and the word "corruption" is intoned at the end.

"The people of this district can ill-afford to have him in that office," Ms. Carter said Wednesday after a campaign stop at a restaurant on St. Charles Avenue. "There is too much at risk," she said. "Our national image."

That focus on image, acute because of the city's dependence on the good will of outsiders, was echoed by a white supporter in the biracial crowd, Mary Len Costa. Ms. Carter's election, Ms. Costa said, was "superimportant for our local perception, for our national perception."

If Mr. Jefferson is elected, "we would lose face," Ms. Costa said, adding: "Something's got to give us hope. Locally, we don't have hope with our politicians."

Republicans Of '94 Revolution Reflect On '06 (USAT)

By Richard Wolf

USA Today, December 8, 2006

WASHINGTON — Republicans who helped capture control of Congress 12 years ago blame the party's leaders for this year's debacle at the polls.

Architects of the 1994 "Republican revolution," as well as current and former lawmakers elected that year, say the GOP repelled voters by putting self-preservation before the nation's agenda. "For the first six years of the 12 years, we were focused on policy and principles, and politics was secondary," says Rep. Zach Wamp of Tennessee, a member of the 1994 class who won his seventh term this month. "The second six years, politics became primary: raising money, going negative, consolidating power."

"We did more good work the first 12 hours we were in Congress than the Republicans have done in the past five years," says Joe Scarborough, a class of '94 member who resigned in 2001 and is a talk-show host. "Republican leaders who took us to the point we are right now should be ashamed."

Two-thirds of the 73-member Republican class of 1994 are gone from the House of Representatives. Twenty-four kept their House seats despite this year's rout, in which Democrats gained simultaneous House and Senate majorities for the first time since 1994. Five lost their bids for a seventh term. Two others resigned in disgrace.

Most members interviewed from the class of 1994, as well as former House GOP leaders, cite three reasons beyond their leaders' control: the war in Iraq, corruption scandals and President Bush's low popularity. Beyond that, they say leaders such as House Speaker Dennis Hastert of Illinois and former House majority leader Tom DeLay of Texas put staying in power above principles such as limited government and low spending.

"The Republicans have stopped being reformers," says former congressman John Kasich of Ohio, a close ally of former speaker Newt Gingrich. "They're tired, they're worn out, and they're practicing politics as usual."

Rep. Dan Lungren of California, who returned to Congress last year after a 16-year absence, warned of the demise in a closed meeting of House Republicans last year. He noted the Capitol halls were lined with lobbyists who expected to get what they asked for. "We had succumbed to the temptation of things that we had criticized the Democrats for," he says.

Former House majority leader Dick Armey of Texas says regaining a majority won't be easy. "The job of the Republicans after this election is going to be once again to convince the American people that we are the conservative party that the Democrats pretended to be," he says.

Needs of urban areas weren't being met

J .C. Watts imagines average workers at a water cooler, average families at a kitchen table. Republicans, he says, have stopped addressing their needs.

The former four-term Oklahoma congressman says he saw it coming before he walked away from his political career in 2003 to launch J.C. Watts Companies, a consulting firm.

The party wasn't meeting the needs of the poor and urban areas, he says. Instead, it was fixated on "push-button issues," such as abortion and flag burning.

In 1994, when he was elected, the Contract with America offered "something tangible," Watts says. In 2006, the message had become: "The Democrats will be worse."

"Being against (incoming House Speaker) Nancy Pelosi's plan is not a plan," he says.

"We lost our way, pure and simple," says Watts, 49. "When ego and power mesh, it's a very dangerous thing." His solution is simple: Address issues that matter to people

Comeback will take a bit of relating like Reagan

A national wave swept Rep. Gil Gutknecht into Congress in 1994. Another swept him out this year.

Gutknecht, 55, a student of history, says part of it was just zeitgeist — the spirit of the times. "People had just worn a little bit weary of Republican rule," he says.

The six-term Minnesota congressman, one of five members of his class to lose this year, also is a salesman. In recent years, he says, the GOP "began to sort of ignore the customers" on issues ranging from Medicare prescription drug coverage to pork-barrel spending.

Former British prime minister Margaret Thatcher "said many years ago, 'First you win the debate, then you win the vote,' " he says. "The leadership decided a long time ago they weren't going to win the debate. They were just going to break knuckles to win the vote."

To come back, he says, Republicans must frame issues "the way Ronald Reagan did — you take conservative principles and wrap them in an optimistic, friendly language

Limited government? To some it seemed like no government

Zach Wamp's Republican Party believes in limited government. Recently, however, it gave people something closer to no government, he says.

Republicans' response to Hurricane Katrina hurt, Wamp says.

So, too, did his party's reluctance to exercise oversight on issues such as the war in Iraq.

"We began to be focused much more on money and the consolidation of power than we were the policy and the principle that brought us into the majority," says Wamp, 49, who won a seventh term from Tennessee this month. "We had become more interested in winning politically than doing the right thing."

To win back the majority, Wamp says, the party needs to focus on issues and principles, not politics. That could mean fighting with their own president.

"You can't just go along with the executive branch," he says, "even if they're from your party."

Values preached weren't practiced; public not offered clear message

One thing about Bob Barr: You always knew where he stood.

Not so today's Republican Party, says the former four-term Georgia congressman, perhaps Congress' biggest defender of personal liberty during his tenure. After leaving in 2003, he became president and CEO of Liberty Strategies, a public policy consulting firm.

Barr says Republicans lost because they had no clear message: They preached fiscal austerity but practiced pork-barrel spending. They preached privacy rights but tried, against her husband's wishes, to keep alive a Florida woman (Terri Schiavo) in a persistent vegetative state.

"They articulated no vision or agenda," Barr says. "The public was receiving mixed signals: talk of conservative government, and action that was big government by any measure."

To turn things around, Barr, 58, says the GOP should develop creative solutions to problems such as health care and immigration — and "get some real leaders."

DOJ_NMG_0104036

A fatal flaw: Not dealing with pocketbook issues

Rep. Mark Souder proudly calls himself a "hard-core" conservative. He doesn't think Republicans lost the House majority they won in 1994 by forgetting their roots.

Rather, Souder says, the party got swept out of the Northeast and other regions by not addressing pocketbook concerns: health care, energy, college tuition, pensions.

It's fine to cut budgets, Souder says, but "the way we held power was also being sensitive to our districts." The Republican class of '94, for which he served as vice president, carefully placed its members on key panels that would help them win federal aid. Seven remain on the Appropriations Committee.

"To survive through 12 years and then a tsunami, most of those members have made some adaptations," he says. His prescription for the future: update conservatism.

"How would Ronald Reagan behave in this environment?" says Souder, 56, who won a seventh term from Indiana. The party, he says, needs "a different appeal."

Poll: Trouble For Clinton, Guiliani Bids (AP)

By Marc Humbert

AP, December 8, 2006

Democratic Sen. Hillary Rodham Clinton is popular within her party but could have trouble winning the presidency, according to a poll that also identified potential hurdles within the GOP for former New York Mayor Rudy Giuliani.

The former first lady held a double-digit lead over possible rivals in the survey released Thursday by Marist College's Institute for Public Opinion. Clinton, who has taken steps suggesting a 2008 bid, had the support of 33 percent of Democrats to 14 percent for former Sen. John Edwards.

Former Vice President Al Gore was at 13 percent and Illinois Sen. Barack Obama 12 percent. Other Democrats were in single digits.

Still, Clinton remains a polarizing figure, Forty-seven percent of registered voters said they would definitely not consider voting for the New York senator. Twenty-five percent said they definitely would consider voting for her while 28 percent said they would possibly consider it.

Giuliani and Sen. John McCain of Arizona led the GOP field, with 24 percent favoring Giuliani and 23 percent backing McCain. Giuliani and McCain each led Clinton, 49 percent to 43 percent.

But when Republicans were informed that Giuliani is "a pro-choice, pro-gun control, pro-gay rights Republican," 47 percent said those traditionally liberal positions would be a major factor in determining how they voted while just 22 percent said they would not be a factor.

Conservative voters hold considerable sway in the Republican presidential primaries.

"For Hillary, it is: She is acceptable to Democrats, but is she electable?" said Marist's Lee Miringoff. "For Rudy, he's electable; but is he acceptable" to Republicans deciding the nomination?"

The poll of 967 registered voters was conducted Nov. 27-Dec. 3 and has a sampling error margin of plus or minus 3.5 percentage points.

WASHINGTON (AP) — New Mexico Gov. Bill Richardson says a fence at the Mexican border authorized by Congress this fall "gets in the way" of U.S.-Mexico relations, and he wants the new Democratic Congress to reverse the legislation.

"The fence is very unpopular on the border in Texas and New Mexico, in Chihuahua," Richardson, a Democrat, said after meeting Wednesday with leaders from the Mexican state of Chihuahua. "So one of the most significant and constructive acts the U.S. Congress should take is to get rid of it."

Richardson said he will call on Congress not to build the fence during an address Thursday. He also will press lawmakers to approve a bill that secures the border and provides a path to citizenship for illegal immigrants. While Congress and President Bush approved the 700-mile border fence, a widely debated bill overhauling immigration policy died in Congress this year.

Both statements ratchet up Richardson's national profile as he weighs whether he will run for president.

Technically, Richardson is in Washington this week for a Democratic governors' meeting. But his schedule also is packed with events that highlight his background as a former congressman, ambassador to the United Nations and energy secretary.

Wednesday, he met with Chihuahua officials at an event billed as a model for how the U.S. and Mexico should work together. Thursday, he will give the immigration speech at Georgetown University, and Friday, he will talk about energy independence.

Richardson is coy about his potential presidential plans, saying he will make a decision before the New Mexico legislature convenes Jan. 17.

Republican Rep. Duncan Hunter, who has announced his candidacy, said the San Diego border fence has been effective and endorsed extending it 700 miles across Arizona and New Mexico.

"Contrary to Governor Richardson's opinion, the no-man's-land of violence and smuggling that constitutes the border is not a symbol of freedom," Hunter said.

WASHINGTON (AP) — The nation's top election oversight board approved guidelines for electronic voting machines, putting in place the first federal standards but stopping short of requiring states to follow them.

The Election Assistance Commission said the 68-page manual offers standards for equipment and software, offering states the option of having the congressionally created commission oversee the process instead of relying on statehouse-mandated inspections.

"Ultimately, it brings accountability to the system," said Gavin Gilmour, the commission's deputy counsel. "This is a voluntary program, but I would hope as many states as possible participate."

Currently, about 40 states require machine certification, according to the commission.

The group also accepted a new definition of "election crimes" and commissioned the first government-sponsored national study on the subject.

Election crimes have been defined as actions that allow ineligible persons to vote, eligible voters to be excluded, or other similar interference. The new definition says such crimes generally involve deceptions, coercion, damage or inaction.

WASHINGTON (AP) — Even the Republican National Committee, long a model of in-the-black budgeting, came out of this year's elections in debt.

Republican officials say the RNC has a $3 million deficit. It's not alone. The Democratic National Committee reported a $4 million bank debt. And party committees such as the Democratic Congressional Campaign Committee, the National Republican Senatorial Campaign and the National Republican Congressional Campaign are all reporting deficits after the most expensive midterm election.

The RNC's post-election report to the Federal Election Commission shows $6.2 million cash in hand, but officials said that money has already been spent or committed to be spent. The DNC reported $4.7 million cash on hand as of Nov. 27.

Support For White House Bid Eludes All But A Few, Polls Show (CQ)

By Marie Horrigan

Congressional Quarterly, December 8, 2006

With no incumbent president or vice president considering a run, the 2008 presidential race is described as one of the most wide-open in years. But two new polls indicate that at this early point in the race, only a few candidates in either party enjoy significant support.

The surveys, released separately Thursday by Fox News and the Marist College Institute for Public Opinion, both showed New York Sen. Hillary Rodham Clinton of New York with a more than 2-to-1 lead over the rest of the Democratic field.

Clinton was supported by 33 percent of respondents in both surveys. Her closest competition comes from three people who, like her, have not officially declared their intentions: 2000 presidential nominee Al Gore, freshman Illinois Sen. Barack Obama and former North Carolina Sen. John Edwards.

Obama was backed by 12 percent of respondents in both surveys. Gore was just ahead of him in the Marist poll, but trailed Obama by 1 percentage point in the Fox News poll, conducted by Opinion Dynamics.

Edwards, the Democrats' 2004 vice presidential nominee, trailed Gore and Obama in the Fox News poll, where he registered 8 percent. However, he was tied with Gore in the Marist poll.

The remaining Democrats were mired in single digits in both polls. That group included 2004 presidential nominee, Massachusetts Sen. John Kerry, and the two declared candidates in the race, Iowa Gov. Tom Vilsack and Indiana Sen. Evan Bayh.

Larry Shiman, a vice president at Opinion Dynamics, told CQPolitics.com he was surprised by the strength of Clinton's lead. "It's no lock, but she's certainly in a very stronger position and a little bit stronger than what I expected," he said of her results.

Among Republicans, the surveys showed former New York City Mayor Rudy Giuliani and Arizona Sen. John McCain leading the pack.

Giuliani led in both surveys, though he was statistically tied with McCain in the Marist poll, which showed Giuliani at 24 percent compared to 23 percent for McCain. The Fox News poll gave Giuliani a larger lead over McCain, 30 percent to 23 percent.

The Marist poll also showed solid support for Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice, who was backed by 15 percent of respondents. Rice, who has consistently denied holding presidential aspirations, was not included in the Fox News poll.

Other Republicans, including Kansas Sen. Sam Brownback, who announced his campaign Monday, trailed with single-digit percentages.

With 23 months until the election and more than a year until the first nominating contest in Iowa, pollsters caution against viewing the leads as prohibitive — most of the candidates are largely unknown to many Americans, and surveys taken this far out from previous elections have proven poor predictors of the actual outcomes.

Usually, such skepticism also is rooted in the belief that the public is not engaged in politics so far out from the election, but the Fox News poll indicates interest is already running high: Nearly seven out of 10 respondents described themselves as "very" or "extremely" interested in the presidential election.

The recent midterm elections, ongoing fighting in Iraq and long-awaited release of the Iraq Study Group's report on that conflict have kept politics in the front of voters minds, Shiman said.

Both pollsters underscored the electability of the top candidates. While Clinton amassed an enormous campaign chest for the 2006 election and had $13.9 million in cash as of Oct. 18, despite spending more $29.5 million on her Senate election, she scored poorly outside her own party.

The problem for Giuliani, however, is flipped — many voters remain unaware of his liberal stances on social issues including gun control, abortion rights and gay marriage, which could make it difficult for him to win over the conservatives that make up a large part of the Republican primary voting base.

"The problem for [Giuliani] is to continue to be acceptable to Republican primary voters. Right now most of them find his ideology to be fine — but then again, they don't know that much about him," said Lee M. Miringoff, director of polling for Marist College.

Clinton and Rice, the Marist poll suggested, will have to counter public ambivalence about their possible candidacies: Half of the respondents asked each woman not to run for president.

What was unclear from their poll, Miringoff told CQPolitics.com, was whether voters' impression of Clinton was implacable.

"There's just a huge number of people who would not consider voting for Hillary Clinton; it's close to half the electorate," he said. "And that means she's either got to drive that number down or there's not a lot of room for error in the campaign."

The WNBC/Marist Poll was conducted over the telephone from Nov. 27 to Dec. 3 with 1,229 adults, 967 of whom were registered voters, and had an error margin of plus or minus 3 percentage points. The Fox News Poll was conducted over the telephone from Dec. 5-6 with 900 registered voters, and also had an error margin of plus or minus 3 percentage points.

For Now, An Unofficial Rivalry (WP)

By Charles Babington And Shailagh Murray

The Washington Post, December 8, 2006

On Wednesday night, Sen. Edward M. Kennedy hosted the nine Democratic members of his health and education committee at an intimate dinner in his home in Washington's Kalorama neighborhood. The surroundings were stylish, the food home-cooked and tasty.

And then there was the entertainment.

The gathering included a former presidential candidate, Sen. Tom Harkin of Iowa, and a close friend of Kennedy's, Sen. Christopher J. Dodd of Connecticut. But the star attractions were Hillary Rodham Clinton of New York and Barack Obama of Illinois, two junior committee members who may be duking it out for the 2008 Democratic presidential nomination in a matter of months.

The air was thick with ambition. "I don't know why we're here, Bernie," Rep. Sherrod Brown (Ohio) quipped to a fellow senator-elect, Rep. Bernard Sanders (I-Vt.), as the guests walked into the dining room.

Neither Clinton nor Obama has formally declared a candidacy, but their rivalry is already the talk of the chamber, an amusing sideshow for Democrats and Republicans -- at least the handful who aren't weighing their own White House bids.

Kennedy (Mass.) tried not to play favorites on Wednesday, seating the two superstars on his right and left at dinner. But the dais of his committee will be another matter next year, after Obama joins the panel in January: According to seniority rules, the two are likely to be seated next to each other, toward the end. There they will vie for prominence on major issues such as stem cell research, the minimum wage and college tuition subsidies.

In the fishbowl of the Senate, interactions between Clinton and Obama are frequent and closely scrutinized. During a routine vote yesterday morning, Obama and Clinton brushed past each other on the Senate floor. Obama winked and touched Clinton on her elbow. Without pausing, she kept walking.

The 100-member Senate has never run short of presidential wannabes, but this time, Democrats worry that the clash of titans will overshadow their legislative agenda, leaving mere mortals grasping for notice and potentially compromising the party's efforts to expand its Senate majority.

"Everybody's going to be fighting for oxygen at a very high altitude," said Sen. Ron Wyden (D-Ore.).

Colleagues say Clinton and Obama appear to genuinely admire each other. So far, they claim to see zero evidence of public rancor. "Everybody gets along just fine," Harkin said. Kennedy described the pair as "extra-dimensional individuals" and asserted in an interview: "There's no sort of pettiness or jealousy that I see. They understand the momentous nature of what the search for the presidency is all about."

Behind the scenes, of course, it's a slightly different story. "Don't tell Mama, I'm for Obama" has become the Obama campaign's unofficial motto. It's a reference to Clinton's nickname as first lady and an example of the conflicted loyalties of many Democratic political aides. Some are talking to both camps about possible jobs in the presidential campaigns. Meanwhile, Democratic senators who are not considering presidential bids of their own are remaining neutral.

Some Obama allies suspect that Clinton supporters generated recent rumors that former vice president Al Gore is weighing a 2008 bid, hoping to discourage donors from signing up with Obama just yet. On Monday, Obama tiptoed onto Clinton's turf, traveling to Manhattan to talk with big-time Democratic donors such as George Soros.

Speaking later to reporters, he made a point of praising Clinton. "I think she is tough, I think she is disciplined, I think she is smart, and I'm not one of those people who believe she can't win," Obama said. "I recognize it's fun to set these things up as a contest between the two of us."

Clinton has been less effusive. She rarely comments publicly on Obama, and when she does, it's often in snippets. She declined a request to be interviewed for this article. In October, she said "it's great" that he is thinking of running for president. And Democrats credit her for letting Obama and a first-term senator, Ken Salazar (D-Colo.), headline a Capitol Hill media event last year while other senior Democrats grumbled about their nonspeaking roles.

Some of Clinton's chief supporters, however, have been less charitable. John Catsimatidis, a supermarket magnate and Clinton donor, said yesterday of Obama: "He might be ready for prime time, but I think it's too early."

Clinton and Obama were unusual senators from the start. They hired established, high-level staffers such as Pete Rouse, who was chief of staff for former Senate majority leader Thomas A. Daschle (S.D.) and took the same job in Obama's office, and Tamera Luzzatto, the former top aide to Sen. John D. Rockefeller IV (W.Va.), who now runs Clinton's staff.

Both senators maintained low profiles, at least at first, restricting most public activities to home-state events. Despite their megawatt qualities, both were deferential to older colleagues, and both made friends and co-sponsored legislation with Republicans.

Because Clinton spent eight years in the White House, she is a particular anomaly, escorted through the corridors by a security detail and rarely engaging in hallway banter with reporters before and after votes. On Tuesday, Obama lingered by the elevators near the Senate floor, feeding quotes on Medicare and tax cuts to a gaggle of scribes. Clinton rushed by a few minutes later, flanked by staff members, and headed straight onto a waiting elevator.

"She likes to stand alone," said one senior Senate staffer.

Clinton's colleagues were surprised when she teamed up with former GOP House speaker Newt Gingrich (Ga.) and Senate Majority Leader Bill Frist (Tenn.) on health-care initiatives, and when she staked out a moderate stance on abortion in a prominent speech in January 2005. But her reluctance to hog the spotlight has earned her considerable goodwill -- to the extent that some of her colleagues have speculated that she might become the top Democratic leader someday, should her presidential bid falter.

Obama, only two years removed from the Illinois legislature, initially stirred jealousy among some colleagues for the rave reviews of his keynote speech at the 2004 Democratic convention. But he earned loads of gratitude and goodwill by campaigning doggedly for fellow Democrats this fall, often drawing the largest crowd of each campaign.

Senators say Obama's explosive rise has startled Clinton and her advisers, who are mulling how to react. With Obama planning a trip to the early-primary state of New Hampshire on Sunday, they may need to decide soon.

"Hang on tight," advised Sen. Richard J. Durbin (D-Ill.), an Obama fan. "They ain't seen nothing yet."

It's A Cheney! (WP)

By Ruth Marcus

The Washington Post, December 8, 2006

DOJ_NMG_0104040

My only regret about Mary Cheney's pregnancy is that it didn't happen earlier -- say, during the 2004 presidential race, when Cheney was working for her father's campaign and his running mate was busy trying to write discrimination against people like her into the Constitution.

Imagine a hugely pregnant Mary Cheney sitting in the vice president's box at the convention. Imagine Cheney and her partner, Heather Poe, cuddling their newborn onstage at the victory celebration.

How perfectly that would have illustrated the clanging disconnect between the Republican Party's outmoded intolerance and the benign reality of gay families today.

Better late than never. Cheney's no crusader; she has little interest in becoming the poster mom for gay parenthood. But whether she intends it or not, her pregnancy will, I think, turn out to be a watershed in public understanding and acceptance of the phenomenon. This is the Ellen DeGeneres moment of national politics.

Acceptance won't come immediately, of course, and certainly not from all quarters. The folks who have fits about "Heather Has Two Mommies" are beside themselves over "Heather Is One of Two Mommies." Especially because the other mommy is -- as Mary Cheney is inevitably described -- The Vice President's Openly Gay Daughter.

"Unconscionable," said Janice Crouse of Concerned Women for America. "Her action repudiates traditional values and sets an appalling example for young people at a time when father absence is the most pressing social problem facing the nation," Crouse wrote on the TownHall.com blog. "Her child will have all the material advantages it will need, but it will still encounter the emotional devastation common to children without fathers."

"I think it's tragic that a child has been conceived with the express purpose of denying it a father," pronounced Robert Knight of the Media Research Center. The couple, he said is seeking to "create a culture that is based on sexual anarchy instead of marriage and family values."

I can understand that people -- especially those who have no personal experience with gay families -- are uncomfortable with the notion of children without a parent of each gender. What I can't understand is using words such as "unconscionable" or "tragic" to describe the choice of two people who love each other and want to create a family together.

To be a badly wanted child (one thing that's indisputable about the children of same-sex couples: the parents had to work to make it happen) in a home with two loving parents is no tragedy. If they're worried about "emotional devastation," the Crouses and Knights of the world would do better to reserve their lamentations for children in poverty, those who are abused or neglected, or for children in families splintered by divorce.

As to sexual anarchy, Mary Cheney and Heather Poe represent its antithesis. This is a couple who've been together for 15 years. In her mind, as Cheney told "Primetime Live" this year, "Heather and I already are married. We have built a home and a life together. I hope I get to spend the rest of my life with her. The way I look at it is, we're just waiting for state and federal law to catch up with us."

That could take some time, especially if Mary Cheney's political party has anything to do with it. As a resident of Virginia, which does not permit a gay parent to adopt, Poe will have no legal connection to the child that she and Cheney clearly intend to have and raise together. If the couple were to split up, Poe would have no legal right to see the child.

Virginia's newly adopted and expansively drafted constitutional amendment prohibiting gay marriage casts doubt on the ability of Cheney and Poe to write binding medical directives and wills. Without any legal protection, state or federal, against job discrimination -- the Bush administration opposes extending anti-discrimination laws to cover sexual orientation -- Mary Cheney could be fired simply because she is gay.

In fact, perhaps because it's less susceptible to being hijacked by the extremes, the business world is outpacing the political sphere in recognizing and responding to the new, out-of-the-closet reality of gay Americans. More than half of the Fortune 500 companies offered health benefits for domestic partners this year, up from just 28 a decade earlier, according to the Human Rights Campaign.

The latest issue of Fortune describes how companies seeking to attract and retain gay workers are offering bereavement leave if a same-sex partner dies, adoption assistance or paid leave for gay employees who have children, and relocation help for gay partners when employees are transferred. "Put another way, gay marriage -- an idea that has been banned by all but one of 27 states that have voted on it -- has become a fact of life inside many big companies," the magazine said.

Perhaps Cheney's high-profile pregnancy will help the Republican Party come to grips with those facts of life. If not, though, she's going to have to explain to her child what mommy was doing trying to help a party that doesn't believe in fairness for families like theirs.

The Comptroller's Glass House (NYT)

If there is any job that requires extraordinary integrity, it is that of the inspector or watchdog. The official who investigates others has to keep his own house cleaner than clean. Otherwise, any criticisms can too easily disappear in a hail of counter-criticisms and claims of hypocrisy. This is the problem that Alan Hevesi, New York State's comptroller, faces as his office audits everything from school boards to the state's racing board. When he bars a Medicaid provider because of overpayments or asks a school district to tighten its controls or details the weaknesses in oversight of gambling, the easy political response is, "Who are you to point a finger?"

For over three years Mr. Hevesi was unlawfully allowing the state to pay in full for a car and driver for his ailing wife. He has apologized, repeatedly, and is now in the process of paying back the state for the misuse of taxpayer money. Despite all this, he was re-elected, and his supporters say he should thus be allowed to serve another term.

But an election cannot overcome the possibility that Mr. Hevesi violated state law, as charged by the State Ethics Commission. Moreover, as each new release of the details about Mrs. Hevesi's chauffeur and car has become available, it has become clear that Mr. Hevesi's behavior was at odds with the way a comptroller, or any other state official, should do business.

Take a recent comptroller's report criticizing the state Health Department for not reviewing files in a "timely manner" in order to discontinue Medicaid benefits for those who were disqualified, including 34 who were dead. The impact of the report was muted by Mr. Hevesi's own failure to pay back the state for the use of a driver in a timely manner.

Then there is the problem of records. If you read through the audits from any comptroller's office, many of the strongest criticisms concern the way records are kept. Record-keeping, in fact, is the meat and potatoes of public accountability. Yet, Mr. Hevesi "failed to take a single step to ensure that proper records were maintained so that the proper reimbursement amounts could eventually be calculated," wrote David Kelley, the special counsel appointed by Gov. George Pataki for this case. At this point, there are three continuing investigations of Mr. Hevesi. The others are by Attorney General Eliot Spitzer's office and by Albany County's district attorney, David Soares.

Those investigations will take time and drain resources, while it is already clear that Mr. Hevesi's record in this matter is not up to the standards of his job. His own words should remind him of what is at stake. When a former Oswego mayor was questioned about $3,500 in spending on dining and travel, Mr. Hevesi said, "We take a zero-tolerance approach to local officials who abuse their position and use public money for their own benefit."

That is exactly why Mr. Hevesi should resign instead of expecting to be sworn in for a new term. The Legislature and Mr. Spitzer, the incoming governor, should pick a replacement — not a political crony but a person who can criticize others from a position of strength and rectitude.

US Still Hopes For NKorea Nuclear Talks This Month (AFP)

AFP, December 8, 2006

The United States said it had not "thrown in the towel" on efforts to resume nuclear disarmament negotiations with North Korea this month, but admitted it could still take weeks to organize the talks.

"We would still hope that we could get some discussions, get a new round of talks going this month," State Department spokesman Sean McCormack said.

"We're not ready to throw in the towel at this point," he added after preliminary meetings between US, North Korean and Chinese diplomats in Beijing last week failed to overcome obstacles to a resumption of broader negotiations also involving South Korea, Japan and Russia.

But the State Department official said Washington was "also not going to try to push to get something done in December if that means those talks aren't as well prepared as they possibly can be".

"If it's a matter of slipping things a few weeks, then so be it, we will," he said.

"The key is to get back to the table in a timely manner and in a way in which the conditions have been created so you can make some progress," he said.

McCormack was responding to reported comments by an unnamed North Korean diplomat who told the Russian news agency Interfax that formal negotiations could not resume this month as hoped.

"The renewal of the talks process in December 2006 is not possible nor is it -- without changes in the American position -- in the foreseeable future," Interfax quoted the diplomat as saying after the latest round of talks in Beijing.

North Korea agreed in principle in October to return to the six-party negotiations after being hit with UN sanctions for having carried out its first test of a nuclear bomb earlier in the month.

The six-party talks began in late 2003 but Pyongyang walked away from the process a year ago after Washington imposed financial sanctions on the country that were not directly related to the nuclear issue.

A possible easing of those sanctions is one of the carrots being offered by Washington if Pyongyang will return to negotiations on the basis of a September 2005 agreement under which it pledged to give up its nuclear weapons program.

According to Interfax, the North Korean diplomat said he government was demanding as a condition for renewed negotiations "the removal of American nuclear weapons from South Korea and other countries of the region".

McCormack reaffirmed the US position, reaffirmed in the September 2005 pact with North Korea, that the United States "has no nuclear weapons on the Korean Peninsula and has no intention to attack or invade the DPRK (North Korea) with nuclear or conventional weapons."

Analysts: U.S. At Root Of Effort To Topple Lebanese Government (MCT)

By Tom Lasseter

McClatchy Newspapers, December 8, 2006

BEIRUT, Lebanon - American political leaders watched with alarm during the past week as the Hezbollah militia laid siege to the U.S.-backed Lebanese government, but few would acknowledge publicly what most analysts and politicians here say is obvious: American policy may bear much of the blame.

Many in Beirut say that U.S. failure to stop Israel's onslaught against Hezbollah last summer crippled the Lebanese government - a U.S. ally - while strengthening Hezbollah - a U.S. enemy. That created an environment in which the Shiite Muslim militia could call for overthrowing Sunni Muslim Prime Minister Fuad Saniora and his Cabinet.

"Hezbollah has more support in the population now because they are the `victorious resistance,'" Cabinet member Ahmed Fatfat said. "And it weakened the government because we did not get any concessions ... the last war was a disaster for Lebanon and the image of the United States."

Fatfat, like several other Cabinet members, has been in hiding at the government building in downtown Beirut for days as tens of thousands of protesters outside demand a new administration led by Hezbollah, a group that's on the U.S. State Department's list of terrorist organizations.

The standoff between Shiite Hezbollah and its allies and the Christian and Sunni government has sparked street fighting in Beirut's neighborhoods and raised the specter of civil war.

It's also underscored a belief among some regional leaders that the United States has lost its footing in the Middle East. On Tuesday, the bipartisan Iraq Study Group recommended in Washington that the Bush administration reach out to Syria and Iran - U.S. foes - in a search for ways to resolve Iraq's violence. The group called for Syria to cease aid to Hezbollah and to stop trying to topple Saniora's government as part of a deal that might include Israel returning the Golan Heights to Syria.

But those suggestions seem behind the times as Hezbollah presses its campaign to force Saniora out.

Fatfat and other Lebanese officials said that while there was a complex set of reasons for the crisis - Syria is trying to derail a tribunal from investigating Syrian participation in political assassinations, Shiites long have felt underrepresented by their government, Iran is pushing against U.S. interests across the region - the conditions largely were set by U.S. actions during the conflict last summer.

The fighting began in July when Hezbollah kidnapped two Israeli soldiers, an act that began weeks of thunderous Israeli bombing and artillery barrages - often using munitions bought from U.S. suppliers - that killed at least 1,000 Lebanese, mostly civilians. Hezbollah answered by launching hundreds of rockets into Israel.

Saniora pleaded with American officials to intervene, but for weeks Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice and others said there first must be a "durable solution," meaning primarily that Hezbollah had to be contained and then disarmed.

As the fighting stretched on for more than a month and the Bush administration didn't intervene, Saniora looked ineffectual, a nearly unforgivable sin in a region in which military force and political strength are often synonymous.

"This summer was a catastrophe on many levels. This summer was bad news," said a Western diplomat in Beirut, who spoke only on condition of anonymity because of the sensitivity of the situation. "In general, Lebanon is in a much, much weaker position now than it was in June. There's no question at all levels - politically, economically, in terms of unity - everything is much worse now than it was in June."

How did the U.S. response contribute to that?

"It was painful to be here this summer, you know. I'll just leave it at that," the diplomat said.

Hezbollah officials have harped on the Lebanese government's reliance on U.S. help at a time when American policy makers weren't putting pressure on Israel to stop its aerial bombardment.

"It's no coincidence that all those who supported Israel in the war are today supporting what remains of this falling government," Hezbollah leader Hassan Nasrallah said Thursday night via video feed to a cheering crowd of thousands.

"Does any Lebanese accept ... supporting a government that George Bush and (Israeli Prime Minister) Ehud Olmert support?" he asked.

The sea of men, women and children booed and screamed for the government's downfall.

DOJ_NMG_0104043

Asked for comment, a representative at the U.S. Embassy in Beirut referred a McClatchy reporter to remarks by Rice last summer in which she said any peace deal had to ensure that Lebanon didn't return to its "status quo," again meaning that Hezbollah must be brought under control.

But Hezbollah now appears more in control than ever.

The United Nations Security Council resolution - with American approval - that ended hostilities in August mandated that Lebanese and United Nations troops patrol southern Lebanon, Hezbollah's heartland. The introduction of soldiers in the south, where the militant group was used to complete freedom of movement, probably ordained that Hezbollah would move against the government.

Hezbollah "knew all along that Saniora's government is pro-American and wants to disarm them as a military organization," said Hilal Khashan, a political studies professor at the American University of Beirut who's written extensively about the group.

The push against Saniora was an easy sell to Hezbollah's rank and file.

"Saniora's government did not help us during the war," said Hussein Ali, who was sitting with a group of friends across from his shoe store in a southern suburb of Beirut.

Ahmed Musalmani, who sells ceramic tiles, added: "And Fuad Saniora was kissing Condoleezza Rice."

Rubble from Israeli bombing runs stood in piles throughout the neighborhood. Where buildings once stood, craters were carved in the ground. Collapsed roofs leaned against fragments of walls.

The two men were with a group that was heading to join the demonstration downtown outside the building where Fatfat and his fellow ministers were living behind armed guards.

"You cannot play with Hezbollah," Ali said. "We are going to bring down the government."

Hezbollah Vows End To Lebanon Government (AP)

By Sam F. Ghattas

AP, December 8, 2006

Hezbollah leader Sheik Hassan Nasrallah promised thousands of supporters Thursday that they would eventually bring down Lebanon's Western-backed government, but the prime minister vowed to stand firm against protesters.

It was the seventh day of street demonstrations by Hezbollah and other pro-Syrian parties aimed at pressuring Prime Minister Fuad Saniora to quit in a deepening political crisis threatening to tear the country apart.

In a rousing speech delivered on huge screens in two central Beirut squares, Nasrallah accused Saniora of conniving with Israel during its monthlong war with Hezbollah last summer. He claimed Saniora ordered the Lebanese army to confiscate Hezbollah's supplies of weapons — his sharpest attack on the prime minister since the August cease-fire that ended the fighting.

"Didn't the prime minister of Lebanon work to cut off the supply lines?" Nasrallah said. He added that government officials had asked American envoys to persuade Israel to destroy Hezbollah.

"Those are the ones responsible for the war, not the resistance," Nasrallah said.

Hezbollah has gained increasing political clout after the war, which began after Hezbollah guerrillas snatched two Israeli soldiers patrolling the south Lebanon border. It wants to topple Saniora's government because it has rejected demands for forming a national unity government that would give the pro-Hezbollah factions veto power in the Cabinet.

Ahmed Fatfat, who was acting interior minister during the war, dismissed Nasrallah's accusations as "false stories about the war." He told AP Television News the charges would strengthen the government's resolve.

Saniora's allies have accused Hezbollah of being influenced by Iran and Syria, which they claim want to destabilize Lebanon by supporting the militant group's plans to oust the government.

Nasrallah said protests would continue until Hezbollah's demands are met. But he also said he was prepared to negotiate and that the Shiite guerrillas would use arms only against Israelis.

"We are a people that will not be defeated in the battle of wills," he said to roars from the crowd. "We will not leave the streets before achieving the goal that saves Lebanon."

It was only the second time Nasrallah addressed a mass rally since the August cease-fire. For security reasons, he did not appear but spoke via video link.

He addressed warnings from politicians and the army commander that the mass protests could drag Lebanon back to the sectarian civil war of 1975-1990.

"We will not lift our weapons in the face of anyone," Nasrallah said. "We will defeat you with our voices.

The army, overstretched with keeping Beirut's streets clear of blockades and clashing protesters, called for calm for the second time in four days.

"Offering sacrifices for the sake of the nation is not a duty of soldiers only, but it is a duty of all the nation's sons, specifically their political and spiritual leaders," the army said in a circular to soldiers that also addressed the politicians.

DOJ_NMG_0104044

Saniora, emboldened by international support for his U.S.-backed government, insisted he would not give in to protesters. He spoke to hundreds of supporters outside his offices, where he has been hold up, ringed by troops, riot police and barbed wire.

"We are standing fast, believing in the justness of our position," Saniora said.

Nasrallah's speech appeared to be an attempt to rouse supporters for a massive demonstration planned in Beirut on Sunday.

A Sudanese envoy, who arrived in Beirut on Thursday for talks with the rival factions, said the street protests should end, but supported the opposition's call for a broader-based government.

"The basis of a solution must be founded on the formation of a national unity government and withdrawal of dialogue from the street to parliament," said Mustafa Osman Ismail, the envoy of Sudanese President Omar al-Bashir.

Thousands of Hezbollah supporters have staged nightly protests in Beirut, and tents have sprung up in two city squares, shutting down shops and paralyzing the heart of the capital.

Syrian Vice President Farouk al-Sharaa, meanwhile, denied his country was interfering in Lebanon's internal affairs. Instead, he accused unnamed foreign powers of using Lebanon against Damascus.

He added that Syria will not send back its army to Lebanon "no matter what happens."

Syria withdrew its troops from Lebanon last year under heavy international pressure, after the assassination of former Prime Minister Rafik Hariri. Syria's Lebanese opponents blamed Damascus for the killing, a charge it denies.

Hezbollah's Leader Vows To Continue Protests (NYT)

By Nada Bakri And Michael Slackman

The New York Times, December 8, 2006

BEIRUT, Lebanon, Dec. 7 — Ratcheting up pressure on the besieged American-backed government of Lebanon, the Hezbollah leader Sheik Hassan Nasrallah insisted Thursday night that his followers would not leave the streets until their demands for more power were met. He also appeared to accuse government officials of trying to have him killed during the war with Israel.

With fears of a civil war running high in Beirut, Sheik Nasrallah's speech seemed calculated to bolster thousands of Hezbollah's supporters who have been camped in tents downtown, while also warning those followers against engaging in sectarian violence that could spread and possibly hurt Hezbollah's chances of appealing to more than its Shiite base. The speech also asked Arab governments in the region not to take sides in the conflict.

In an impassioned speech broadcast live on two large screens in downtown Beirut and throughout the region on satellite channels, Sheik Nasrallah told the government and its supporters that they were dreaming if they thought his alliance would end its protest, now in its seventh day, before it won a larger share of government power. And he called on all his supporters to hold another mass demonstration downtown on Sunday, raising the prospect of hundreds of thousands of demonstrators once again pouring into central Beirut, as they did last week.

"Tell them today, from the square of the strike, tell them tomorrow during the Friday Prayer, tell them every night, tell them on Sunday during the great gathering, tell them after Sunday, that you who bet on our surrender are deluded, deluded, deluded," he said, to chants of "We will follow you, Nasrallah."

Although Hezbollah has said before that the government had effectively colluded with Israel in the hope that its bombing campaign would destroy Hezbollah's militia, on Thursday, Sheik Nasrallah went a step further, saying that a government agency tried to find out where he was staying during the war and that the government worked to block the resupply of Hezbollah during the battle.

And he threatened to name names.

"Those who sat with the Americans and requested from them that Israel launch a war against us, they know themselves, and I know them, and I hope that the day will not come when I would say their names," he said.

He also said Hezbollah rejected civil war between Lebanon's ethnic or political groups. "We reject any armed clash in the street, and we also reject any kind of confrontation in the street," he said. "Tell the Lebanese and all nations in the region, whoever pushes matters in the direction of civil war, in civil war, everyone is a loser."

But while Sheik Nasrallah said Hezbollah and its allies were open to dialogue to resolve the crisis, those aligned with the government said his remarks were so filled with personal attacks that it appeared that what he was after was to "crush" the so-called March 14 coalition, which is struggling to maintain its control of the government.

"It was a very dangerous speech and very dangerous accusations which will have negative consequences," said Wael Bou Faour, a member of the March 14 coalition and a member of Parliament.

Lebanon has been caught in a tense standoff over the makeup of its government and the direction of the country ever since the end of Hezbollah's 34-day war with Israel in the summer. Hezbollah emerged emboldened after having survived the war — and having bloodied Israel. But it also emerged angry with the American-backed government. Hezbollah says its goal is to form a national unity government and to bring all parties into the cabinet, including the Free Patriotic Movement, led by Michel Aoun, a Christian and a former general. But Hezbollah has also insisted that its alliance have veto power over all government decisions — and a large enough bloc in the cabinet to allow it to bring down the government if Hezbollah's allies were all to resign at once. The governing coalition has offered a compromise formula, which Hezbollah and its allies have so far rejected.

Now Hezbollah is saying that if it does not get its unity government, which would allow the prime minister, Fouad Siniora, to stay in office, it will press for a complete collapse of the government and early elections.

The protests have raised tensions and fears of sectarian violence all over Beirut. On Sunday, a Shiite demonstrator was killed during clashes in a Sunni neighborhood and since then, the army has cautioned that if a political solution is not found, it could lose control of the streets.

Several demonstrators said the main message they took away from Sheik Nasrallah's speech was to avoid clashes.

"If he didn't speak today, maybe things would have deteriorated and we would have started fighting against each other," said Hussein Harfoush, 23. "I think everyone would have got involved in fights because people are very tense."

The outcome of this political battle not only will not only influence Lebanon's domestic politics, but also will affect the balance of power throughout the Middle East. Hezbollah is allied with Iran and Syria, while the governing coalition is aligned with the United States and France. The United States has looked to Lebanon as a bulkhead to thwart growing Iranian influence in the Middle East.

The government has accused Hezbollah of taking this political battle to the streets simply to help Syria try to block the formation of an international tribunal to hear evidence in the assassination of Rafik Hariri, a former Lebanese prime minister. A United Nations Security Council investigation has implicated Syrian officials in the killing.

Lebanon Feels Heat Of Sunni-Shiite Friction (USAT)

By Jeffrey Stinson

USA Today, December 8, 2006

BEIRUT — Lebanon's week-long political crisis is driving a deep and potentially violent wedge between Shiite and Sunni Muslims like this nation hasn't seen before.

"This is the worst ever," Abdo Saad, director of the Beirut Center for Research and Information, says of the rift. "It's very dangerous."

The political crisis reflects the growing influence of Shiites, and as in all matters political in Lebanon, there are religious overtones to the conflict.

"Sectarian tensions are high," says Mohammed Kalhani, a Sunni member of the majority coalition in parliament. "Shiites and Sunnis are opposing each other. That's something we never found in the past."

After decades of fighting in Lebanon that pitted its many groups against each other, clear Sunni-Shiite fault lines have emerged over the past few months as Hezbollah, a militant group, has launched a forceful effort to gain more power for itself and other Shiites and, opponents say, for its key supporters: Syria and Iran.

The crisis is most evident in downtown Beirut. Protesters led by Hezbollah have camped there for a week and vow to stay until the government resigns and gives them greater say over policy. The government, led by Prime Minister Fuad Saniora, a Sunni, refuses to give in.

The divisions can be seen and heard across the capital — in places such as the Shiite neighborhood of Haret Hreyk and the predominantly Sunni district of Tarik el Jdideh.

In Haret Hreyk, Housain Baroud, 35, a Shiite who runs a restaurant that sells sandwiches, says the split with Sunnis is palpable since the political struggle mushroomed.

A cold politeness characterizes even simple transactions among Muslims. "The tension, you see it now," he says after making change for a Sunni who walked in but didn't buy anything.

Baroud supports Hezbollah and its effort to gain greater political power in the government. The reasons, he says, are clear, pointing at the new floor, ceiling, tables and marble counter in his restaurant.

Half of it was paid for by a $3,000 grant from Hezbollah, which offered to help Baroud after the restaurant was badly damaged during the militant group's 34-day fight with Israel in the summer. The government has given him nothing, Baroud says.

Much of Hezbollah's newfound support comes from the conflict that erupted after the group, which is armed and gets financial support from Syria and Iran, staged a cross-border raid and captured two Israeli soldiers July 12. The two soldiers' whereabouts remain unknown. Israel sent forces into Lebanon and launched a bombing campaign aimed at neutralizing Hezbollah.

Israeli airstrikes flattened or damaged dozens of buildings in mainly Shiite southern Beirut, including Haret Hreyk. Buildings, many of them pockmarked from shrapnel, are separated by empty lots where businesses and apartment blocks once stood.

Israel failed to uproot the militant group, which saw its prestige grow among Shiites and other Lebanese as a result of its staying power. A cease-fire declared Aug. 14 halted the fighting. "I'm with Hezbollah 100%," Baroud says. "Hezbollah means to us dignity. They held off Israel."

That support may translate power on the battlefield into political gains for Shiites, who represent at least 32% of Lebanon's population, according to Saad of the Beirut Center.

Baroud is among Lebanon's Shiites who say they have been ignored by Sunni-led governments and the time has come — thanks to Hezbollah — for better representation. "How can you live in harmony and some people feel that others don't exist?" he asks.

The mood is darker in the Tarik el Jdideh area of West Beirut, a mostly Sunni area. It's been tense here since Sunday, when a Shiite youth was killed by gunfire while he passed through the district on his way home from the downtown demonstrations.

Tanks, armored vehicles and troops have set up checkpoints and barricades around Tarik el Jdideh. "Day after day, it is becoming more tense," says Mohamad Housami, 28, who works in a fruit-drink bar.

Housami says the cause of the widening divide between Sunni and Shiite Muslims is clear. "The Shiites have become more radical," he says. "If things keep the way they are going, it could be civil war: Muslims against Muslims."

Support for Saniora's government runs deep here. His governing coalition of Sunnis, Christians and Druse, was elected on an anti-Syrian platform after Damascus ended its nearly 30-year occupation of Lebanon. The withdrawal of Syrian troops was prompted by protests after the assassination of former prime minister Rafik Hariri, a Sunni critic of Syria's presence.

Resentment toward Hezbollah is high here — and not just because some Sunnis fear Syria could regain control of Lebanese affairs if Hezbollah gets the power it seeks.

There's also deep-seated resentment against Hezbollah for inciting the summer war with Israel. The conflict caused $2.8 billion in direct damage to roads, bridges, businesses and housing. "It was an unforgivable mistake," Mustafa Abbass, 63, a candy shop owner, says of the war. "Now, (Hezbollah) is trying to put pressure on the government for more power. This government is legitimate. It has popular support."

Government supporters such as Abbass suspect Hezbollah is staging its protest to derail an international tribunal that would try suspects in Hariri's murder. Hezbollah may also be trying to prevent the implementation of a U.N. resolution demanding that the group disarm.

President Emile Lahoud and parliament Speaker Nabih Berri, both of whom are pro-Syrian, say the Cabinet has lost its legitimacy since five Hezbollah members of the government resigned in October. They say the Cabinet no longer represents Lebanon's religious diversity, as required by the constitution.

The crisis has many worried about the future of Sunni and Shiite relations. Among them is Nouhad Srouji, 42, a Sunni who owns a clothing shop here. A mother of three, she is married to a Shiite. She and her husband no longer talk politics to keep the peace, she says.

"I'm very worried about the situation," she says. "And I'm very worried for my children. I'm telling them that if they grow up to be Shiite, marry a Shiite."

Mahmoud Abbas Weighs Options On Hamas (AP)

By Karin Laub

AP, December 8, 2006

A panel has advised Palestinian President Mahmoud Abbas to leave the militant Hamas group in power for now, but call new elections after the economic crisis in the Palestinian territories worsens further, a member of the group said Thursday.

In Gaza, meanwhile, some 2,000 supporters of Abbas' Fatah movement marched against the Hamas government Thursday, demanding it move to end the economic boycott imposed by the West for the Islamic group's refusal to renounce violence, recognize Israel and accept existing peace deals.

A leader of the march, identified only as Abu Moussa, said there would be a "revolution of the hungry against this government" if Hamas failed to act.

Abbas had sought to end the economic boycott by pushing Hamas to join Fatah in a coalition government. But talks broke down last week and Abbas has since been weighing three options: leave Hamas in power, dismiss the government or call a referendum on holding new elections.

DOJ_NMG_0104047

Abbas declined to discuss the options when speaking to reporters Thursday in Ramallah. Although talks with Hamas have hit an impasse, he said new negotiations were still possible.

"Unfortunately, our dialogue hit a dead end, although we should keep up hope to have a national unity government," he said.

Abbas, who discussed the three options late Wednesday with a panel of PLO members, is expected to announce a decision on how to move forward next week. All three choices have serious drawbacks.

Leaving Hamas in power would mean the international aid boycott would remain in place. If Abbas dismissed the government, the Hamas-dominated parliament could block any attempt to install a new Cabinet. And Fatah would not be guaranteed to win new elections should they be held.

Saleh Raafat, a member of the panel that met with Abbas, said a combination of two options is being considered.

"We have two recommendations," said Raafat, who represents the PLO's small FIDA Party. "The first is leaving Hamas in power while Fatah constitutes the opposition and gives Hamas a chance to solve the crisis. If it can't do so, then we have to resort to the second choice, a referendum on early elections."

"We are going to give Hamas a chance to solve the crisis, but I am sure it will not pass the test. It will not succeed unless it changes (its positions)," he said.

Hamas, however, appears increasingly confident it can keep its government afloat without Western aid, mainly with financial help from the Arab world. Hamas has denounced the idea of early elections and said it would not relinquish power.

"If we won't have a national unity government, we will not abandon our duty," said Deputy Finance Minister Samir Abu Aisha. "We will keep running the government, even with minimal aid."

Labor Minister Mohammed Barghouti of Hamas said donations from Arab countries could keep the government afloat, citing a pledge by Qatar for $40 million a month to cover the salaries of teachers and some health workers.

"Adding to that the local revenues and the decrease in running costs, I think we can manage to keep running the Palestinian Authority," Barghouti said.

Independent economists say the government remains in deep trouble. U.N. groups are asking for a record $450 million in aid to prevent a further economic deterioration in the territories.

According to the U.N., 65 percent of Palestinians are living in poverty and 29 percent are unemployed. The Palestinian health care system is running out of medicine and on the verge of collapse, and nearly half of all Palestinians don't have reliable access to food.

Speaking Frankly About Israel And Palestine (LAT)

By Jimmy Carter

The Los Angeles Times, December 8, 2006

I SIGNED A CONTRACT with Simon & Schuster two years ago to write a book about the Middle East, based on my personal observations as the Carter Center monitored three elections in Palestine and on my consultations with Israeli political leaders and peace activists.

We covered every Palestinian community in 1996, 2005 and 2006, when Yasser Arafat and later Mahmoud Abbas were elected president and members of parliament were chosen. The elections were almost flawless, and turnout was very high — except in East Jerusalem, where, under severe Israeli restraints, only about 2% of registered voters managed to cast ballots.

The many controversial issues concerning Palestine and the path to peace for Israel are intensely debated among Israelis and throughout other nations — but not in the United States. For the last 30 years, I have witnessed and experienced the severe restraints on any free and balanced discussion of the facts. This reluctance to criticize any policies of the Israeli government is because of the extraordinary lobbying efforts of the American-Israel Political Action Committee and the absence of any significant contrary voices.

It would be almost politically suicidal for members of Congress to espouse a balanced position between Israel and Palestine, to suggest that Israel comply with international law or to speak in defense of justice or human rights for Palestinians. Very few would ever deign to visit the Palestinian cities of Ramallah, Nablus, Hebron, Gaza City or even Bethlehem and talk to the beleaguered residents. What is even more difficult to comprehend is why the editorial pages of the major newspapers and magazines in the United States exercise similar self-restraint, quite contrary to private assessments expressed quite forcefully by their correspondents in the Holy Land.

With some degree of reluctance and some uncertainty about the reception my book would receive, I used maps, text and documents to describe the situation accurately and to analyze the only possible path to peace: Israelis and Palestinians living side by side within their own internationally recognized boundaries. These options are consistent with key U.N. resolutions supported by the U.S. and Israel, official American policy since 1967, agreements consummated by Israeli leaders and their governments in 1978 and 1993 (for which they earned Nobel Peace Prizes), the Arab League's offer to recognize Israel in 2002 and the International Quartet's "Roadmap for Peace," which has been accepted by the PLO and largely rejected by Israel.

The book is devoted to circumstances and events in Palestine and not in Israel, where democracy prevails and citizens live together and are legally guaranteed equal status.

Although I have spent only a week or so on a book tour so far, it is already possible to judge public and media reaction. Sales are brisk, and I have had interesting interviews on TV, including "Larry King Live," "Hardball," "Meet the Press," "The NewsHour With Jim Lehrer," the "Charlie Rose" show, C-SPAN and others. But I have seen few news stories in major newspapers about what I have written.

Book reviews in the mainstream media have been written mostly by representatives of Jewish organizations who would be unlikely to visit the occupied territories, and their primary criticism is that the book is anti-Israel. Two members of Congress have been publicly critical. Incoming House Speaker Nancy Pelosi for instance, issued a statement (before the book was published) saying that "he does not speak for the Democratic Party on Israel." Some reviews posted on Amazon.com call me "anti-Semitic," and others accuse the book of "lies" and "distortions." A former Carter Center fellow has taken issue with it, and Alan Dershowitz called the book's title "indecent."

Out in the real world, however, the response has been overwhelmingly positive. I've signed books in five stores, with more than 1,000 buyers at each site. I've had one negative remark — that I should be tried for treason — and one caller on C-SPAN said that I was an anti-Semite. My most troubling experience has been the rejection of my offers to speak, for free, about the book on university campuses with high Jewish enrollment and to answer questions from students and professors. I have been most encouraged by prominent Jewish citizens and members of Congress who have thanked me privately for presenting the facts and some new ideas.

The book describes the abominable oppression and persecution in the occupied Palestinian territories, with a rigid system of required passes and strict segregation between Palestine's citizens and Jewish settlers in the West Bank. An enormous imprisonment wall is now under construction, snaking through what is left of Palestine to encompass more and more land for Israeli settlers. In many ways, this is more oppressive than what blacks lived under in South Africa during apartheid. I have made it clear that the motivation is not racism but the desire of a minority of Israelis to confiscate and colonize choice sites in Palestine, and then to forcefully suppress any objections from the displaced citizens. Obviously, I condemn any acts of terrorism or violence against innocent civilians, and I present information about the terrible casualties on both sides.

The ultimate purpose of my book is to present facts about the Middle East that are largely unknown in America, to precipitate discussion and to help restart peace talks (now absent for six years) that can lead to permanent peace for Israel and its neighbors. Another hope is that Jews and other Americans who share this same goal might be motivated to express their views, even publicly, and perhaps in concert. I would be glad to help with that effort.

Annan Alarmed By Worsening Security In Darfur, Impact On Sudan's Neighbors (AFP)

AFP, December 8, 2006

UN chief Kofi Annan, alarmed by reports of mass rapes and other "gross violations of human rights," expressed deep concern about the worsening security situation in Sudan's Darfur region and its impact on neighboring countries.

UN spokesman Stephane Dujarric said the outgoing UN secretary general was "deeply concerned about the worsening security situation in Darfur and its consequences for the wider region, including Chad and the Central African Republic.

"He is alarmed by the devastating impact the violence is having on the civilian population in the region, and strongly condemns the recent attacks and destruction of dozens of villages in North Darfur," Dujarric said in a statement.

More than 80,000 people have been forced to flee their homes in the past six weeks alone, 50,000 of them in Darfur and 30,000 in Chad, according to the statement.

"Several hundred civilians, including women, children and elderly, have been killed, and there are very disturbing reports of mass rapes and other gross violations of human rights," it added.

Annan, who is to be succeeded as UN chief by South Korea's former foreign minister Ban Ki-Moon, also bemoaned the fact that the escalating violence was cutting off almost one million people across Darfur from desperately needed humanitarian relief.

"In both Darfur and Chad, relief workers are being attacked on a daily basis, and dozens of their vehicles have been hijacked in the last few weeks, threatening the humanitarian lifeline for a total of 4.3 million people in the region," the UN statement said.

"Those violating international humanitarian law by attacking civilians and relief workers must be held accountable, it said, adding that Annan had urged Khartoum to restore law and order in areas under its control and called on "all parties to ensure unimpeded humanitarian access to all those in need."

Monday, a former rebel leader allied with Khartoum said that pro-government Sudanese militias were attacking the key Darfur town of El-Fasher, and he threatened to quit the government if the assault was not halted.

"Even as I am talking to you, we are facing a Janjaweed attack on El-Fasher's cattle market," Sudan Liberation Movement chief Minni Minnawi said in Khartoum.

Minnawi signed a peace agreement in May with President Omar al-Beshir's ruling National Congress Party and was subsequently appointed as his adviser.

Two other rebel factions rejected the deal, however, while pro-government forces and their allied Janjaweed militia continued their attacks in Darfur, a vast western region devastated by almost four years of conflict and famine.

According to the UN, the conflict has claimed 200,000 lives and left some two million people displaced.

Paulson Pressed For Progress On China Devaluation (FT)

By Jeremy Grant

Financial Times, December 8, 2006

Hank Paulson, the US Treasury secretary, came under pressure from the Democratic party yesterday to persuade China's government to revalue its currency.

Christopher Dodd, incoming chairman of the influential senate banking committee, said he wanted Mr Paulson to return from a visit to Beijing with firm progress on the revaluation issue.

"I've listened to previous secretaries [of the Treasury] talk about jawboning on this issue and being patient, 'things are moving in the right direction'," Mr Dodd said. "But it's pretty difficult to explain to the American people day after day that a major competitor of ours, now a member of the WTO, is still fixing its own rates at a great disadvantage to us."

His call is a sign the Democrats, fresh from their capture of both houses of congress, appear ready to exert pressure on the Bush administration over the negotiating tactics used to persuade China to budge on the issue.

This week, Mr Paulson has faced questions from manufacturers who blame China for fuelling a record bilateral trade deficit of more than $200bn (£101bn) by maintaining a cheap currency.

Mr Dodd said he would write to Mr Paulson ahead of his visit next week, "to remind [the delegation] that there are a bunch of us here who care about this and who would like to know what sort of commitments they are getting". The delegation includes top-ranking cabinet officials and Ben Bernanke, Federal Reserve chairman.

"This is a big issue. This better be a topic very near the top of what progress they can report when they come back," Mr Dodd said while outlining his agenda.

Mr Paulson is expected to press for greater currency flexibility from Beijing. He also wants to cultivate an "intimate discourse" about long-term economic goals with the Chinese leadership.

Congressional anger appeared to ebb in September when Senators Charles Schumer and Lindsey Graham withdrew legislation threatening to impose tariffs on Chinese goods if China did not take steps to revalue.

It was abandoned as an early show of confidence in Mr Paulson, who sees himself as a bipartisan figure and believes he has credibility on both sides of politics.

John Frisbie, president of the US-China business council, said Mr Paulson had to be given the time he needs to make his approach work.

Treasury officials, meanwhile, are trying to strike a balance between maintaining moderate expectations of what can be achieved on the trip while hinting that there will be some "deliverables".

Mr Dodd said he might ask some of his Democratic colleagues to join him in the letter to Mr Paulson, "even those who didn't support the Schumer legislation".

Former Spy Buried As Russians Open Separate Investigation (LAT)

By David Holley And Kim Murphy

The Los Angeles Times, December 8, 2006

MOSCOW — A key figure in the poisoning of former KGB agent Alexander Litvinenko has also been contaminated by radiation, authorities said today as they announced they have opened their own investigation into the murder of the dissident.

Litvinenko was buried today in London, where officials believe he was probably infected with polonium-210 last month when he met with several people.

One of those people, Russian businessman Dmitry Kovtun, was questioned at a Moscow hospital Wednesday, where he apparently was undergoing testing for radiation.

The condition of Kovtun, a potential suspect in Litvinenko's murder, was unclear. The Russian news agency Interfax insisted that Kovtun fell into a coma "almost immediately" after talking to investigators. But the state-run news agency RIA

Novosti quoted Andrei Romashov, a lawyer involved in the case, as saying that Kovtun's condition was satisfactory and that reports of him falling into a coma "can only be called a provocation."

Kovtun's possible coma raised the question of whether the possible killer would soon be dead, taking with him any secrets he might have about Litvinenko's murder.

In a statement prepared shortly before his death, Litvinenko accused Russian President Vladimir V. Putin of ordering his murder, a charge the Kremlin has dismissed as "nonsense."

The opening of their own investigation appeared to increase Russian authorities' leverage in trying to find out as much as possible about the British probe of the murder.

The case has taken on the air of an international mystery with several proposed solutions.

The most prominent explanations include that Litvinenko's death was the work of Russia's secret services; or that rogue elements within the Russian power structure were responsible; or that exiled opponents of Putin killed one of their own to make Russia and its government look bad.

The first two scenarios have generally been taken more seriously in the West, while the Kremlin and nearly all Russian media have placed emphasis on the third, even accusing self-exiled Russian billionaire Boris Berezovsky. He now lives in London and was a close friend of Litvinenko and a fierce critic of Putin.

As the investigation has progressed, the mystery has deepened, with British police remaining silent on almost all points. However, British authorities have spoken fairly openly about the discovery of traces of polonium-210, or radioactivity presumed to come from polonium-210, at many of the places visited by key players in the drama.

That includes a London restaurant where Litvinenko dined on sushi while meeting one of his contacts, the Italian security consultant Mario Scaramella, who has tested positive for "significant quantities" of polonium but appears in good health. It also includes the Piner Bar in the Millennium Hotel in London, where Litvinenko met Kovtun and another businessman, Andrei Lugovoy, for tea, not long after his lunch with Scaramella.

British officials said they had not yet received any request from Russia for cooperation in a Russian-led investigation.

Litvinenko, who died Nov. 23, was laid to rest after a Muslim prayer service at London's Central Mosque and a private nondenominational gathering at London's Highgate Cemetery, where Karl Marx was buried. Litvinenko reportedly converted to Islam as he was dying, although he apparently did not go through the formal procedures of adopting the faith.

Litvinenko's body was so contaminated that authorities refused to allow it to be displayed at the mosque, where a few dozen mourners gathered for the Muslim funeral prayer.

Later, a much larger group gathered in a private ceremony in a chapel at Highgate to recite eulogies and listen as a choir sang Pitts' "There is a Green Hill Far Away" and a hymn from Rachmaninoff. Berezovsky talked about the "martyrdom" Litvinenko had achieved with the intense suffering that preceded his death.

"I can say that we are not vindictive, but we will not forget," Berezovsky said, according to some present at the ceremony.

Litvinenko's father and a close friend, exiled Chechen separatist Akhmad Zakayev, said Litvinenko had converted to Islam during his final days, but others denied that.

Friends and relatives, determined to have a nondenominational service, were nonplused when a group of Muslims, invited by Zakayev, arrived at the open grave and began conducting Islamic prayers once again.

"They appeared uninvited and were a surprise to everybody," said Alex Goldfarb, a friend of Litvinenko. "So Marina Litvinenko [his widow], who essentially was in deep mourning at that moment, faced a dilemma of whether to make it into a scene or just do nothing. She wisely decided to do nothing."

The confusion over ceremonies reflected the extent to which Litvinenko's death has been seized on by many who, for reasons of their own, have sought to use it as a rallying point in their battles with the Russian government.

Litvinenko lived for years in the North Caucasus near Chechnya, sympathized with the Chechens who were subjected to Russian atrocities, and spent six years researching the Russian government's actions in Chechnya, friends said.

"He wanted to be buried in Chechnya when the war was over," said Vladimir Bukovsky, a well-known Soviet-era dissident who was exiled to Britain three decades ago. "But he wasn't a religious man. It's ridiculous to talk about conversion. His last message from his deathbed was he asked God to forgive his enemies. That's not a Muslim sentiment. That's a Christian sentiment."

Times staff writer Sergei L. Loiko in Moscow contributed to this report.

Suspected Poisoning As Ex-spy Buried (FT)

By Jimmy Burns And Stephen Fidler

Financial Times, December 8, 2006

DOJ_NMG_0104051

The former Russian spy Alexander Litvinenko was buried on Thursday in London's Highgate cemetery as Russian prosecutors said they had opened their own investigation into his murder and the attempted killing of another Russian now suffering from radiation poisoning.

The funeral was attended by some 50 close friends and relatives including the film-maker Andrei Nekrasov, and Boris Berezovsky, the exiled Russian billionaire. It followed a gathering in his memory at London's Regent's Park mosque, attended by the Chechen separatist Akhmed Zakayev, that was used as a platform for critics of Russian President Vladimir Putin.

In a separate development, the BBC said that FM radio transmissions of its Russian service had ceased to be transmitted in Moscow since November 23. The reason given, a spokesman said, was unexplained "transmission problems". Other broadcasts on medium wave continue unaffected.

The Russian prosecutor-general's office said that after looking into Litvinenko's death as they were assisting British investigators in Moscow, prosecutors had established that the former security officer had died from radiation poisoning.

It added that Dmitry Kovtun – one of three Russians to meet Litvinenko on November 1 – was suffering from an illness "connected to poisoning by a radioactive nuclide". Litvinenko apparently died from poisoning with polonium-210.

The development came before Russian and British investigators had had the opportunity to question Andrei Lugovoi, a business partner of Mr Kovtun who also met Litvinenko and has found himself at the centre of the murder probe. Mr Lugovoi's lawyer said questioning had been expected to take place on Thursday but had been postponed.

The Russian investigation opens a new front in the complex Litvinenko case. The prosecutor's office said it would allow "more constructive co-operation" between Russian and British investigators.

But it will also strengthen Moscow's insistence that any Russian suspects in the case cannot be extradited to the UK and must be tried in Russia. Yuri Chaika, prosecutor-general, said this week that the Russian constitution did not allow extradition of its citizens.

Prosecutors said the opening of the Russian case might lead to Russian investigators visiting London.

The two articles of the Russian criminal code under which prosecutors opened their case provide for a prison sentence of eight to 20 years for anyone found guilty.

Mr Lugovoi and Mr Kovtun met Litvinenko on November 1 at London's Millennium hotel, before attending a football match between Arsenal and CSKA Moscow at Arsenal's Emirates stadium.

A huge pack of international media was kept outside the gates as the coffin was taken in for Thursday's funeral.

The body is thought to have been laid to rest in a non-denominational service at the cemetery where some of London's most famous exiled dead lie, among them Karl Marx.

Earlier Litvinenko's family and friends, although not Mr Berezovsky, joined about 150 Muslims at the central London Mosque, in Regent's Park.

Mr Zakayev claims to have been instrumental in Litvinenko's alleged conversion to the Muslim faith while he lay dying in a London hospital. "Akhmed [Zakayev] brought an Imam to the hospital to see Alexander [Litvinenko] after he had expressed his wish to die in spiritual brotherhood with the Chechen people and to be buried on Chechen soil once it is fully independent," a Zakayev aide at the mosque told the FT.

Russian Tied To Ex-Spy Also Ill From Radiation (WP)

By Peter Finn And Mary Jordan

The Washington Post, December 8, 2006

MOSCOW, Dec. 7 -- A Russian businessman who met with a former Russian domestic intelligence officer in London the day the man fell ill from radioactive poison has himself become suddenly and seriously sick, Russian news organizations reported Thursday night.

Dmitry Kovtun, a business consultant who met with Alexander Litvinenko on Nov. 1 at a bar in the Millennium Hotel in London, suffered a severe health breakdown from radiation exposure, according to the reports. He had earlier been interviewed by Russian investigators, with detectives from Scotland Yard present as well.

The investigation of Litvinenko's mysterious death has widened with each day, as technicians follow a radioactive trail left by the poison polonium-210 across London and Moscow and in the cabins of jetliners that flew between the two cities.

Critics of Russian President Vladimir Putin have accused his government of orchestrating a covert execution of Litvinenko to silence a detractor; the Kremlin rejects those claims as absurd and says Russia only suffers from the burgeoning international publicity over the death. No one has been formally identified as a suspect in the case, which has strained relations between Russia and Britain.

Kovtun is the second person reported seriously sickened by the radiation, though others have tested positive for low-level exposure to the substance. On Thursday, British health officials added seven people to the exposure list -- employees in the Pine Bar of the Millennium Hotel on Nov. 1.

The Russian prosecutor's office, accused in Britain of dragging its feet in the inquiry, said Thursday it has opened its own criminal investigations. "The examination revealed that Litvinenko died after being poisoned with a radioactive nuclide and Kovtun . . . was also found to have been poisoned with a radioactive nuclide," the prosecutor's statement said. Opening criminal cases could be the first step in pursuing a prosecution here.

Andrei Lugovoy, another Russian who was present at the London meeting Nov. 1, is undergoing tests at a Moscow clinic. He was to speak with British and Russian investigators Thursday, but the meeting was postponed.

"We are on hold," Lugovoy's attorney, Andrei Romashov, said in a brief phone interview. He said his client, a former KGB officer, did not ask for the postponement; Russian news agency RIA Novosti said it was requested by Russian investigators for "technical reasons."

Romashov said Kovtun's attorney told him that his client was sick but not in a coma. Russian media, citing medical sources at Kovtun's hospital, continued to report Thursday night that the businessman had slipped into a coma and was experiencing failure of major organs.

Kovtun has said he first met Litvinenko in October to discuss possible business deals with British companies interested in investing in Russia. He described himself in a recent interview as a longtime resident of Germany who had returned to Moscow to set up a business.

He is the latest person to have tested positive for polonium-210 radiation. Litvinenko's wife, Marina, has been told that small amounts were found in her urine but that risk to her health was low. Mario Scaramella, an Italian who also met with Litvinenko on Nov. 1, in a London sushi restaurant, had more significant amounts of polonium in his system, doctors said, but he is not showing symptoms and was discharged from a London hospital Wednesday.

British officials played down any threat to the seven hotel workers. "There is no health risk in the short term and in the long term the risk is judged to be very small on the basis of initial tests," Britain's Health Protection Agency said in a statement.

In another suspected poisoning case, former Russian prime minister Yegor Gaidar wrote in the Financial Times on Thursday that he believes someone tried to kill him at a conference in Dublin last month. Gaidar became violently ill there, and his daughter immediately raised the specter of poisoning, though Irish police have found no evidence to support that.

"Most likely . . . some obvious or hidden adversaries of the Russian authorities stand behind the scenes of this event, those who are interested in further radical deterioration of relations between Russia and the west," wrote Gaidar, who now heads a research organization in Moscow.

In London, Litvinenko was buried Thursday at historic Highgate Cemetery, which also includes the grave of Karl Marx, whose writings gave rise to the communist movement. Among those at the grave site was exiled Russian billionaire Boris Berezovsky.

The interment followed a memorial service at a central London mosque that was attended by Akhmed Zakayev, a Chechen separatist wanted in Russia.

Litvinenko is reported to have converted to Islam on his deathbed. Alex Goldfarb, a friend of the Litvinenko family, said any conversion "is kind of in the eye of the beholder."

He said Zakayev visited Litvinenko in the hospital just before he died, when he was heavily sedated, and believed that the sick man wanted to convert.

Ex-Russian Spy Buried As Probe Continues (USAT)

By Ellen Tumposky Special For

USA Today, December 8, 2006

LONDON — Alexander Litvinenko, the former Russian spy poisoned by radiation, was buried Thursday with Muslim imams at his graveside after prayers were said for him at a London mosque.

Soon after the funeral, Britain's Health Protection Agency (HPA) announced that seven workers at the Pine Bar of the Millennium Hotel, where Litvinenko met former Russian agents Andrei Lugovoi and Dmitry Kovtun on Nov. 1, showed "low levels" of contamination by polonium-210. It was the first time members of the public without a direct connection to the former Russian spy have tested positive for the substance doctors and investigators say was used to poison Litvinenko, 43. He died Nov. 23.

In Moscow, meanwhile, former agent Kovtun fell into a coma Thursday after being questioned by Russian and British investigators, the Interfax news agency reported.

DOJ_NMG_0104053

The prosecutor's office said Kovtun had developed an illness connected with a radioactive substance, possibly polonium-210. Interfax, citing unidentified sources, said Kovtun's condition was critical. The report could not be independently confirmed.

Andrei Romashov, a lawyer for Lugovoi, said media reports that he is in critical condition were wrong.

Italian security expert Mario Scaramella, who met with Litvinenko on Nov. 1, the day he fell ill, and the former spy's widow, Marina, also previously tested positive for exposure to polonium-210, although neither was in danger.

In its statement Thursday, Britain's health agency said the hotel workers faced no immediate health risk and a "very small" long-term risk. They asked staff and members of the public who had been at the bar on Oct. 31 and Nov. 2, to contact authorities for testing.

Scotland Yard said Wednesday that it was investigating Litvinenko's death as a homicide, and that traces of radiation had been found at more than a dozen sites in Britain and on jets that flew between London and Moscow. Russia's prosecutor general's office said Thursday that it had opened a criminal investigation into the attempted killing of Kovtun.

Litvinenko was buried in a sealed oak coffin at London's famous Highgate Cemetery, where communist philosopher Karl Marx is buried. About 50 mourners, including Litvinenko's wife, Marina, his son, Anatoly, 12, his parents, Walter Litvinenko and Nina Belyavskaya, and his first wife, Natalia, arrived in a line of Mercedes and BMWs. Also attending were his friends Alex Goldfarb, exiled Russian tycoon Boris Berezovsky and Akhmed Zakayev, a Chechen dissident.

Earlier, Walter Litvinenko and Zakayev mourned at the Central London mosque in Regents Park. Zakayev joined prayers, where Litvinenko's name was mentioned.

Litvinenko had criticized President Vladimir Putin's policies in the mostly Muslim separatist region of Chechnya. At the time of his death, he was investigating the murder of Russian journalist Anna Politkovskaya, who also was a vocal critic of the situation in Chechnya.

Goldfarb said the former agent was a non-religious man, though he wore a cross until it was removed in the hospital. When three imams arrived unexpectedly to say prayers at the funeral, Litvinenko's widow permitted them to participate, Goldfarb said.

"He said he was a Muslim in the same sense that John Kennedy said, 'I am a Berliner'— in solidarity with the Chechen people," he suggested, to explain Litvinenko's connection with Islam.

7 Test Radioactive At Bar Where Ex-Spy Met Russians (NYT)

By Alan Cowell, Steven Lee Myers

New York Times, December 8, 2006

LONDON, Dec. 7 — Seven bartenders at an upscale hotel in central London have tested positive for radioactive contamination, the British authorities said Thursday, raising new questions about the radiation poisoning death of Alexander V. Litvinenko, a former Russian agent.

In Moscow, Russia said it had opened its own criminal investigation into the death of Mr. Litvinenko, who was buried Thursday, two weeks after he died, in a private ceremony in London. Russian authorities also said a Russian businessman, Dmitri V. Kovtun, who was interviewed by British investigators in Moscow, was found to have signs of radioactive poisoning.

In London, attention swung back to the Pine Bar of the Mayfair Millennium Hotel, in Grosvenor Square, close to the American Embassy, where Mr. Litvinenko was reported to have met both Mr. Kovtun and another Russian contact, Andrei K. Lugovoi, on Nov. 1.

That was the day Mr. Litvinenko complained of feeling ill. He also ate at a sushi bar on the same day, although it is not clear which establishment he visited first. The exposure to the bartenders revived questions about exactly where Mr. Litvinenko had been poisoned, how he was poisoned and who else might have been contaminated.

The British health authorities said they would contact 250 people who called in after Mr. Litvinenko's death to say they had been at the Pine Bar on Nov. 1 and would ask them to take a urine test for radioactive contamination.

Prof. Pat Troop, the chief executive of Britain's Health Protection Agency, said all seven members of the bar staff tested had shown "a low level of contamination" that carried no short-term health risks but a "very small" long-range cancer risk.

She declined to comment on how the members of the bar staff might have been contaminated by polonium 210, a radioactive isotope that is dangerous only when swallowed, breathed in or absorbed through an open wound.

She said it was technically possibly for polonium to be carried in tobacco smoke, where minute traces are routinely found in nature. But, she said, she did not believe that the levels of contamination in the bar workers signified that the toxins had been inhaled in cigarette smoke. The Pine Bar permits smoking. Mr. Litvinenko was not a smoker, according to Alex Goldfarb, a family friend and spokesman.

Dr. Michael Clark, the spokesman for the Health Protection Agency's radiation protection division, said the levels of radiation found in the seven bar workers were less than — but close to — levels in an adult member of Mr. Litvinenko's family.

DOJ_NMG_0104054

In Moscow, Mr. Kovtun became the latest among several people showing signs of exposure to the material that ultimately killed Mr. Litvinenko, on Nov. 23. The Prosecutor General's Office did not disclose his condition except to say in a statement that he had "an illness also connected to poisoning by a radioactive nuclide."

By Thursday night, however, Interfax reported that Mr. Kovtun fell into a coma "practically immediately upon completion of the interrogation" by investigators, who questioned him for a third day in connection with Mr. Litvinenko's death. Interfax cited unnamed sources. Later on, Mr. Lugovoi's lawyer, Andrei Romashov, told [a wire news service] that he had spoken to Mr. Kovtun's representatives, and that his health was unchanged and satisfactory.

In a short statement, the prosecutor's office in Moscow suggested that Mr. Kovtun might have been a victim of whoever had killed Mr. Litvinenko, rather than a suspect. The statement said Mr. Kovtun's poisoning was being investigated as an attempted murder.

Mr. Kovtun's apparent contamination could also mean that the Russians had been exposed while meeting Mr. Litvinenko, as was an Italian academic, Mario Scaramella, who met him separately at the Itsu sushi restaurant on the same day. Mr. Scaramella and Mr. Litvinenko's wife tested positive for traces of radioactivity but have developed no signs of illness.

Mr. Lugovoi, who is reported to be in the same hospital as Mr. Kovtun, has also been tested, but no results have been announced officially. He was supposed to be questioned on Thursday by investigators from Russia and Britain, but his lawyer said their meeting had again been postponed.

In the weeks since Mr. Litvinenko's illness first developed, Russian officials have reacted dismissively to accusations that President Vladimir V. Putin or any other official in Russia could be involved, saying the charges amounted to hysteria or deliberate misinformation.

Russia's announcement that it had opened its own criminal investigation came as diplomatic pressure grew for it to take the case seriously. The prosecutor general, Yuri Y. Chaika, said Russia would remain in charge of any detective work in the country — and would try any suspects in Russian courts — but since then investigators have cooperated with British investigators, who arrived Monday.

"Within the framework of provision of assistance to British investigators, the General Prosecutor's Office has carried out a check of a number of circumstances of the death of Alexander Litvinenko, a former employee of the F.S.B. of the Russian Federation," Thursday's statement said, using the Russian initials for the K.G.B.'s domestic successor, the Federal Security Service.

"As the result of the check it was established that Mr. Litvinenko died as the result of poisoning by a radioactive nuclide and Mr. Kovtun, who met with Mr. Litvinenko in London, has an illness also connected to poisoning by a radioactive nuclide."

Mr. Litvinenko, who became an outspoken critic of President Putin, was buried on Thursday in London in a ceremony attended by relatives, friends and others.

Among them were some of the most prominent Russians living in self-exile from Mr. Putin's Russia: Boris A. Berezovsky, an erstwhile ally of Mr. Putin's who fled what he has called politically motivated criminal charges, and Akhmed Zakayev, a leader of Chechnya's foundering separatist movement.

Mr. Goldfarb, Litvinenko family spokesman and an associate of Mr. Berezovsky, said later that the funeral at Highgate Cemetery — the burial place of, among others, Karl Marx — had taken an unexpected turn when, against the wishes of Marina Litvinenko, the widow, a Muslim cleric performed Islamic rites.

"Marina was upset but said it was O.K. for them to do it," he said in a telephone interview.

A question that hung over the funeral was whether Mr. Litvinenko had made a deathbed conversion to Islam. "This will be one of the big mysteries. His Islamic friends said he did convert," Mr. Goldfarb said. "He was heavily sedated at the time, but if there are people who believe he converted, let them believe it."

Radiation Poisoning Case Widens (CHIT)

By Alex Rodriguez

Chicago Tribune, December 8, 2006

MOSCOW -- The mystery of the poisoning death of former Russian spy Alexander Litvinenko deepened Thursday, as authorities in Moscow announced that one of the Russians Litvinenko met the day he became ill also has fallen prey to radiation poisoning.

The Russian prosecutor general's office said it has opened an investigation into the attempted murder of Dmitry Kovtun, a Russian businessman who together with a colleague, Andrei Lugovoi, met Litvinenko in London the day he fell ill, Nov. 1, and earlier in London, on Oct. 16.

DOJ_NMG_0104055

In a prepared statement, Russian prosecutors said they had determined that Litvinenko "died as a result of radioactive nuclide poisoning, and Kovtun, who met Litvinenko in October 2006, developed the same kind of disease also associated with radioactive nuclide poisoning."

The statement by Russian prosecutors did not mention the Nov. 1 meeting, though Kovtun and Lugovoi gave a radio interview in Moscow on Nov. 24 in which they confirmed they met Litvinenko on Nov. 1 at the Millennium Hotel in London.

Russian prosecutors also announced they have opened an investigation into the death of Litvinenko, who died Nov. 23 after ingesting polonium-210, a radioactive isotope that can kill in minute amounts.

Investigations moving

That investigation will proceed alongside a probe by a team of British investigators, who arrived in Moscow on Monday. On Wednesday, British authorities announced they now regard his death as a murder.

British investigators interviewed Kovtun on Tuesday and Wednesday at a Moscow clinic where he has been undergoing radiation checks. The exact nature of his symptoms had yet to be disclosed as of late Thursday. Russian authorities' announcement of Kovtun's illness makes him the fourth person to test positive for the presence of a radioactive substance in his body.

Litvinenko's wife, Marina, tested positive for radiation, but doctors said the level was a trace amount that posed no harm.

Doctors also announced that Mario Scaramella, an Italian security expert who met Litvinenko on Nov. 1 at a London sushi bar, tested positive for traces of radioactivity in his body, though he has shown no signs of illness. He was released from a hospital Wednesday in London.

Litvinenko had been investigating the Oct. 7 slaying of Kremlin critic and investigative journalist Anna Politkovskaya, and at that Nov. 1 meeting at the sushi bar, Scaramella showed him documents related to the journalist's death.

Litvinenko, who like Lugovoi once worked for the KGB and its successor agency, the FSB, had also been a harsh critic of the Kremlin and Russian President Vladimir Putin. Before he died, Litvinenko issued a statement blaming Putin for his poisoning, a charge Putin denied.

The 43-year-old former Russian agent was buried Thursday at Highgate cemetery in northern London. The non-denominational funeral was preceded by a memorial at a London mosque; before he died, Litvinenko told his father he had thought about converting to Islam and wanted to be buried according to Muslim tradition, the Russian newspaper Kommersant reported.

The disclosure by Russian authorities that Kovtun had radiation poisoning and his rapid decline in health marked a bizarre, new twist in a case that has captivated both London and Moscow.

Trail of radiation

British media had reported that Scotland Yard investigators wanted to question Lugovoi, Kovtun and another colleague, Vyacheslav Sokolenko, during their trip to Moscow. Both Lugovoi and Kovtun met Litvinenko in London on Oct. 16 and again Nov. 1. Lugovoi met Litvinenko alone on Oct. 26.

Sokolenko said during the Nov. 24 radio interview on Ekho Moskvy that he briefly exchanged greetings with Litvinenko in the hotel lobby Nov. 1 but did not sit in on the conversation.

Traces of radioactivity were found at the hotel where Litvinenko met the Russians on Nov. 1, as well as at the British Embassy in Moscow, where Lugovoi appeared upon his return to Moscow to deny his involvement in the poisoning.

The New York Times reported that radioactivity was also detected at the London soccer stadium that Lugovoi, Kovtun and Sokolenko attended after the Millennium Hotel meeting. And Lugovoi flew on British Airways flights traveling the London-Moscow route that tested positive for radioactivity.

Lugovoi is in a Moscow hospital undergoing radiation checks. British investigators were supposed to question him Thursday, but that meeting was postponed, the Russian news agency RIA Novosti reported.

Lugovoi told Ekho Moskvy he had known Litvinenko for 10 years. Lugovoi worked at Russia's intelligence agency from 1987 to 1996. He now owns a company that produces wine and soft drinks.

Litvinenko became a KGB agent in 1988. He rose through the ranks at the intelligence agency until the fall of 1998, when he appeared at a news conference and accused the agency of asking him to help assassinate Boris Berezovsky, an exiled Russian oligarch who has become one of Putin's staunchest critics and is wanted by Russia on fraud charges.

Litvinenko and Berezovsky became close allies. Litvinenko later was arrested on charges of abuse of office and spent nine months in a Russian jail before he won an acquittal in 2000. Later he fled to Britain and was granted political asylum in 2001. He became a British citizen earlier this fall.

Kovtun told the radio station he is a longtime friend of Lugovoi and said he operates a consulting firm that advises Western businesses wishing to enter the Russian market. Sokolenko heads up the bodyguard unit of a Moscow security company called the 9th Degree.

Lugovoi has told Russian media that he believes he and his colleagues are being framed for Litvinenko's murder.

"As for the hullabaloo about me that has been stirred up by Western media, in my view good theatrical directing is traceable here," Lugovoi told the Russian news agency Interfax. "I've stopped watching television and reading papers. I'm fed up with all this."

That Murder In London (WP)

By Charles Krauthammer

The Washington Post, December 8, 2006

The poisoning of Alexander Litvinenko, renegade Russian spy and fierce critic of Vladimir Putin's government, is everywhere being called a mystery. There is dark speculation about unnamed "rogue elements" either in the Russian secret services or among ultranationalists acting independently of the government. There are whispers about the indeterminacy of things in the shadowy netherworld of Russian exile politics, crime and espionage.

Well, you can believe in indeterminacy. Or you can believe the testimony delivered on the only reliable lie detector ever invented -- the deathbed -- by the victim himself. Litvinenko directly accused Putin of killing him.

Litvinenko knew more about his circumstances than anyone else. And on their deathbeds, people don't lie. As Machiavelli said (some attribute this to Voltaire), after thrice refusing the entreaties of a priest to repent his sins and renounce Satan, "At a time like this, Father, one tries not to make new enemies."

In science, there is a principle called Occam's razor. When presented with competing theories for explaining a natural phenomenon, one adopts the least elaborate. Nature prefers simplicity. Scientists do not indulge in grassy-knoll theories. You don't need a convoluted device to explain Litvinenko's demise.

Do you think Anna Politkovskaya, the journalist who was investigating the war in Chechnya, was shot dead in her elevator by rogue elements? What about Viktor Yushchenko, the presidential candidate in Ukraine and eventual winner, poisoned with dioxin during the campaign, leaving him alive but disfigured? Ultranationalist Russians?

Opponents of Putin have been falling like flies. Some jailed, some exiled, some killed. True, Litvinenko's murder will never be traced directly to Putin, no matter how dogged the British police investigation. State-sponsored assassinations are almost never traceable to the source. Too many cutouts. Too many layers of protection between the don and the hit man.

Moreover, Russia has a long and distinguished history of state-sponsored assassination, of which the ice-pick murder of Leon Trotsky was but the most notorious. Does anyone believe that Pope John Paul II, then shaking the foundations of the Soviet empire, was shot by a crazed Turk acting on behalf of only Bulgaria?

If we were not mourning a brave man who has just died a horrible death, one would almost have to admire the Russians, not just for audacity but for technique in Litvinenko's polonium-210 murder. Assassination by poisoning evokes the great classical era of raison d'etat rub-outs by the Borgias and the Medicis. But the futurist twist of (to paraphrase Peter D. Zimmerman in the Wall Street Journal) the first reported radiological assassination in history adds an element of the baroque of which a world-class thug outfit such as the KGB (now given new initials) should be proud.

Some say that the Litvinenko murder was so obvious, so bold, so messy -- five airplanes contaminated, 30,000 people alerted, dozens of places in London radioactive -- that it could not possibly have been the KGB.

But that's the beauty of it. Do it obvious, do it brazen, and count on those too-clever-by-half Westerners to find that exonerating. As the president of the Central Anarchist Council (in G.K. Chesterton's "The Man Who Was Thursday") advised: "You want a safe disguise, do you? . . . A dress in which no one would ever look for a bomb? Why, then, dress up as an anarchist, you fool!"

The other reason for making it obvious and brazen is to send a message. This is a warning to all the future Litvinenkos of what awaits them if they continue to go after the Russian government. They'll get you even in London, where there is the rule of law. And they'll get you even if it makes negative headlines for a month.

Some people say that the KGB would not have gone to such great lengths to get so small a fry as Litvinenko. Well, he might have been a small fry, but his investigations were not. He was looking into the Kremlin roots of Politkovskaya's shooting. And Litvinenko claimed that the Russian government itself blew up apartment buildings in Moscow and elsewhere in 1999, killing hundreds of innocent civilians, in order to blame it on the Chechens and provoke the second Chechen war. Pretty damning stuff.

But even Litvinenko's personal smallness serves the KGB's purposes precisely. If they go to such lengths and such messiness and such risk to kill someone as small as Litvinenko, then no critic of the Putin dictatorship is safe. It is the ultimate in deterrence.

The prosecution rests. We await definitive confirmation in Putin's memoirs. Working title: "If I Did It."

Written Off As Journalists Die, A Russian Paper Faces Grim Future (WSJ)

DOJ_NMG_0104057

By Guy Chazan

The Wall Street Journal, December 8, 2006

MOSCOW -- In mid-October, a few days after his star reporter was murdered, Dmitry Muratov summoned his senior staff for an urgent meeting.

"I told them I wanted to close the paper," recalls Mr. Muratov, editor in chief of the Russian newspaper Novaya Gazeta. "I felt no profession was worth dying for."

Russia is one of the most dangerous places in the world to be a journalist. And the most dangerous place to be a journalist in Russia is Novaya Gazeta. It has lost three reporters in the past six years. One was bludgeoned to death with a hammer. Another died of an allergic reaction relatives suspect was caused by poisoning. A third, Anna Politkovskaya, was shot dead two months ago in the elevator of her apartment block.

A muckraking tabloid, Novaya Gazeta specializes in shining a light into the murky corners of Vladimir Putin's Russia. For years it has exposed government sleaze, corporate crime and abuses of human rights. In the freewheeling 1990s, that was staple fare for the Russian press. But with the Kremlin and its allies now in control of much of the media, such themes have become taboo -- and writing about them a risky business.

Other Putin critics have also met mysterious ends. Last month, Alexander Litvinenko, a former KGB agent and strident Kremlin critic who was investigating Ms. Politkovskaya's death, died in London of suspected poisoning by the rare radioactive element polonium-210. In a deathbed statement, he accused Mr. Putin of killing him. The Russian ruler swiftly rejected the charge. There is no evidence that the Kremlin was involved in the Litvinenko case or in the deaths of the three Novaya Gazeta reporters.

As opposition voices are slain, exiled or intimidated into silence, Novaya is one of the last outposts of free speech left in Russia -- a status that has earned it influential friends in the West. On a trip to Moscow in October, U.S. Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice pointedly invited the paper's editors to her hotel. "I want to stress that you are not alone in your struggle," she told them.

Novaya Gazeta's past isn't free of taint. Like the vast majority of Russian newspapers, it has printed articles paid for by influential politicians and businessmen, former Novaya journalists say. Today, one of its biggest fears, in an overwhelmingly pro-Putin nation, is irrelevance. The paper's strident antigovernment line puts it out of touch with the masses and the wealthy alike, leaving it to drift increasingly to the margins of Russian life.

Stressed-out and chain-smoking, the 45-year-old Mr. Muratov is the public face of Novaya Gazeta and its idealistic but battle-hardened staff of 100 journalists. He says colleagues rejected his idea of closing the paper in the wake of Ms. Politkovskaya's death. But he remains fearful for the lives of his staff. "I keep thinking: Who's next?" he says. Just 11 days ago, Novaya announced two of its senior reporters had received death threats, one of them sent as a text message to his mobile phone.

Novaya Gazeta, or New Newspaper, was formed in 1993 by a group of about 30 journalists who broke away from Komsomolskaya Pravda, then and now Russia's highest-circulation newspaper.

Some of Novaya's early success came because of former Soviet leader Mikhail Gorbachev's patronage. He donated part of his Nobel Peace Prize winnings to buy Novaya's first newsroom computers and gave another $200,000 to pay for staff salaries. In 1994 his wife, Raisa, bought Mr. Muratov his first cellphone, a clunky Motorola. However, advertisers were put off by Novaya's low circulation and its readers, mainly down-at-the-heels intellectuals. In 1995 the paper briefly closed down due to lack of funds.

From the start, Novaya had a uniquely independent stance. It condemned President Boris Yeltsin's shelling of the hard-line Russian parliament in 1993, when all other liberal media backed him. In 1996, an election year, the rest of the Russian press sided with Mr. Yeltsin, but Novaya remained neutral. That earned it respect in journalistic circles, and it was able to poach some of Russia's top reporters. Circulation rose from 10,000 to 70,000 by the end of 1996 as the paper ran scoop after scoop about graft in the Yeltsin administration.

A series of campaigns also raised its profile and boosted its moral authority. Between 1997 and 1999, its defense correspondent, a Russian army major and decorated Afghan war veteran named Vyacheslav Izmailov, helped free 171 Russian prisoners of war and hostages held by warlords in the rebel region of Chechnya.

However, journalists say that to keep afloat, Novaya Gazeta resorted to a practice endemic in the Russian media -- publishing paid-for articles masquerading as news. Mr. Muratov declines to discuss what his paper did but says the entire Russian press engaged in the practice. He insists he "never printed anything that went against the paper's editorial policy."

The hodgepodge of styles was often jarring. An issue in November 1998 featured a hard-hitting account of the murder of Galina Starovoitova, a liberal lawmaker; a feature about the ties between local politics and organized crime in the port of Novorossiisk; and alongside them, an upbeat story about a Moscow bank that funded a memorial in London to Soviet war dead.

The head of the bank, billionaire businessman Alexander Lebedev, was one of Novaya's informal sponsors. Mr. Lebedev denies paying for that particular article but says, "It's true that I did support them financially, and that their coverage was generally favorable to us."

Alexei Pankin, a former op-ed editor of the newspaper Izvestia and a friend of Mr. Muratov, says paid articles may have made it possible for Novaya Gazeta journalists to cover the stories that mattered most to them -- such as the war in Chechnya -- but the practice "no doubt harmed the paper's reputation." Novaya Gazeta and other papers were also left vulnerable to allegations of corruption when Mr. Putin began his crackdown on the independent media.

And Novaya's political coverage was getting it into hot water with the authorities. In the fall of 1999, a series of explosions ripped through apartment blocks in Moscow and two other Russian cities, killing 300 people. The authorities blamed Chechen militants and Mr. Putin sent troops to restore Russian rule in Chechnya. Novaya ran a series of stories describing what it said was evidence the blasts were orchestrated by Russia's security services. The late Mr. Litvinenko made the same claim -- vigorously denied by the Kremlin -- after he won political asylum in Britain in 2000.

Novaya also dug into Mr. Putin's stint as deputy mayor of St. Petersburg in the early 1990s, alleging fraud in his handling of a humanitarian-aid program. The president also rejected that claim. "From that point, our relations with the Putin administration were ruined," says Mr. Muratov. Businessmen who had donated funds to the paper stopped doing so.

Mr. Muratov scrounged money from business contacts and received $100,000 from financier George Soros's Open Society Institute, which promotes democracy in the region. But the climate for independent media kept worsening. OAO Gazprom, the state natural-gas monopoly, took over NTV, a TV channel owned by tycoon and Putin critic Vladimir Gusinsky. Mr. Gusinsky fled into exile. Novaya managed to survive only because it was owned by its own journalists.

In 2002 the paper was almost forced to close after losing a string of libel suits that critics said were evidence of sloppy reporting. Mr. Muratov calls it a government-sanctioned campaign of "judicial strangulation."

More alarming, the paper's journalists were coming under physical attack. In May 2000, Igor Domnikov, whose articles alleged corruption in the southern region of Lipetsk, was beaten with a hammer in the entrance of his apartment block. Two months later he died of his injuries. His accused killers are currently on trial in central Russia, but authorities haven't said who ordered the killing.

Later that year, Ms. Politkovskaya, whose reports from Chechnya exposing atrocities committed by Russian troops led to a slew of criminal investigations, had to be placed under armed guard after receiving death threats. She was then sent into hiding abroad.

In 2003, Yuri Shchekochikhin, Novaya's deputy editor, fell ill with a mysterious ailment. A liberal lawmaker, Mr. Shchekochikhin had been investigating tax-evasion allegations against two Moscow furniture stores with links to senior figures in Russia's security services. In June, he was admitted to the hospital with an "extreme allergic syndrome." Ten days later he was dead. To this day, authorities have refused to divulge details of the autopsy, designating them a "medical secret." Family and friends insist Mr. Shchekochikhin was poisoned.

Strange incidents continued to dog Novaya's staff, especially Ms. Politkovskaya. No longer just a reporter, she was emerging as a human-rights advocate, often volunteering to help ordinary Chechens whose relatives had gone missing. That earned her enemies in Russia's security apparatus, according to colleagues. In the fall of 2004, she became violently ill and had to be hospitalized after drinking tea on a plane to southern Russia, where she was traveling to cover the Beslan hostage crisis. She claimed she had been poisoned.

Then in October this year, Ms. Politkovskaya was shot dead in the elevator of her apartment building. Before her death, she had been investigating cases of torture allegedly committed by the pro-Kremlin authorities in Chechnya.

The death reverberated around the world. Ms. Politkovskaya, 48, was the 13th reporter to be slain in a contract-style killing since Mr. Putin came to power in 2000, according to the New York-based Committee to Protect Journalists.

At this time, the last remnants of Russia's free press were being scooped up by Kremlin-friendly business groups. Gazprom bought Izvestia and later Komsomolskaya Pravda. A steel magnate loyal to Mr. Putin acquired Kommersant, one of Russia's last big independent newspapers.

Novaya, too, realized it couldn't go on as before. By June of this year, reporters hadn't been paid for two months, and free-lancers for a year. The paper owed $430,000 to its printer. In June, Mr. Muratov persuaded the staff to sell a 49% stake in the paper to its old friends Mikhail Gorbachev and Mr. Lebedev, the banker.

Mr. Lebedev says that in an exchange for a pledge from Novaya not to publish paid articles, he agreed to invest $3.6 million in the paper by the end of next year and to pay $1.5 million in bonuses to its staff of 170. The money will help Novaya raise wages, upgrade facilities, publish five times a week instead of twice and create a new Web site.

A suave, elegantly dressed tycoon, Mr. Lebedev says he bought Novaya because he liked its oppositional tone. "They're the only ones who stick to the principle that a newspaper's job is not just to report the news but to criticize the bureaucracy," he says.

His arrival at the paper was controversial. Some journalists there wonder why Mr. Lebedev -- a member of the pro-Kremlin United Russia party and, like Mr. Putin, a former KGB spy -- wants a paper that's so disparaging of the president. When Mr. Lebedev dropped in at the newsroom this summer, one reporter said the journalists felt intimidated by the businessman's habit of publishing letters in the paper criticizing articles he disliked.

Mr. Lebedev reassured reporters he shared their core democratic values and would not interfere in editorial policy. But in October, when a fiercely anti-Western opinion piece he submitted was substantially cut, he complained in his blog that the editing was "insolent."

With the protection of Mr. Gorbachev, a figure still much admired in the West and respected by Mr. Putin, observers say there's little likelihood Novaya Gazeta will be shut down. But for some of the staff, the newspaper faces an even worse fate: irrelevance.

Novaya's stories could once cause a stir, prompting parliamentary hearings and even high-level resignations. They hardly ever do now. Reporters continue to turn out hard-hitting exposés, but they have little reach. With three of its most prominent journalists dead, national circulation stagnant at only 172,000 -- compared to more than two million for its old rival, Komsomolskaya Pravda -- and the rest of the independent press moribund or dead, Novaya risks a slow decline into oblivion.

Tired of politics, Russians increasingly want lighthearted stories and more reporting on celebrities -- the kind of news Novaya's journalists disdain, although the paper does have plenty of sports coverage and a television guide. Mr. Pankin, the former Izvestia op-ed editor, says that in a country where Mr. Putin regularly scores approval ratings of over 70%, there simply aren't that many people who want to read every day about their leader's flaws.

It was a point Mr. Putin made in commenting on Anna Politkovskaya's slaying. "Her influence on Russia's political life was minimal," he said.

Says Roman Shleinov, the paper's chief investigative reporter: "Even if we were to publish pictures of Putin receiving suitcases of money at the Kremlin door, no one would care."

The Persistently Poor (WP)

By Peter S. Goodman

The Washington Post, December 8, 2006

NEW YORK, Dec. 7 -- Despite an intensified campaign against poverty, World Bank programs have failed to lift incomes in many poor countries over the past decade, leaving tens of millions of people suffering stagnating or declining living standards, according to a report released Thursday by the bank's autonomous assessment arm.

Among 25 poor countries probed in detail by the bank's Independent Evaluation Group, only 11 experienced reductions in poverty from the mid-1990s to the early 2000s, while 14 had the same or worsening rates over that term. The group said the sample was representative of the global picture.

"Achievement of sustained increases in per capita income, essential for poverty reduction, continues to elude a considerable number of countries," the report declared, singling out programs aimed at the rural poor as particularly ineffective. Roughly half of such efforts from 2001 to 2005 "did not lead to satisfactory results." During that period, new World Bank loans and credits aimed directly at rural development totaled $9.6 billion, or about one-tenth of total bank lending, according to the group.

In a statement distributed with the report, World Bank management rejected its assessment as "overly bleak," arguing that the overall trend is improving in every region except Africa. Bank administrators noted that reducing poverty requires economic growth, something they said the world has been enjoying: Over the past two years, developing countries collectively grew by about 5 to 6 percent a year, excluding swiftly developing China and India. Even sub-Saharan Africa has grown by more than 4 percent annually over the past five years.

But the study found that growth has rarely been sustained, exposing the most vulnerable people -- the rural poor -- to volatile shifts in their economic fortunes. Per capita income rose continuously from 2000 to 2005 in only two in five of the countries that borrowed from the World Bank, the study reported, and it increased for the full decade, from 1995 to 2005, in only one in five.

The study emphasized that economic growth is, by itself, no fix: How the gains are distributed is just as important. In China, Romania, Sri Lanka and many Latin American countries, swiftly expanding economies have improved incomes for many, but the benefits have been limited by a simultaneous increase in economic inequality, putting most of the spoils into the hands of the rich and not enough into poor households, the study concluded.

In Georgia, the bank has helped foster growth by lending in support of the oil industry, but this has created few jobs and had a negligible impact on poverty, the study found. In Brazil, on the other hand, there has been little growth but significant advances against poverty because wealth has been distributed more evenly.

"For a sustained reduction in poverty over a period of time, it really pays to worry about both growth and distribution," said Vinod Thomas, director-general of the Independent Evaluation Group. "It has been a mistaken notion that you can grow first and worry about the distribution later."

Overall, from 1990 to 2002, the percentage of the world's people who subsist on less than $1 per day declined from 28 to 19, according to World Bank research. But officials with the evaluation group noted that much of the advance was registered in China, which has rejected many of the tenets of the development model advocated by the West and barely relied on the largesse of the World Bank.

"If you take out China, the numbers would be unfavorable," Thomas said. "The sheer numbers of people living under the $1-a-day definition of poverty has been stubbornly high." By the bank's reckoning, 1.1 billion people subsisted at that level in 2001.

Some of the report reads like an amalgam of the criticisms that have been leveled against the World Bank for years by outside activists. The report chides the bank for failing to help cushion poor people against price and currency liberalizations, for focusing on the fiscal sustainability of pension systems to the detriment of the poor and for promoting the privatization of power industries without thinking enough about wiring up the indigent.

It criticizes the bank for failing to tailor projects to local conditions and for sometimes attempting to accomplish more than national governments can handle. In Uganda, the bank assisted the government with an ambitious effort to increase school enrollments but failed to plan for sufficient teacher hiring or classroom construction. By last year, Uganda's schools had an average of 94 students per classroom, and each book was being shared by three pupils.

Critics of the bank used the report to claim vindication and call for change in the institution's policies -- in particular, loan conditions that sometimes force poor countries to slash spending on social services and reduce price controls on food. "At a certain point, you have to say, 'This is policy failure,' " said Mark Weisbrot, an economist and co-director of the Center for Economic and Policy Research, who has long argued that the bank's emphasis on austerity and privatization has increased poverty.

World Bank administrators said it would be simplistic to view rising poverty rates as a sign that their projects do not work, noting that the worst-off borrowing countries are grappling with war, famine and natural catastrophes.

"There's a lot that has to go right for country-wide incomes to improve other than just good projects financed by the World Bank," said Vikram Nehru, director of the bank's economic policy and debt department. "These countries are in very difficult circumstances."

Still, Nehru said the bank could benefit from greater consideration of what is actually possible in any given country.

"We need to be much more sober in our assessments," he said.

U.N. To Renovate Secretary General's Residence (WP)

By Colum Lynch

The Washington Post, December 8, 2006

UNITED NATIONS, Dec. 7 -- After stalling efforts to renovate the United Nations' Manhattan headquarters, the Bush administration joined other U.N. members this week in approving $4.9 million to work on incoming Secretary General Ban Ki Moon's East Side residence, including a new $2.1 million central heating and air-conditioning system and a $200,000 kitchen upgrade.

The decision by the U.N. General Assembly's chief budget committee comes as the United States and other member nations are pressing Ban to assign high-level jobs to their nominees. The renovation is necessary because the 85-year-old neo-Georgian townhouse is plagued by power outages, leaky plumbing, an unsafe elevator and an obsolete kitchen exhaust system that poses a "potential fire hazard," according to a U.N. report.

"It does need refurbishing," said Kofi Annan, who will leave the Sutton Place house after his 10-year term ends at the end of the month. Although the house, built in 1921, has not had a major renovation since 1950, he said, "I'm happy that they did not do that to me and I didn't have to spend a year or so in a hotel."

The 14,000-square-foot residence on the East River was built for Anne Morgan, the daughter of the New York financier J.P. Morgan. The United States rejected the site as a possible residence for its ambassador to the world body, instead setting up a residence for the top U.S. diplomat in a penthouse apartment at the Waldorf-Astoria Towers.

DOJ_NMG_0104061

The Sutton Place residence was donated to the United Nations in 1972 and has housed every U.N. secretary general since Kurt Waldheim. It has served as a meeting place for scores of kings, presidents, prime ministers and foreign ministers.

Ban will be housed in a hotel for at least nine months as workers rip out antiquated air-conditioning, plumbing and electrical systems that require $60,000 and 1,100 hours to repair each year. They will spend $650,000 on a new security system and another $100,000 to renovate two small bathrooms in the entryway.

While U.N. delegates acknowledge the renovation is costly, they say it is essential for the world's top diplomat to entertain other leaders in style -- though some noted that the home's main reception areas show few signs of the wear and tear described in the U.N. report. "It's a very nice place," said Pakistan's U.N. ambassador, Munir Akram.

"I do not call it dilapidated," said Japan's ambassador, Kenzo Oshima, whose government recently poured tens of millions of dollars into renovating a new residence for its top envoy. But he said he agrees it is time for an overhaul. "My own residence looks fine from the outside, but inside there are lots of things -- water, piping, air conditioning, a lot of problems."

The Iraqi government, meanwhile, has appealed to Annan to transfer $40 million in U.N.-controlled Iraqi funds to upgrade its Upper East Side residence and mission and to build a new mission near U.N. headquarters. The new U.S. mission being built across from the United Nations will cost $50 million to $60 million, according to U.S. government estimates.

Iraqi Foreign Minster Hoshyar Zebari appealed to Annan last month to shift the funds from a $113 million account controlled by the U.N. weapons inspection team, which has not been allowed into Iraq since the U.S.-led invasion in 2003. "Iraq plans to purchase a new building close to United Nations headquarters to serve as the permanent mission to the United Nations," he wrote. "It also plans to perform major renovations on the mission's current building and the residence of the permanent representative, which has been neglected for over ten years."

The Security Council's sole Arab member government, Qatar, proposed that the council authorize the transfer of funds. Britain, however, asked that the council be given more time to consider the request. But Britain's ambassador, Emyr Jones Parry, said he did not question Iraq's need for a new mission.

"How much do you need for new building? I just don't know," he said. "Have you been in their present building? I've been there lots of times. They do need a new one."

Mr. ChÃ¡vez's Victory (WP)

The Washington Post, December 8, 2006

HUGO CHÃVEZ'S victory in Venezuela's presidential election Sunday was unsurprising, given the campaign that led up to it. The would-be "Bolivarian" revolutionary flooded the country with petrodollars in the months before the vote, decreeing a pay bonus for all government workers. He dominated the media, receiving by one count 22 times as much airtime as his opponent. He also freely employed intimidation, endorsing a declaration by the director of the powerful state oil company that its 40,000 workers would be mobilized for the president and that anyone who opposed this would be guilty of "a crime." Such tactics, along with the fact that many people who signed petitions in a campaign to recall Mr. ChÃ¡vez two years ago have been subject to government sanctions, clearly had an effect: A poll conducted for the Associated Press showed that 57 percent of Venezuelans believed that voters who did not support the president might suffer from retaliation.

The real news of the election was the reappearance of a credible Venezuelan opposition. Manuel Rosales, a state governor, managed to unite the anti-ChÃ¡vez forces and energetically barnstormed the country, drawing hundreds of thousands to rallies in Caracas. In the end he received 38 percent in the official count, preventing Mr. ChÃ¡vez from getting anywhere close to the 10 million votes he set as his goal. On Sunday night Mr. Rosales formally conceded -- an important signal for an opposition that too often has resorted to self-destructive boycotts or other anti-democratic tactics. Though Mr. ChÃ¡vez controls the judiciary and every seat in the national legislature, Mr. Rosales is now positioned to represent the millions of Venezuelans who oppose the president's drive to monopolize power.

A strong opposition will be needed. Mr. ChÃ¡vez has announced plans to follow his reelection by removing the constitutional barrier that would limit his tenure to six more years. He has also threatened to shut down private television stations sympathetic to the opposition, and his congressional followers say they plan to give him far-reaching decree power, so that he can personally order the seizure of private property. For those who trust that political pluralism will remain intact, Mr. ChÃ¡vez had a message. "There is no room in Venezuela for any project other than the Bolivarian revolution," he declared last week.

In fact, Mr. ChÃ¡vez's rule contains the seeds of its own destruction. His wild use of oil revenue -- government spending has grown eightfold during his eight years in office -- has gone mainly for consumption or foolish foreign adventures. Investment in the economy, and even in the oil industry itself, is paltry, and most experts believe Venezuela's petroleum production has declined. Crime and corruption are soaring: Murders are up 67 percent during the ChÃ¡vez era. If oil prices continue to drop, Mr. ChÃ¡vez's revolution eventually will be revealed for what it is: a populist fraud.

The Best Election Money Could Buy (WSJ)

By Mary Anastasia O'Grady

The Wall Street Journal, December 8, 2006

CARACAS -- As midday Mass at the Cathedral on Plaza Bolivar drew to a close on Sunday, the celebrant issued a plea for peace: The winner of the presidential election must be respected, he told the congregation, but so too the loser, who is also a Venezuelan in this land blessed by God.

I gazed at the crucifix behind the altar and pondered the admonition. It was only 1 p.m., far too early to call a winner in the race between President Hugo Chávez and the challenger, Zulia Governor Manuel Rosales. But the Church was already signaling concern -- as it has been for the past eight years under the Chávez government -- about the end of tolerance in a nation that is supposed to be a democracy. There was good reason.

The words from the pulpit echoed in my mind that evening, when some 20 loudly rumbling motorcycles passed in front of the car in which I was riding near Plaza Altimira, where anti-Chávez Venezuelans have been known to gather. Each bike carried two helmeted men in military garb, armed with riot shields and long rifles.

It was nearly 6:30 p.m. and darkness had fallen. I remembered that Chávez supporters had more than once shot and killed unarmed civilians with impunity and I thought about heading back to my hotel. But I wanted to see whether the opposition would rally on its own turf. So I continued around the square. What I saw next was truly frightening.

The flowers growing in the plaza were drooping under a tropical shower as members of Mr. Chávez's feared National Guard poured out of a military vehicle on one side of the street and armies of informal government enforcers known as chavistas gathered on the other. A red truck was blaring revolutionary music. A bus carrying about 10 chavistas, their heads wrapped in the signature red of the Chávez campaign, drove menacingly up and down the street. It honked its horn and pulled wild U-turns as its passengers, at least one of whom was naked from the waist up, leaned out the door and windows pumping their fists and shouting angrily into the evening air.

Mr. Chávez's metropolitan police and the military ignored their lawlessness. A 23-year-old woman driving past the plaza later that night says she was set upon by chavistas wielding baseball bats and that her car windows were smashed. I wondered why, if the president had won re-election, he needed to turn his goons on the civilian population.

I never believed that Fidel Castro's Venezuelan "mini-me" would be defeated on Sunday even though there is scant evidence that a majority of Venezuelans back his socialist revolution. Instead, I expected that a Chávez victory could be had "legally" through a combination of coercion, manipulation and the liberal use of state funds.

This seems to be what happened. The National Electoral Council (CNE) says that Mr. Chávez got about 61% of the vote versus 37% for Mr. Rosales; no one in the opposition is challenging his victory. Nevertheless, it is difficult to judge the race fair.

Among the irrefutable complaints from the independent electoral watchdog group known as Súmate (literally "Join Up") is the charge that the government would not allow an independent and reliable audit of the electoral registry; in the two years and three months since the recall referendum, voter rolls grew more than 30%. This left a lot of Venezuelans wondering who these new voters were but the government refused to release the full registry (including addresses) or post local lists at polling stations, as required by law.

Economic intimidation also played a role. It may be true that the poorest voted heavily Chávez. I don't know. But one economic step up from the most destitute, I have found palpable distrust of this president. In the struggling municipality called Caricuao, 30 tiny medical clinics and a number of larger ones have opened in the past year. I visited three clinics there on Monday, all of which are staffed by Cubans and decorated with anti-American propaganda. Yet this huge state effort to ideologically capture a barrio seems to have delivered only mediocre results.

A local woman I interviewed told me that her neighborhood was politically divided. Many dislike Mr. Chávez greatly, she said, but believed that the electronic voting machines and the fingerprint tracking machines at the polls would allow the government to know how they voted and that they would lose their government jobs if they went against him. Such fears are not irrational. It is well documented that the government has created enemies lists and fires dissidents.

Perhaps the working poor dismiss Mr. Chávez because they see so many apparatchiks getting fat off corruption while they get only crumbs. A new report by former Venezuelan oil company director Gustavo Coronel, published by the Cato Institute's Center for Global Liberty and Prosperity, finds that during the past eight years government oil revenues and revenue from issuing new debt total at least $175 billion and that this windfall has been accompanied by a sharp drop in transparency. "For example," Mr. Coronel writes, "the state-owned oil company ceased publishing its consolidated annual financial statements in 2003, and Chávez has created new state-run financial institutions, whose operations are also opaque, that spend funds at the discretion of the executive."

DOJ_NMG_0104063

Unaccounted for state funds could have been used to finance Mr. Chávez's re-election in more than one way. According to Goldman Sachs emerging-market analyst Alberto Ramos, "if you include imports, car sales are expected to almost double this year to about 300,000, many of them luxury models." If you have the right politics, you too might join the fun.

Yet trouble is looming as expectations rise and delivering on promises becomes more difficult. Mr. Ramos notes that "serious macro imbalances are emerging in the economy," including "accelerating inflation, sharply depreciated black market exchange rate. . . and the gradual atrophy of the non-oil sector." It is worth worrying about what Mr. Chávez will do to maintain power when the money runs out. The Church may have some reasonable fears.

Scot Free (WSJ)

By Quentin Letts

The Wall Street Journal, December 8, 2006

LONDON -- Back in 1707 the neighboring kingdoms of England and Scotland swallowed their historical differences and agreed to create the United Kingdom. Three-hundred years on a majority of Britons seem to want to undo it all.

Scottish independence is suddenly on the political radar. At present it is only a faint blip but if it becomes more serious the U.S. could find one of its more reliable allies suddenly looking distinctly bifurcated. If Scotland and England go their separate ways the British would probably disappear as international diplomatic players.

In medieval times the English and the Scots had little time for each other. Occasionally we English would send an army north of the border to beat up a few of the hairy-kneed, kilt-wearing "Jocks." The chief hazard in these engagements, apart from being gored by a skean-dhu dagger, was the terrible, blood-curdling skirl of Scottish bagpipes, as fiendish a noise as man has ever contrived to fashion. In retaliation the Scots, most of whom had remained loyal to the pope when Henry VIII spurned Roman Catholicism, would from time to time engage in a little light sedition against the Protestant Crown of England. Scotland's long-fingered lochs and heather-clad Highlands were good places to conceal papist pretenders to the English throne.

The Act of Union was meant to put a stop to all that -- and for about 275 years, it did. The United Kingdom was a success. Scottish probity, discipline and scientific know-how combined with English brute force to create the British Empire. Scots Highland Regiments became a valued part of the British Army. English money flowed northwards to make Edinburgh and Glasgow two of the greatest cities of 19th-century Europe. The Scots sent representatives down to Parliament in London, but they felt no sense of grievance or loss of self-esteem. Indeed, they played the political game well and bagged more than their share of Britain's public money. A few bad habits formed. The Scots, once notorious for their financial parsimony, became slightly hooked on welfare.

Football always showed that the "auld enemies" had never quite become one country. When England's soccer team loses no one celebrates quite as hard as the Scottish. Even so, things might have bumbled along in an amiable manner had it not been for Margaret Thatcher's election as British Prime Minister in 1979. Mrs. T had many qualities but diplomatic "sensitivity" was not among them. Scottish voters, wary of her anti-welfare instincts, detected a threat.

When Tony Blair became prime minister in 1997 his Labour Party agreed to give Scotland its own parliament. The place has limited powers, has cost a fortune and is full of monumental windbags, but it has become a symbol, an assertion, of renewed Scottish nationalism. This was also boosted in 1995 by "Braveheart," Hollywood's ludicrously romanticized film about 14th-century Scots fighting the wicked English.

Next May Scottish voters face elections in which Mr. Blair's Labour may be run close by, or even lose to, the left-wing, anti-American, pro-independence Scottish Nationalist Party. Alongside this prospect comes an opinion poll published by the Sunday Telegraph that found 52% of Scots now want independence. More surprisingly, 59% of the English would be happy to see the Scots go; and some 69% also seem to want a separate parliament of their own. In other words, significant numbers of British voters no longer care about "the union."

On one level this can be dismissed as neighborly peevishness run out of control, of Caledonian chest-beaters trying to build a separate state on little more than national machismo. However, when Mr. Blair steps down next summer, he is almost certain to be replaced by Gordon Brown, at present his finance minister. Mr. Brown is a Scot. Many of his friends and allies are, too. In this climate it is not too hard to see the greater danger -- English nationalism -- rising up and breaking the historical union which was created three action-packed centuries ago.

Mr. Letts writes for London's Daily Mail.

Blood, Toil, Tears And Nukes (NYT)

The New York Times, December 8, 2006

When Tony Blair asked Parliament this week to approve a new generation of nuclear-armed submarines, he was asking the lawmakers to reaffirm Britain as a nuclear power far into the 21st century.

DOJ_NMG_0104064

The prime minister argued that Britain needs its nuclear weapons to deter new threats from terrorists and rogue states. But we suspect that what is really driving Mr. Blair and his military planners is concern about old threats: the thousands of nuclear weapons still in Russia's arsenal and the hundreds in China's. The fact that France is holding on to its nukes — and its seat at the table of "world powers" — is likely encouraging him as well.

Frankly, we would like to see more from Mr. Blair, who has shown a flair for defining new-think issues, as he did with his government's global-warming report and its call to reduce poverty.

Mr. Blair could burnish that legacy if he challenged all the world's nuclear powers to reduce their arsenals. To soothe critics in his party, Mr. Blair also said this week that Britain would reduce its small arsenal from fewer than 200 operational warheads to fewer than 160. He should challenge others to follow.

Deep cuts — leading to zero — is what all the original nuclear powers pledged when they signed the Nuclear Nonproliferation Treaty. But that effort has stalled. Russia and the United States — with the world's two largest arsenals — agreed in 2002 to cut down to some 2,000 deployed warheads. But there have been no negotiations since.

The major powers would have a far stronger case for their calls to restrain the nuclear ambitions of countries like Iran and North Korea if they showed they were willing to reduce their own arsenals. That is the stuff that legacies are made of.

Suit by Iraqis and Afghans claims Rumsfeld ordered torture; The Justice Department has asked the judge to throw out the ACLU-supported case against the former defense secretary.

By Warren Richey | Staff writer of The Christian Science Monitor

WASHINGTON

As Donald Rumsfeld prepares to leave his job as secretary of Defense, the American Civil Liberties Union (ACLU) is seeking to hold him responsible for what it says was widespread torture carried out at his direction. [Editor's Note: The original version was changed because the American Civil Liberties Union says its civil suit is not intended to prove a war crime.]

Lawyers representing Mr. Rumsfeld and three US Army commanders are set to appear in federal court here Friday in response to a lawsuit charging that the Defense secretary authorized torture and other illegal abuse of military detainees in Afghanistan and Iraq - including at the infamous Abu Ghraib prison.

The case is important because it represents an attempt to hold US officials accountable for alleged illegal abuse of Iraqi and Afghan civilians who were never detained as enemy combatants or charged with any crime. But some legal analysts say the suit may be aimed more at shaping public opinion than winning in court because such cases are difficult to pursue.

The Justice Department lawyers representing Rumsfeld have not responded directly to the torture charges. Instead, they are asking Chief US District Court Judge Thomas Hogan to throw the suit out because Rumsfeld is entitled to immunity from lawsuits challenging his official actions as Defense secretary. Chief Judge Hogan has scheduled two hours of argument on the dismissal request.

The five Iraqi citizens and four Afghan citizens identified in the suit claim that they were subject to beatings, cutting with knives, sexual humiliation, confinement in a wooden box, sleep deprivation, mock executions, and stress positions, the suit says.

"The secretary of Defense personally issued orders and authorized illegal interrogation techniques and caused torture," says ACLU lawyer Lucas Guttentag. "[Rumsfeld] was directly and personally involved."

Mr. Guttentag says that Rumsfeld also "failed to take the required actions to stop abuse in the face of overwhelming uncontroverted evidence that he received and was aware of."

The Defense secretary had been notified of the abuses via Red Cross reports, human rights organization reports, military internal reports, and FBI reports, according to documents obtained by the ACLU under the Freedom of Information Act, Guttentag says.

In addition to Rumsfeld, the suit names Lt. Gen. Ricardo Sanchez, commander of coalition forces in Iraq in 2003 and 2004, Col. Janis Karpinski, commander of the military unit that ran detention facilities in Iraq, and Col. Thomas Pappas, commander of the military unit that gathered intelligence in Iraq.

The civil suit was filed by lawyers with the ACLU and Human Rights First. It says Rumsfeld and the officers violated constitutional protections, international law, and the Geneva Conventions. The suit seeks compensatory damages and a judicial declaration that the legal rights of the detainees were violated under the Constitution, the Geneva accords, and other international law.

Government lawyers counter that Iraqi and Afghan citizens do not enjoy rights under the US Constitution or the Geneva Conventions to sue senior US officials for official actions taken overseas.

"I think it is a very uphill battle for the litigants here. I don't think this case is going to go very far," says Scott Silliman, a Duke University law professor and director of the Center on Law, Ethics and National Security.

"When you are dealing with the secretary of Defense what you have got to do is show that he was so far outside the scope of his duties as to be culpable," Professor Silliman says. "That is a hard standard to meet."

What makes it a particularly hard standard, Silliman and other legal analysts say, is that Rumsfeld was authorizing new interrogation techniques at the same time Justice Department lawyers were issuing legal memos justifying harsh, coercive interrogation tactics.

To prevail, ACLU lawyers must show that Rumsfeld knew what the law required and intentionally ignored those clearly established requirements. Short of that, Rumsfeld is entitled to immunity, says Richard Samp, a national security and constitutional law expert at the Washington Legal Foundation. "I've seen no document that says 'I hereby command you to inflict the following torture on individuals.' "

Others say immunity is not warranted in Rumsfeld's case. "Accountability, not immunity, for the conduct of military personnel within defendants' command is fundamental to military law, discipline and the law of war," writes Sidney Rosdeitcher in a friend-of-the-court brief filed on behalf of a group of military law experts.

Although allegations in the suit are the equivalent of war crimes, it is a civil case, not a criminal one. Only the US government is empowered to prosecute war crimes in criminal court or before a military court. Various commissions identified command-level problems as contributing to interrogation abuses, but government prosecution has focused on punishing "rogue individuals."

Rumsfeld Wants Torture Case Dismissed

By MATT APUZZO

Associated Press Writer

WASHINGTON (AP) -- Outgoing Defense Secretary Donald H. Rumsfeld is asking a federal judge to dismiss a lawsuit that would hold him personally responsible for allegations of torture in oversees military prisons.

The lawsuit, filed by two civil rights groups, describes the imprisonment of nine foreigners detained in Iraq and Afghanistan. The lawsuit contends the men were beaten, suspended upside down from the ceiling by chains, urinated on, shocked, sexually humiliated, burned, locked inside boxes and subjected to mock executions.

President Bush has called the abuse of prisoners at Abu Ghraib prison in Iraq the biggest mistake of the war.

Attorneys for the American Civil Liberties Union and Human Rights First say Rumsfeld and top military officials authorized such abuses and should be held liable in federal court.

The Justice Department argues that Rumsfeld cannot be sued. Government officials are generally immune from lawsuits related to their jobs unless they violate a constitutional right.

A hearing before U.S. District Judge Thomas F. Hogan, set for Friday, will focus on whether Rumsfeld has official immunity. Rumsfeld, who has announced his resignation and will be replaced this month by Robert Gates, is not expected to attend.

The civil rights groups say Rumsfeld violated the prisoners' right of due process and to be free of cruel and unusual punishment. The government argues that foreigners held outside the United States do not have constitutional rights.

If the court lets the lawsuit continue, the Justice Department said, it would allow prisoners around the world to use U.S. courts to disrupt military operations.

"Subjecting military leaders to such personal tort liability could distract them from their duties, and the specter of captured aliens harassing military personnel with time-consuming individual capacity litigation could cause grave damage to military morale," the government wrote in briefs filed with the court.

PM unhappy with delay in charging Australian at Guantanamo Bay

By ROD McGUIRK

Associated Press Writer

CANBERRA, Australia_Prime Minister John Howard said Friday he was unhappy that an Australian terror suspect remained in U.S. custody at Guantanamo Bay in Cuba without charges.

But Howard said he was hopeful that David Hicks, an alleged Taliban fighter who was taken prisoner by the North Alliance in Afghanistan five years ago, will be charged by the Pentagon early next year.

Hicks, 31, had pleaded not guilty to charges of attempted murder, conspiracy to commit war crimes and aiding the enemy and had faced a preliminary hearing before a U.S. military commission.

But those charges were withdrawn when the U.S. Supreme Court ruled the military commissions were illegal in June. Congress has since passed laws to overhaul the military commission system.

On the eve of Hicks' fifth anniversary in custody, Howard said Friday his defense and foreign ministers would raise the delay with their U.S. counterparts when they attend annual bilateral ministerial talks in Washington next week.

"I'm not happy about it having taken so long and we are on a very regular basis pressing the Americans for a commitment that he be formally charged under the new military commission," Howard told Southern Cross Radio in the southern city of Melbourne.

Howard said he pressed the issue with U.S. President George W. Bush when they attended an Asia-Pacific leaders forum in Vietnam last month and Attorney General Philip Ruddock raised Hicks again with U.S. Attorney General Alberto Gonzales this week.

"We are very hopeful that there will be formal charges brought against him early in the New Year," Howard said.

"Five years is a long time and we want him tried under the new rules established after the Supreme Court decision," he added.

Howard's center-right coalition government is under mounting domestic political pressure to demand Hicks' repatriation. Howard argues that Hicks could not be charged in Australia because his alleged terrorist associations in Afghanistan did not breach Australian law of the time.

Hicks' Australian lawyers this week filed a lawsuit in the Federal Court calling on the government to press Washington for his release.

Howard blamed Hicks' appeals against the legality of the military commission for causing up to two years of the delay.

Hicks' lawyers plan to challenge the legality of the new commissions and predict another two-year delay before the U.S. Supreme Court determines that appeal.

The only other Australian held at Guantanamo, Mamdouh Habib, 50, flew home to Sydney last year at Australia's request after spending three years there without being charged.

Arar investigation not over, Day says; Public Safety Minister will seek officers who made mistakes; Tories may go outside force for new chief

TONDA MACCHARLES, OTTAWA BUREAU

OTTAWA—In moves to restore the reputation of the RCMP, the Conservative government says it might go outside the force for a new chief.

And it will extend or drop the time limits that are now written into the RCMP Act, so that disciplinary measures can be slapped on wrongdoers long after offences take place.

The day after Commissioner Giuliano Zaccardelli became the first casualty of the botched Maher Arar investigation — resigning voluntarily because he felt he had lost the "confidence" of Canadians and the government, Public Safety Minister Stockwell Day said he did "the honourable thing."

Day said frontline Mounties also "want wrong exposed, whether it's in organized crime or within their organization."

"I think we should have tough questions about the RCMP," said Day. He said the one-year limitation provision "unfortunately gives the appearance that people who may have done some wrong within the RCMP get off."

Asked if the changes would apply retroactively to any Mounties involved in the widely criticized Arar investigation, Day said he would be looking at that.

Arar, a dual Canadian-Syrian citizen, was detained on Sept. 26, 2002, during a stopover at New York's JFK airport as he was returning home after a vacation. He was held for two weeks in the United States, then flown on a private plane to Jordan and driven across the border to Syria where he was tortured and held for a year without charges.

Day said he would seek out the names of officers who made the errors that led to Arar's arrest and deportation to Syria by American officials. (Officers directly involved in the Arar investigation are named in the September report by Justice Dennis O'Connor that came out of his inquiry into the Arar affair.)

The limits on disciplinary action against RCMP members was a factor cited recently in stalled investigations into money channelled out of the RCMP's pension and insurance fund, and in a case of alleged sex with an underage prostitute.

Yesterday, Zaccardelli held an extraordinary news conference in which he cited poetry, became choked up over Mounties who had died on duty, and insisted he "had no regrets" about his tenure. He admitted making mistakes, but said he always made his decisions in the best interests of the force, so it would be up to history to judge him. He defended standing by his officers, who were criticized by the Arar inquiry, saying they did not believe, "rightly or wrongly," that they had made errors, and had acted in good faith.

Zaccardelli resigned Wednesday amid the controversy that followed his telling contradictory stories about when he learned of RCMP errors in the Arar case.

On Sept. 28, Zaccardelli told a Commons committee he learned at the outset of Arar's detention in Syria that the RCMP had made errors on the file, falsely labelling Arar an "Islamic extremist." That information had been transmitted to U.S. officials in the post-9/11 counter-terrorism frenzy, which O'Connor said likely led to the U.S. decision to ship Arar to Syria.

Zaccardelli also said the RCMP briefed its political bosses about those errors, something three of the ministers in charge of the force at the time contradicted him on publicly.

Then, on Tuesday, appearing before the same Commons committee under oath, Zaccardelli changed his story and said neither he nor senior RCMP officers knew that investigators had wrongly labelled Arar and his wife "Islamic terrorists" tied to Al Qaeda until this fall when they read O'Connor's inquiry report.

Zaccardelli insisted yesterday that his presentation Tuesday was "precise" and that, on Sept. 28, he had made a mistake.

"I may have made the mistake of inferring that I had 2006 information in 2002. I didn't have it, but I had a duty to correct that, to tell the truth."

Day yesterday portrayed the Conservative government as having ongoing concerns about the management of the force.

Day said the government would announce an interim RCMP commissioner "soon."

He also said the government might seek a replacement for Zaccardelli from outside the ranks of the RCMP.

"We're going to take a look at that," but formal criteria would be developed first.

Day added that he plans to announce before Christmas the name of the person who will investigate three other cases of Canadian Muslim men who came under the watch of the RCMP's counterterrorism team, and ended up in prison in Syria.

Day denied that there had been political interference with Zaccardelli, prior to his Sept. 28 testimony, his testimony this week, or after that testimony revealed, in Day's words, "glaring contradictions."

He said he learned of Zaccardelli's contradictory story on Monday when the commissioner previewed in a speech what he told the Commons committee the next day. He said he had not known until the past few days of a Nov. 2 letter Zaccardelli wrote to the committee advising it he would "clarify" his testimony.

But at his news conference, Zaccardelli said he had flagged his intentions early on to Day, through a written letter to Day's deputy minister, Suzanne Hurtubuise, and in a personal conversation with Day. In the Commons, the Liberals said Day should have fired Zaccardelli more than a month ago, when he learned of his planned reversal.

Prime Minister Stephen Harper said it would have been improper for the government to act sooner. "One can only imagine the howls of outrage from the opposition if the Prime Minister had politically intervened and fired the commissioner of the RCMP before he even testified at a parliamentary committee," said Harper.

Liberal MP Marlene Jennings (Notre-Dame-de-Grâce-Lachine) said the Tories, in Opposition, claimed repeatedly that Arar was a terrorist, words that were "heard by the Syrians."

Harper retorted that the Liberals "did not lift a finger, did not raise a voice to do anything about" Arar in prison.

Bill Graham, who was foreign affairs minister during Arar's detention in Syria, was incensed and accused the Conservatives of making false claims, and compared them to Nazi propagandist Joseph Goebbels.

"The government members in this House behave as if they were reading from a textbook written by Mr. Goebbels when he was preparing for power in Germany," Graham said.

Later he denied calling them Nazis, but insisted the Conservatives were using "unacceptable techniques I didn't say he was a Nazi. I said these are the types of techniques that have been used in the past and I think it's a shame."

The Conservatives reacted with indignation to the comparison with Nazis.

"I think that is reprehensible," said Tory House leader Rob Nicholson.

Court reserves decision on releasing files in decades-old murder case against Indian activist

The Associated Press

Attorneys for an American Indian activist convicted of killing two FBI agents in a shootout on a South Dakota reservation in 1975 took their fight to free the imprisoned man to a federal appeals court Thursday.

The attorneys for Leonard Peltier argued for the release of all FBI files related to the case, saying the documents should have been turned over to them at the time of the trial in 1977.

Peltier, 60, is serving two life sentences. He was a leader of the American Indian Movement in the 1970s, and his supporters have been trying to get his conviction overturned for years, saying he was wrongfully targeted because of his activism.

His attorneys hope the withheld information will lead to Peltier's exoneration.

But the court Thursday reserved decision on whether to overturn a federal court's ruling last February and order a full release of the files.

Unfettered release of the documents would compromise the confidentiality of witnesses, Justice Department attorney H. Thomas Byron III told the court. He said the witnesses were guaranteed confidentiality, either expressed or implied.

"The circumstances of this case make it clear that anyone who provided information would have reason to have concern for their well-being," Byron argued.

The FBI released 797 pages of material in 2004 but withheld other pages and redacted large portions of the released ones, citing exemptions allowed for national security concerns and to protect the identity of agents, witnesses, and informants.

Peltier's attorney, Michael Kuzma, claimed investigators coerced witnesses and withheld evidence in building a case against Peltier.

Kuzma said any ruling against Peltier would be appealed to the U.S. Supreme Court.

New judge assigned to Cobell trust fund case

The Cobell trust fund case was assigned a new judge by the federal court in Washington, D.C.

Judge James Robertson, a Clinton nominee, will be handling the 10-year-old case. He takes over from Judge Royce Lamberth, who was removed by an appeals court for appearing biased against the federal government.

Elouise Cobell, the lead plaintiff, welcomed the assignment. “We want to see this case resolved quickly," she said. "We will work in good faith with Judge Robertson to end this century-long injustice that the government has done to Native people."

The lawsuit seeks an accounting of billions of dollars owed to more than 500,000 Native Americans. Efforts to settle the case failed in Congress this year.

U.S. issues subpoena to HIV drug firm

Bernadette Tansey

Gilead Sciences Inc., a Foster City biotechnology company, said late Thursday it had received a subpoena from federal prosecutors in San Francisco requesting documents related to its marketing and medical education programs for two HIV drugs, Truvada and Viread.

"Gilead intends to comply with the U.S. attorney's subpoena and to cooperate in any related government investigation," the company said in a statement. A spokeswoman declined to comment further.

The U.S\l "l". attorney's office couldn't be reached for comment, and the nature of the investigation was not clear. In recent years, prosecutors have been cracking down on drug companies accused of deceptive marketing or violations of Food and Drug Administration rules that restrict the promotion of drugs for uses not approved by the agency.

In 2003, the FDA warned Gilead that its sales representatives were downplaying the risks and exaggerating the benefits of Viread. It was the second such warning issued to the company in just over a year.

Both state and federal prosecutors are investigating drugmakers for promotional practices that may have misrepresented the value of their products and needlessly increased expenditures by government-funded health plans. At the conclusion of one such investigation in 2004, Pfizer Inc. agreed to pay $430 million to settle claims that it promoted its anti-seizure drug Neurontin for a host of other diseases.

In the Bay Area, the government has cracked down on Brisbane-based Intermune Inc., which agreed in October to pay $36.9 million to settle claims by the U.S. attorney's office in San Francisco that it illegally marketed its drug Actimmune for a fatal lung disorder.

8-year quest for asylum in U.S. nears resolution

RULING MAY LOWER PROOF OF PERSECUTION

By Howard Mintz, Mercury News

The food court inside the Great Mall in Milpitas is a long way from home for Marjorie Lolong.

But as she fidgets at a table, the buzz of the mall overwhelming her soft voice, Lolong is right where she wants to be. The mall is a safe haven.

The very thought of home fills her eyes with tears.

Home for Lolong is Indonesia. But as a Chinese Catholic woman, Lolong is certain she will face violence, even death, if forced to return to the world's largest Muslim nation, where reprisals against Chinese Christians have long been part of the country's fabric. She has spent the past eight years in legal limbo wondering whether she will be forced back.

"Everything is a roller coaster," said the 36-year-old Lolong, who lives in San Jose.

Lolong's quest for political asylum\l "l" in the United States has thrust her into the middle of an immigration battle with national implications and prompted stiff resistance from the Bush administration, which wants her deported back to Indonesia.

Two years ago, a federal appeals court used Lolong's case to create a new category for asylum seekers in a ruling that found that, as a Chinese Christian woman, she would be "particularly at risk" of persecution if she returned to Indonesia. The ruling established the concept of asylum\l "l" for a member of a "disfavored group," and applied to the thousands of immigration cases heard each year throughout the West.

The Justice Department immediately asked the 9th U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals to reconsider the case with a special 15-judge panel, warning that the Lolong ruling would be "opening the floodgates to thousands -- if not millions -- of otherwise ineligible aliens."

Ruling due

Underscoring the importance of the case, the San Francisco-based 9th Circuit agreed to reconsider the matter and heard arguments in October. A ruling is expected any time -- and Lolong's future hangs in the balance.

"That is the anguish of asylum seekers," said Karen Musalo, director of Hastings College of the Law's Center for Gender and Refugee Studies. "To be up in limbo on whether they'll be sent back to a place they haven't been for years."

Lolong, the oldest of three children, came to the United States in 1994 to attend a women's college in Massachusetts. She planned to return to Indonesia after getting an education.

As an Asian woman, Lolong felt isolated. Accustomed to the heat back home, she hated the snow. A friend persuaded her to try San Francisco, where, in 1995, she enrolled at Golden Gate University. She studied marketing. From the eye-opening possibilities of charge cards to working at a McDonald's, she acclimated to life in the United States.

Then everything changed in 1998.

In the midst of political upheaval that toppled the Indonesian government, Lolong's native land experienced the worst anti-Chinese rioting in the country's history. More than a thousand ethnic Chinese were killed. Homes, churches and businesses were looted and burned. Chinese women were systematically raped, including a friend of Lolong's.

Lolong, who heard of the conflict in telephone calls back home and on television, decided to seek asylum after consulting with San Francisco immigration lawyer Robert Jobe.

"From my point of view, if you know you are going to a dangerous place, why would you go there?" Lolong said.

Her case then melted into the overburdened immigration system. She tried to go on with her life. She worked multiple jobs -- at Nordstrom, a hotel in Burlingame, Trader Joe's and even at a juvenile hall in San Bruno.

Meanwhile, an immigration judge initially ruled in Lolong's favor, concluding that she had a well-founded fear of persecution and should be granted asylum. But the Board of Immigration Appeals, the top branch of the immigration courts, overruled that decision, prompting her appeal to the 9th Circuit.

A Mercury News series last year found that the 9th Circuit has reversed the BIA in roughly two-thirds of the most important immigration cases since 2001 on the grounds of flawed reasoning in board decisions. The Lolong case was no exception -- a three-judge 9th Circuit panel sided with Lolong in 2004, citing Indonesia's history of violence against Chinese, particularly women.

Now the question is whether that decision will stand.

Threshold lowered

Tens of thousands of immigrants seek asylum\l "l" in the United States each year, and typically must show they would face persecution in their homelands based on race, religion, nationality or political opinion. The 2004 ruling in Lolong's case, by finding she was a member of a "disfavored group," effectively lowered the threshold.

In the past, courts required a showing of a "pattern and practice" of government-sanctioned persecution in other countries to gain asylum. The Lolong ruling said being in a "disfavored group," such as ethnic Chinese in Indonesia, was sufficient, even if the government officially promotes ethnic tolerance.

Justice Department lawyer Jonathan Cohn, who argued the government's position before the 9th Circuit, did not return a phone call seeking comment. But the government has argued that Lolong does not have a legitimate fear of persecution and has not shown that she personally would be at risk in Indonesia.

Among other things, the government notes that Lolong's family has not been harmed. And perhaps more significant, the Bush administration stresses that conditions in Indonesia have changed dramatically since 1998, with a new government ushering in a period of favorable treatment of the Chinese Christian minority.

"There is no pattern and practice of persecution of Chinese Christian women in Indonesia," Cohn told the judges in October.

Experts say Indonesia has, in fact, vastly improved for ethnic Chinese. Sidney Jones, project director for the International Crisis Group in Jakarta, said in an e-mail that "today there is almost no violence against the Chinese."

"The threat against Chinese Indonesians has dropped dramatically since 1998," said Jones, who has monitored ethnic violence there for years.

But that is little solace to Lolong, who says history is full of cycles of violence against Chinese Christians, who make up about 4 percent of Indonesia's 200 million citizens.

"The fact there is relative calm today," added Jobe, Lolong's lawyer, "doesn't mean you can go back and live a life free of persecution or harm."

For now, Lolong's hopes for asylum hinge mainly on conditions in Indonesia around the time she sought refuge from the immigration courts, in 1998. But the 9th Circuit could return her case to the immigration courts, where the case would begin anew and the government could introduce evidence of current conditions.

In the meantime, Lolong remains on that "roller coaster." She works for a medical clinic in Hayward, hoping to some day go into pediatrics. She has a boyfriend. She's grown fond of American movies, theater and opera.

"It's already a winning case for me," Lolong said. "Losing, I never thought of that. For me, you know you are doing something that is right. I just believe at the end, I just pray for something good to come from my hardship."

Congress signs off on comp time for Justice lawyers' travel

By Karen Rutzick

The Senate passed a bill Wednesday providing compensatory time off for Justice Department lawyers on business travel, following House approval of the measure in March.

Sponsored by Sen. Daniel Akaka, D-Hawaii, and passed unanimously, the bill provides Justice lawyers the same benefit as the rest of their white-collar counterparts in the federal government. The bill now goes to President Bush.

Congress initially granted civil servants comp time for travel as part of the 2004 Federal Workforce Flexibility Act. The Justice Department, however, determined that it lacked authority to grant lawyers the benefit because of limitations on their premium pay.

Richard Delonis, president of the National Association of Assistant United States Attorneys, which has lobbied Congress for two years to force Justice to change its rule, said the department's attorneys are being asked to spend more nights and weekends traveling.

"The comp time legislation passed by Congress sends an important message to these dedicated public servants, assuring that they do not bear an extra burden that Congress did not intend to impose," Delonis said.

On the House side, Reps. Jon Porter, R-Nev.; Tom Davis, R-Va.; Henry Waxman, D-Calif.; Danny Davis, D-Ill.; and Chris Van Hollen, D-Md., introduced the comp time bill (H.R. 4057) to correct the variation in benefits.

Agencies can award travel comp time when they are otherwise unable to compensate employees for time spent in transit outside of normal work hours. They are not allowed to give cash payments, but there is no limit on the amount of time off they can award.

The rules on travel comp time are complex. For example, time spent eating meals is not eligible. That includes meals eaten at an airport while waiting for a flight. The Office of Personnel Management considers this to be time that employees would have spent eating elsewhere.

In addition, regular commuting time is deducted from travel comp time. If employees travel to the airport from home in the morning, they must deduct the amount of time they normally spend commuting. But if employees travel from work to the airport, then that time is considered compensable.

By law, members of the Senior Executive Service, immigration judges and Federal Wage System employees in the Justice Department will remain ineligible for travel comp time.

TERRORISM NEWS:

Zuckerman Contends Children Of Immigrants Represent Terrorism Threat. U.S. News and World Report's Mortimer Zuckerman (12/18) writes, "Today all eyes are on Iraq. It's called the center of the war on terrorism, but it must not monopolize our attention. We need a third eye because we are now less likely to be attacked by international terrorists than by homegrown American citizens, self-radicalized individuals who are members of groups inspired by al Qaeda propaganda. … The threat is from second- and third-generation children of immigrants, fluent in English and accustomed to American society but using the legal rights of U.S. citizenship to rebel from within. They have learned the Koran on the Internet; they lead small clusters of 20 to 25 mostly young men who share feelings of alienation, a longing for self-importance, a need to be a part of some larger group or cause. They have developed what is called 'adversarial assimilation.'"

HOMELAND RESPONSE:

Imams Seek Out-Of-Court Settlement With US Airways. The Washington Times (12/11, Hudson, 88K) reports, "A group of Muslim imams is seeking an out-of-court settlement with US Airways, saying they should not have been removed from a Minnesota-to-Phoenix flight last month and were not behaving suspiciously. Five of the six Islamic religious leaders have retained the Council on American-Islamic Relations for legal representation and are seeking a 'mutually agreeable' resolution, said Nihad Awad, CAIR executive director. US Airways scheduled a meeting with the imams on Dec. 4 to discuss the incident, but the men canceled it and hired the activist group to act as legal counsel." The Times notes, "The imams and CAIR officials maintain that press reports as well as Internet sites and blogs have circulated charges they say misrepresent the facts of the Nov. 20 incident. … CAIR says the men were handcuffed for several hours and is also demanding hearings on religious and ethnic profiling at airports."

Governors Demand Congress Make Changes To Real ID Act. U.S. News and World Report (12/18, Marek, 2.03M) reports, "Back in May 2005, few really considered the broad implications of the Real ID Act, a bill designed to improve the security of driver's licenses in every state. Attached to an emergency funding measure for the Iraq war, Real ID slipped through Congress and was signed by the president-with little scrutiny but big effects. … These days Real ID is hard to miss, and the nation's governors are up in arms over it. In less than two years, it will require states to begin issuing upgraded driver's licenses to roughly 245 million Americans. Although most governors say they'd like to improve identification security, many say the Real ID Act creates a multibillion-dollar unfunded mandate and deadlines that are impossible to meet. It may also mean longer lines at Department of Motor Vehicles offices nationwide and new costs for consumers. Governors like Mike Huckabee of Arkansas hope the new Congress 'will throw us a lifeline' and make changes to Real ID."

Post-Katrina Hispanic Baby Boom Surprises New Orleans. The New York Times (12/11, Porter, 1.16M) reports that in the "latest twist to the demographic transformation of New Orleans since it was swamped by Hurricane Katrina last year, hundreds of babies are being born to Latino immigrant workers, both legal and illegal, who flocked to the city to toil on its reconstruction." The baby boom "has come as a big surprise — and a financial strain — to this historically black and white city, which before the hurricane had only a small Latino community and virtually no experience of illegal immigration."

WAR NEWS:

Baker, Hamilton Downplay Differences With Bush As They Defend ISG Report. Iraq Study Group co-chairs James Baker and Lee Hamilton appeared on the Sunday political talk shows to defend the report they issued last week and to downplay their differences with the White House. Senators appearing on the shows were largely open to the ISG recommendations.

The Washington Post (12/11, A15, Abramowitz, 690K) says Baker "said for the first time yesterday that the Iraq Study Group remains committed to democracy in Iraq," as he and Hamilton "offered conciliatory words to a Bush administration that has reacted coolly to the panel's key recommendations." Comments on Sunday "appeared part of an effort by Baker and Hamilton to use the Sunday talk shows to play down talk of rifts between the panel and the Bush administration." Baker said he "understands the administration's internal studies call for some of the things his panel urged." Baker also "sought to portray the panel's proposal for a more aggressive Middle East diplomatic effort as less ambitious than its critics have suggested."

DOJ_NMG_0104081

The two men appeared on four of the Sunday morning shows. On NBC's Meet the Press (12/10, Russert), Hamilton said that in Iraq "the violence is increasing…more American casualties; basic services of government not being delivered; neighborhoods falling apart; casualties going up. Everywhere you look, it's dire, it's grave, it is deteriorating. And, in a sense, the question is, can we stop the deterioration, not can we improve it." On that same program, Baker said, "All of our military leaders in Iraq and over here recognize that we're not going to win this war militarily. We're going to win it politically." On CNN's Late Edition (12/10, Blitzer), Baker said, "The whole future of Iraq depends upon whether or not the Iraqi government can effect a program of national reconciliation between Kurds, Shia and Sunni."

Bush Intends To "Chart Own Course." NBC Nightly News (12/10, story 3, 2:40, Seigenthaler, 9.87M) reported, "Following the Iraq Study Group report, the President will be getting more advice from his advisors about his options in Iraq." NBC (Ohm) added, "At the same time the President embraces the Iraq Study Group's call for a new way forward in Iraq, there is strong indication he plans to chart his own course relying on his advisors and military commanders. ... President Bush has already distanced himself from the commission's key recommendations, withdrawing combat troops by 2008 and talking directly with Syria and Iran. One scenario the Administration is considering, increasing the number of troops by 20,000. A move that was openly questioned by close ally British Prime Minister Tony Blair." ABC World News (12/10, story 2, 2:25, Harris, 8.78M) reported, "There are signs he may reject many of the recommendations from the Iraq Study Group, whose two principal players went on television repeatedly to defend their report."

Baker Emphasizes "Limited" Nature Of Proposed Talks With Iran And Syria. Regarding the ISG's recommendation that the US reach out to Iran and Syria, Baker said on Meet the Press, "One thing I want to make sure everybody understands…is the limited nature of what we are proposing. … With respect to Iran, we're suggesting doing nothing more than this administration did in connection with Afghanistan. … With respect to Syria, there's a whole long list ever things that we lay out in the report that we think Syria needs to do." On Fox News Sunday (12/10, Wallace), Baker reiterated that point: "These are very limited proposals."

Senators appearing on the Sunday programs were open to the idea of outreach to Tehran and Damascus. Sen. Carl Levin, on CBS' Face the Nation (12/03, Schieffer) said, "We should be very skeptical of Iran doing anything to be helpful to us -- for that matter, Syria being helpful either. We ought to talk to them without any great expectation that they're going to be helpful." Sen. Christopher Dodd said on Fox News Sunday, "We've got a very large agenda in that region, and I think you ought to engage and explore whether or not you can get cooperation on some critical issues. Don't make it conditioned on a bunch of things that aren't going to happen anyway." On that same show, Sen. Sam Brownback said President Bush "really should look at these recommendations very seriously. And it seems to me that what Baker-Hamilton provides us is a chance to kind of reset the table and get a bipartisan buy-in -- and not just a bipartisan buy-in, a global buy-in."

Baker Discusses 2008 Withdrawal Date. During his own Fox News Sunday appearance, Baker was asked how important it is that the US meet the goal of having most military forces out of Iraq by 2008. He replied, "We didn't put out a specific date that was not the Administration's own date. This is the date by which Gen. George Casey said the training and equipping mission would be completed." On CBS, Baker said, "Young American men and women should not be asked to have, as their primary mission there, refereeing a sectarian violence between the various sects in Iraq."

On ABC's This Week (12/10, Stephanopoulos), Sen. Joseph Biden said, "No one, no one, no one but the President and the Vice President is talking about if we're going to draw down American troops. Everyone is talking about how and when. That is a fundamental shift since November 6." Sen. Trent Lott said on CBS that the ISG "did good work. They've come up with some good ideas, and I think we ought to consider it carefully. ... And I also support the idea of milestones."

ISG Stresses "Stability" Over "Democracy." The Christian Science Monitor (12/11, Lafranchi, 59K) reports that President Bush and the ISG have "competing visions": The ISG "places a high priority on restarting the Israeli-Palestinian peace process and reenergizing America's role in it. Mr. Bush, who has never viewed that conflict as ripe for the kind of intense US diplomacy Mr. Baker had dedicated to it, continues to see success in Iraq as the demonstration project for peace and reform in the region." Bush "has not given up on the idea of a functioning democracy as the answer to Iraq's ills - indeed, Weekly Standard editor William Kristol has taken to calling him 'the last neocon.' In stark contrast, the study group's report emphasizes stability as the most pressing need, passing over goals of regional freedom and democracy."

ISG Faults US For Still Lacking Intelligence On Iraqi Foes. The New York Times (12/11, Risen, 1.16M) reports, "Nearly four years after the invasion of Iraq, the United States still does not understand the enemy that American troops are fighting according to last week's report by the Iraq Study Group. The commission's final report harshly criticized United States intelligence officials for failing to answer basic questions about the nature of the Sunni insurgency or the increasingly powerful Shiite militias." The intelligence community "has had some success hunting Al Qaeda in Iraq…but that terrorist organization is small and is not the main enemy confronting American troops." The ISG echoes "complaints quietly voiced in recent months by a number of current and former American officials, who have warned of the failure by American intelligence officers in Iraq to adequately penetrate the Sunni insurgency." It faults the DIA for rotating "its analysts from one posting to another so frequently that few develop any real depth of understanding of the insurgency" and the administration for failing "to significantly improve on-the-ground intelligence about the enemy" and for regularly underreporting "the level of violence in Iraq."

Smith Reiterates His Criticism Of Bush's Handling Of Iraq War. Sen. Gordon Smith, appearing on ABC's This Week, was asked what "triggered" his bluntly critical speech last week during which he called the administration's Iraq war policies "absurd" and potentially" criminal." Smith answered, "Waking up the other morning and turning on the news and hearing that yet another 10 of our soldiers died the same way that several thousand have…through roadside bombs. And I went from steamed to boiled."

More Commentary. In his Los Angeles Times (12/11, 850K) column, Niall Ferguson writes, "Most commentators have interpreted the report of the Iraq Study Group as a well-crafted admission of defeat. ... Yet anyone who bothers to read the report carefully…can see that it neither proposes 'quitting' Iraq nor pins serious hope on Iranian or Syrian assistance. Quite the reverse. ... Most readers of the report assume that it is directed at Bush. That is wrong. Its principal target audience is Congress," and the aim "is not to persuade a stubborn president to admit defeat. Rather, the report's aim is to convince legislators that withdrawal from Iraq -- no matter how much their constituents may yearn for it -- is not an option."

In his New York Times (12/11, 1.16M) column, Bob Herbert writes, "The primary value of the Baker-Hamilton report is that it embodies, in clear and explicit language, the consensus that has emerged in the U.S. about the current state of the war. It's not so much a blueprint for action as a recognition of reality. ... It is time to pull the troops out of harm's way."

In his Washington Post (12/11, A19, 690K) column, Jackson Diehl writes, "Some people suppose that President Bush's freedom agenda was buried last Wednesday by the report of the Iraq Study Group. In fact, history will show that the administration largely smothered its own baby, even before Iraq's descent into civil war propelled the resurrection of James Baker and other 'realist' friends of Middle Eastern dictators."

Bolten Said To Have Engineered Rumsfeld Ouster, Bush Response To ISG. Newsweek's Weston Kosova (12/18) reports that the "challenge" for the Bush administration following the release of the Iraq Study Group's report "was to make the president appear as though he were taking the release of the report seriously, without necessarily embracing its conclusions. … The change in Bush's approach had its beginnings well before the Baker group put pen to paper. It came about in part because of a slow, careful effort by Bush's closest aides — under the direction of chief of staff Josh Bolten — to convince the president that he had to listen to different voices on Iraq, and ultimately change direction." Kosova continues, "When Bolten took charge of the West Wing last April, he was one of the few people in the White House who were willing to admit that Iraq was broken and that the president was stuck. He worried that Bush had been hearing the same bad advice from the same people for nearly three years. Over the summer, Bolten began the first of his efforts to puncture Bush's bubble by having the president sit down with some of the harshest critics of the war — conservatives who had turned against the effort. … That was just the start. In the weeks before the Republicans lost Congress, while Karl Rove was predicting victory, Bolten tasked a small group of trusted aides to plan for electoral defeat and its aftermath. The first step was to fire the abrasive, out-of-touch Rumsfeld and replace him with straight-talking Robert Gates. The second was to ready a respectful response to the pending Baker-Hamilton report but to downplay its importance by stressing it is just one of several government reports on the war effort that Bush is reviewing."

ISG Report's "Patronizing" Advice Said To Have Engendered "Bitterness" In White House. Time (12/18, Duffy, Allen, 4.03M) reports, "despite all the fanfare, the report was aimed at an audience of one--Bush. For most of the week, he looked none too pleased about the round-the-clock talking-to he was getting. … Within a day, he was putting some distance between himself and the best seller: 'I don't think Jim Baker and Lee Hamilton expect us to accept every recommendation.' That comment reflected the West Wing's exceeding bitterness about the report. Some of the pushback was substantive. The suggestions on how to engage directly with Iran and Syria -- the parts resisted most unambiguously by the President -- were surprisingly specific and prescriptive, not the platitudes the Administration had expected. Bush aides chafed at the patronizing directive."

U.S. News and World Report (12/18, Whitelaw, 2.03M) reports, "It is unclear how many of the group's 79 recommendations President Bush will embrace-or even whether any changes in U.S. policy can have much effect on the ground in Iraq. … Perhaps most damning, the Iraq Study Group blasts the Bush administration for routinely undercounting the violence by, for instance, excluding sectarian attacks when the perpetrator cannot be determined. So while 93 attacks or violent incidents were recorded on one day last July, an Iraq Study Group review turned up 1,100 violent incidents that day."

U.S. News and World Report's Gloria Borger (12/18) writes, "At one point, Vernon Jordan, a skilled Washington insider, put it pretty bluntly to the president, according to a panel member's paraphrase: Jordan: 'What do you mean by victory? When my mama told me to clean the garage, I cleaned the garage because I knew what she meant. But I don't understand what you mean.' Bush: 'You have to speak to the American people with a simple message here. They understand what victory is, and if you come off of it, they'll think you're giving up.' Some members say they were stunned by the response. And when they left, they were puzzled by one more thing: During their entire session, Vice President Dick Cheney--a key architect of the war in Iraq -- never said a word. Not one."

Haass Contends US May Benefit From Lessons Learned From Iraq Experience. In an essay for Time (12/18, 4.03M), Richard Haass, president of the Council on Foreign Relations, writes, "ironically, the winding down of the U.S. involvement in Iraq will have a salutary effect--namely, it will slow the draw on American economic, diplomatic and military resources, all of which are in dire need of replenishment. In fact, U.S. diplomacy will in some ways be liberated as American involvement in Iraq recedes. The U.S. could, if it so chose, be an effective proponent for Arab-Israeli peace . If the U.S. and Iran prove able to cooperate over Iraq, they might manage broader talks on other issues that divide them, including Iran's nuclear program."

ISG Report Said To Expose Bush's "Shortcomings." Newsweek's Jonathan Alter (12/18) writes, "Beyond the headlines and major policy recommendations, the Iraq Study Group's mercifully readable report shows how President Bush's personal shortcomings manifest themselves in appalling miscues on the ground. … This is what happens when you have a president who is incurious and impatient with inconvenient facts he doesn't 'need to know': hundreds of thousands of dead Iraqis, nearly 3,000 dead Americans and what the Baker-Hamilton Commission estimates as a $2 trillion tab for our children."

ISG Goal For Embedded Advisors Called "Wildly Optimistic." Time (12/18, Kukis, 4.03M) reports, "There are now more than 4,000 U.S. soldiers serving as advisers to Iraqi security forces. If the recommendations made by the Iraq Study Group are put into practice, that number will grow substantially. The Baker commission's report calls for the number of U.S. troops embedded with Iraqi units to increase to as many as 20,000 over the next year. The report argues that boosting the number of advisers will lead to improvements in the quality of Iraqi forces and pave the way for a pullback of all U.S. troops from the front lines by 2008. But based on where Iraq's forces stand today, such a timetable is wildly optimistic. Iraq's 300,000-strong security forces -- in particular the national police, which is overseen by the Interior Ministry -- have been so thoroughly infiltrated by militias that some U.S. trainers will have to bring in new recruits and retrain much of the current batch before they can turn combat responsibilities over to the Iraqis. There are already concerns that by rushing to strengthen the Iraqis, U.S. forces may be ignoring abuses committed by the very people they're training."

Pentagon Has Been Training Officers To Act As Iraq Advisors Since July. Newsweek (12/18, Hirsh, Peraino, Childress, 3.12M) reports that "since July, 11-man squads of U.S. advisers have been going through a crash 60-day training program that is the core of America's effort to draw down its presence in Iraq. The idea: replace the 140,000-strong U.S. combat force there now with smaller, far less visible advisory teams. Embedding as many as 20,000 of these U.S. advisers with Iraqi Army and national police — a fourfold increase over current plans — is the key military recommendation of the Iraq Study Group report just released to thunderous attention. But the U.S. Army doesn't need any prodding. … As the Army ramps up the program, however, its many perils are becoming clearer. Most of the trainees are career U.S. military officers, many of them thirty- to forty something desk jockeys who are logistical wizards, intelligence specialists and administrators. They have all the expertise the Iraqi Army needs and more, but many have barely used their weapons since basic."

Strengthened Militias Likely To Continue Undermining Maliki Government. U.S. News and World Report (12/18, Mulrine, 2.03M) reports, "As the violence in Baghdad grows worse, the militias are gaining strength, in part by promising safety and services for Iraqis in desperate need of both-and by delivering retribution in the tit-for-tat cycle of sectarian attacks by Sunni insurgents and Shiite militias. In its report last week, the bipartisan Iraq Study Group stressed the corrosive effect of Shiite militia activities that 'undermine the authority of the Iraqi government and security forces, as well as the ability of Sunnis to join a peaceful political process.' Reining in the militias is just one of the hurdles to implementing the panel's prescriptions for national reconciliation. The committee's report raises doubts about the willingness and ability of Prime Minister Nouri al-Maliki even to confront the militia problem."

In an interview with U.S. News and World Report (12/18, Mulrine, 2.03M) Lt. Gen. Martin Dempsey, "the senior American commander in Iraq responsible for training and equipping Iraqi security forces," is quoted as saying, "militias exist when in the eyes of the people the standing government isn't providing something-and in this case that something would be security. So we've got to continue to demonstrate to the people by accelerated transition to legitimate Iraqi security force control-because the more the Iraqi government can be seen as being in charge, the more the people will gain confidence in them, and the better off we'll be in terms of dealing with the militias."

US Hopeful Tribal Leaders Can Subdue Insurgents In Anbar. Newsweek (12/18, Childress, 3.12M) reports, "No part of Iraq needs fixing more desperately than insurgency-ravaged Anbar province and its capital, Ramadi. And U.S. forces are increasingly sure it can't be fixed without the help of tribes who have always been more loyal to their sheiks than to the government. Before the 2003 invasion, Saddam Hussein had to buy the sheiks' support with wealth and special privileges, and Anbar's tribes fought fiercely long after he was gone. Then Al Qaeda muscled in, claiming the Sunni-dominated region and killing sheiks who dared to challenge the jihadists' aims. After one well-known tribal leader was assassinated this summer, a group of 15 Ramadi sheiks banded together for survival's sake. They called themselves Sawa — Arabic for 'the awakening' — and cut a deal with the Americans: in exchange for protection against Al Qaeda, they would bring local police ranks up to strength."

Talabani Says ISG Report "An Insult" To Iraqis. Iraqi President Jalal Talabani's strong reaction to the Iraq Study Group was covered by NBC and by several major newspapers. NBC Nightly News (12/10, lead story, 1:55, Maceda, 9.87M) said Talabani "called that report's recommendations an insult to the people of Iraq." Talabani: "I think that Baker and Hamilton is not fair and not just and it contains some very dangerous articles." Maceda: "The report also condemned by anti-US Shiite cleric, Moqtada al Sadr, who said it was designed to divide and finish Iraq. But sectarian violence seems to be doing just that as ethnic cleansing of minority Sunni and Shiite families from formerly mixed areas goes unchecked.

USA Today/AP (12/11, Gamel) reports Talabani continued his criticism of the ISG report, a day after he expressed agreement with Kurdish regional leader Massoud Barzani about the report's failings. Talabani said it "contained dangerous recommendations that would undermine his country's sovereignty and were 'an insult to the people of Iraq.'" Described as "one of the staunchest U.S. supporters within the Iraqi leadership," he nonetheless "also said U.S. training of Iraq's army and police had gone 'from failure to failure.'" The Washington Post (12/11, A15, Trejos, 690K) reports Talabani said the report "does not respect the will of the Iraqis in dealing with their problems." He was "particularly critical of recommendations to embed thousands of US troops with Iraqi security forces to train and advise them, to centralize control of the country's oil revenue and to allow former loyalists of deposed president Saddam Hussein back into their old government jobs."

The New York Times (12/11, A12, Semple, 1.16M) reports that Talabani's remarks "amounted to an extraordinarily harsh denunciation of a central American strategy in Iraq and challenged a major recommendation by the Iraq Study Group in Washington." The Los Angeles Times (12/11, Moore, 850K) reports that Talabani "accused the bipartisan U.S. commission of condescension and ignorance." Another recommendation he denounced was one "to postpone a Kurdish bid for control over the northern oil hub of Kirkuk." His remarks "could lend support to Bush administration critics of the commission findings and to some conservatives who have called the study a plan for capitulation."

Talks Underway To Replace Maliki. The AP (12/11, Hendawi, Abdul-Zahra) reports that "major partners" in Iraq's governing coalition are engaged in "behind-the-scenes talks" to oust Iraqi PM Nouri al-Maliki "amid discontent over his failure to quell raging violence," according to lawmakers involved. The talks are "aimed at forming a new parliamentary bloc that would seek to replace the current government and that would likely exclude supporters of the radical Shiite cleric Muqtada al-Sadr." Instead, the "new alliance would be led by senior Shiite politician Abdul-Aziz al-Hakim, who met with President Bush last week."

Rumsfeld Returns Home After Final Iraq Trip. ABC World News (12/10, lead story, 2:30, Harris, 8.78M) reported, "As the debate over what to do next in Iraq grinds on, one of the most polarizing figures in this conflict, outgoing Defense Secretary Donald Rumsfeld, made a final and surprise visit to the troops that are fighting the war that may very well define his legacy. … Rumsfeld's tumultuous tenure ends in eight days when his more reserved replacement, Robert Gates, takes over. From a man who has been blamed from everything to the Abu Ghraib prison abuse scandal to failing to have a plan to win the peace, this seemed to be an emotional trip coming face to face with soldiers carrying out a mission that he told the President isn't working."

NBC Nightly News (12/10, lead story, 1:55, Maceda, 9.87M) said Rumsfeld "paid his most secretive visit to Iraq and no doubt his last as Secretary of Defense. He said that he wanted to thank the troops posing with US Marines and soldiers at an air base in restive al Anbar province. He met with medevac units and fighter pilots, and at mission headquarters, he was defiantly on message that history would favorably judge him and the war."

US Trainers Work With Iraqi Army. NBC Nightly News (12/10, story 2, 2:10, Seigenthaler, 9.87M) reported on "what could be the main focus for American troops in the future." NBC (Arraf) added, "In eastern Baghdad morning comes early for American trainers with the Iraqi army. This could be the US exit strategy. Small groups of advisors embedded with Iraqi forces as large American units leave. But that exit runs through dangerous territory. They are scanning for the new roadside bombs, the kind that's killed a colonel and four other trainers in the past two weeks. ... This brigade proved it is capable of fighting on its own according to its trainers. But to be able to sustain itself, it has to be able to improve its ability to provide fuel and ammunition and treat its wounded. They say that could take up to a year."

Conflict Closes In On Iraqi Sunnis. The Washington Post (12/11, A1, Raghavan, 690K) reports, "In the past two months, Shiite militiamen have tightened their grip" on the "central Baghdad neighborhood of Tobji, purging dozens of Sunni families, by fear and by threats. ... So Farouk began preparing to do what neither his father nor his grandfather could have imagined in their Iraq: flee Tobji, an enclave where Shiites and Sunnis have coexisted for more than half a century. Farouk plans to join the more than 400,000 Iraqis who have fled their homes, an exodus that is reshaping the face of Baghdad into neighborhoods polarized along sectarian lines. ... Sunnis were once part of the country's privileged class, with government jobs, but their days and nights are now filled with fear and dread unlike anything they felt since the toppling of President Saddam Hussein."

Iraq Fails To Spend "Billions" In Oil Revenues. The New York Times (12/11, Glanz, 1.16M) reports, "Iraq is failing to spend billions of dollars of oil revenues that have been set aside to rebuild its damaged roads, schools and power stations and to repair refineries and pipelines. Iraqi ministries are spending as little as 15 percent of the 2006 capital budgets they received for the rebuilding ... In essence, the money is available -- despite extensive sabotage, the oil money is flowing -- but the Iraqi system has not been able to put it to work." Reasons include "large turnover in government personnel" and "a strange new one: bureaucrats are so fearful and confused by anticorruption measures put in place by the American and Iraqi governments that they are afraid to sign off on contracts."

"Christian Peacemaker" Ex-Hostages Urge Forgiveness. The Christian Science Monitor (12/11, Rice-Oxley, Murphy, 59K) reports, "Three pacifists who were held hostage for 118 days in Iraq and were released only after a fourth colleague was murdered, publicly forgave their captors Friday. ... the members of the Christian Peacemaker Teams (CPT) said they were reluctant to testify against four alleged captors in Iraqi custody because of the possibility that they will face harsh punishment, especially the death penalty." The three survivors "say they would be hypocrites if they gave in to the anger created by their ordeal, and participated in the traditional avenues of justice."

Taliban, Allies "Tighten Grip" In Northern Pakistan. The New York Times (12/11, A1, Gall, Khan, 1.16M) reports, "Islamic militants are using a recent peace deal with the government to consolidate their hold in northern Pakistan, vastly expanding their training of suicide bombers and other recruits and fortifying alliances with Al Qaeda and foreign fighters, diplomats and intelligence officials from several nations say. The result, they say, is virtually a Taliban mini-state" in which the militants are "openly flouting" the September accord "under which they agreed to end…help for the Taliban insurgency." Intelligence officials warn that the growing network "is potentially disastrous for efforts to combat terrorism as far away as Europe and the United States."

Afghanistan Is Cited As Lesson In Aligning US, Iranian Interests. The Wall Street Journal (12/11, A10, Solomon, 2.04M) reports, "As pressure mounts on the White House to engage Tehran over Iraq, Afghanistan offers an example of how U.S. and Iranian interests can constructively align in the Islamic world." Reportedly, "Tehran today is playing an important role in seeking to stabilize post-Taliban Afghanistan. The Iranian government has pledged $560 million in development aid to President Hamid Karzai's government since 2002, these officials say, roughly half of which has been disbursed." But "critics say Iran has largely acted out of self-interest in Afghanistan. They say Tehran's support for Mr. Karzai's government is in part aimed at ridding the country of Tehran's enemy, the Taliban Sunni militia, while seeking to usher in stable conditions that could hasten a U.S. withdrawal from Central Asia." The increased Iranian presence might include "a larger presence inside the country" of Iranian intelligence agents. The Journal states that Iran "has offered little indication that it would be willing, or even able, to play the same type of stabilizing role in Iraq that it has in Afghanistan. ... Still, current and former U.S. diplomats say, Iran may be cooperative in Iraq if Washington offers it a more direct role."

Army Running Short On Officers, Sergeants. In a 3,200-word story, the Wall Street Journal (12/11, Jaffe, 2.04M) says a "big strain on the Army is a shortage of people." While having had to lower recruiting standards, "the Army has found itself short of officers and sergeants. Today, it is down about 3,000 active-duty officers, a deficiency that it says will grow to about 3,700 in 2008." The officer and sergeant shortage "is felt even more acutely" upon deployment in Afghanistan and Iraq. The Journal adds that a generational gulf among officers "was clear last month in their reaction" to Secretary Donald Rumsfeld's dismissal: "Many senior officers quietly celebrated his departure," while "junior officers ... tended to view Mr. Rumsfeld as 'part of a larger problem that hasn't been solved yet.'"

CORPORATE SCANDALS:

Industries Eager To Hire Departing Committee Counsels. The Washington Post (12/11, D1, Birnbaum, 690K) writes, "As soon as Democrats take over Congress next month, all sorts of businesses will no doubt face sharp-elbowed congressional hearings called O & I -- oversight and investigations. And they'll need a strong defense. Luckily for corporate America, many of the people who formerly conducted those nasty and frequently televised inquiries have switched sides and are available for hire to the highest bidders. For the right fee, a company can retain a former chief counsel to almost any of the most marauding committees on Capitol Hill. … Two former aides to the House's Government Reform Committee are also forming a partnership partly in hopes of attracting clients who want to know how to defeat the kinds of investigations they once managed. Barbara J. Comstock and Mark Corallo are setting out on their new venture because, Comstock said, 'it helps to know the history of the committee, its subpoena power.'"

DOJ_NMG_0104087

CRIMINAL LAW:

Federal Death Penalty Cases Abound In Brooklyn Court. Long Island Newsday (12/11, Destefano) reports, "This is the season for the death penalty in Brooklyn federal court. … There have been no capital punishment trials in the federal court on Cadman Plaza East since 2003. But now three such cases are under way, and a fourth is expected to commence late next year. … 'It looks like death is rampant in Brooklyn,' said Ephraim Savitt, who is defending one of the cases involving Ronell Wilson, 24, who is charged with murdering two police officers." Newsday continues, "Monday, jurors will continue to hear testimony in Wilson's trial for the March 2003 murders of undercover detectives Rodney Andrews, 34, and James Nemorin, 36. … In another courtroom, the jury selection process is expected to finish in the case of accused drug racketeer and murderer Kenneth McGriff, 46, whose trial is slated for January." Newsday adds, "Next week, another jury begins grappling with whether to execute Martin Aguilar, after convicting him last week of murder for hire. Aguilar, 33, was convicted of killing Jose Fernandez in 2002 and dumping his body in a storm drain at historic Green-Wood Cemetery in Brooklyn. If the jury decides not to execute Aguilar, he will get life in prison. … Also, pretrial hearings are scheduled for Monday in the case of Guyanese immigrants Richard James and Ronald Malley, who face the death penalty in a trial slated for next year . They are accused of killing people in an insurance scam." Newsday notes, "Savitt said he believes the spate of capital cases in Brooklyn is a logical result of aggressive decisions by the Department of Justice in recent years to seek the death penalty. … 'The overall picture is the maturation of death penalty cases that have increased in the current administration,' said Savitt, of Manhattan."

Lawmakers Ask DOJ To Probe Amtrak's Legal Bills. The Wall Street Journal (12/11, Page A8, Koppel) reports, "Two congressmen have asked the Justice Department to look into Amtrak's use of outside legal counsel." The Journal continues, "In a Dec. 4 letter to Attorney General Alberto Gonzales, Rep. Don Young (R., Alaska) and Rep. John Mica (R., Fla.) complain that the federally subsidized railroad hasn't received fair and reasonable value for fees it has paid to law firms. … 'We urge you to conduct an investigation...and take appropriate action,' they wrote. Mr. Young is chairman of the House Committee on Transportation & Infrastructure; Mr. Mica recently was chosen to serve as the top-ranking Republican member of the committee when the 110th Congress convenes." The Journal adds, "The letter follows two recent public reports that concluded some of Amtrak's outside law firms engaged in sloppy billing practices, in violation of the railroad's internal billing guidelines. … Amtrak spokesman Cliff Black said: 'We don't believe the allegations related to Amtrak's use of outside counsel have merit or that they warrant review by the Justice Department, but we stand ready to cooperate and provide information as it is requested.' Earlier this year, Amtrak indicated that it had worked to improve its oversight of legal fees." The Journal notes, "An October report, issued jointly by Amtrak's Office of Inspector General and the Department of Transportation's inspector general, concluded that law firms had, among other things, engaged in 'block billing' in which they lumped tasks under one entry of an invoice, rather than itemizing the cost of each task. Block billing is prohibited by Amtrak, according to the report. According to the October report, from 2002 to 2005, Amtrak spent more than $100 million on outside lawyers."

FBI, IRS Philadelphia Airport Probe Focusing On Minority Contract Fraud. The Philadelphia Inquirer (12/11, Shiffman, 385K) reports, "Retail at Philadelphia International Airport may have entered a gilded age, but federal agents continue to investigate suspected pay-to-play corruption there. The current FBI and IRS investigation is related to minority business contracts held by airport shops, people familiar with the matter said." The Inquirer notes, "The focus of the investigation is the federal program designed to help disadvantaged business owners…get a fair share of airport contracts. … In some cases, the minorities have lent little more than their name, ethnic status and political sway - and have done little work."

Financial Difficulties Commonplace Among New York Mobsters. The New York Times (12/10, Rashbaum, 1.16M) reported that in New York City's five crime

families, "Some mobsters reap millions from rackets, and in some cases from legitimate enterprises, but many struggle to maintain a middle-class existence, and some are routinely broke. The impoverished gangster barely eking out a living is so commonplace that mobsters have a word for these poorer men of honor: brokesters. The archetypal Hollywood image of a wiseguy with prodigious appetites, swaggering in a finely tailored suit with a diamond pinkie ring and a fat roll of 50s, conceals the more nuanced reality of mob economics, according to some prosecutors, federal agents, organized-crime experts and a few mobsters. Crime figures are not immune to ordinary financial burdens and woes, like struggling to make car payments and finding money for groceries."

Minnesota Criminologist Thinks Serial Killer Behind Drownings. The AP (12/11) reports, "Rumors have persisted for years that a serial killer is prowling Interstate 94" in Minnesota, "hunting young men in college bars and plunging them underwater. Investigators, though, say there's no evidence of foul play. They say the victims were so drunk they fell in the river and died." But St. Cloud State University criminologist Douglas Gilbertson "completed a study this spring he believes shows patterns that indicate some of the cases could be murders -- and could be linked." The AP noted, St. Cloud police Chief Dennis Ballantine, whose department investigated the drowning death of a St. Cloud State student this spring and concluded it was an accident, called Gilbertson's study a collection of coincidences. … Police in La Crosse have asked the FBI to recheck their findings in the drownings, however."

WSJournal Says Hype Of Foley Allegations Was Unwarranted. In an editorial, the Wall Street Journal (12/11, 2.04M) says, "Charges of GOP malfeasance helped Democrats in last month's elections, especially those Mark Foley electronic messages to a former Congressional page that became an October sensation. So it's worth noting that the House Ethics Committee report on the episode that was released last Friday concluded with a whimper." The Committee's "conclusions have been criticized as weak in some circles, but this is mostly from the same crowd that had shouted 'coverup' without any evidence." Republicans "owe their defeat last month to much more than the Foley episode, but the Ethics report makes clear that the political uproar at the time far exceeded the actual transgressions."

CIVIL RIGHTS:

Schwarzenegger Seeks Prison System Reform. The New York Times (12/11, Steinhauer, 1.16M) reports with "the November election behind them, Gov. Arnold Schwarzenegger and state lawmakers from both parties say the time is ripe for the first major overhaul of the" California prison system "since the 1970s." Schwarzenegger "recently took the extraordinary step of declaring a state of emergency in the prison system, a move generally reserved for areas hit by natural disasters." Prison overcrowding is "so severe that 16,000 inmates are assigned cots in hallways and gyms; last month, the state began asking for volunteers to be moved to prisons out of state."

NYTimes Says Reports Show Voting Machines Need Paper Records. The New York Times (12/11, 1.16M) says in an editorial, "Two influential federal advisory groups have added their voices to an emerging national consensus that voting machines must produce a voter-verified paper record if they are to be trusted. One of those groups, the one dominated not by scientists but by election officials, was more grudging than it should have been. But their analyses should give further support to members of Congress who plan to push next month for a strong federal law requiring voter-verified paper records."

ANTITRUST:

Proposed Monsanto Deal Sparks Crop-Biotech Industry Backlash. The Wall Street Journal (12/11, Page C1, Kilman) reports, "Monsanto Co.'s second attempt in seven years to bring southern seed giant Delta & Pine Land Co. to the altar could be running into trouble." The Journal continues, "An unusual backlash against the proposed combination is taking root across the U.S. Farm Belt, driven in part by rivals in the crop-biotechnology industry, which Monsanto dominates." The Journal adds, "The proposed $1.5 billion deal announced in August would give Monsanto more control over a major crop by a biotechnology company than ever before allowed, a prospect that upsets antibiotechnology activists. Delta & Pine Land's seeds produce half of America's cotton, the nation's fifth-biggest crop. Delta's market share is highest in southern states such as Georgia, where 92% of the cotton is grown from Delta seed. … Wall Street is treating the acquisition as a done deal. Delta & Pine Land stock has hovered just under the $42-a-share offer since Aug. 15, when it jumped 11% on news of the agreement. The shares were at $40.64, down 24 cents, Friday in 4 p.m. New York Stock Exchange composite trading. Monsanto shares fell 43 cents to $48.08 Friday on the Big Board. Monsanto is trading at more than 25 times estimated earnings for its next fiscal year, according to Thomson Financial, compared with about 16 for the stocks in the Standard & Poor's 500-stock index." The Journal notes, 'Analysts have applauded the proposed combination because it would allow Monsanto to speed penetration of the cottonseed market with new genetically modified traits while ending several years of costly litigation between the two firms over their first breakup. Some biotech-industry leaders are prodding the attorneys general of several states to look into the combination as an antitrust review by the Justice Department extends into its fourth month."

WSJournal Hopes SCOTUS Rules Against Plaintiffs In Baby Bell Case. The Wall Street Journal (12/11, 2.04M) says the plaintiffs in Bell Atlantic v. Twombly, "a class-action suit in which plaintiffs allege that the Baby Bell phone companies conspired to suppress competition in violation of antitrust laws," claim that BellSouth, Verizon, "and the other Bells agreed among themselves to refrain from competing against each other and to prevent smaller telecom rivals from entering their respective markets." But the Justices "seemed unpersuaded that actual facts supporting these claims weren't necessary." The High Court's "skepticism is warranted and we can hope will be reflected in its decision."

ENVIRONMENT:

Democrats To Seek Reduction In US Energy Demand. The Wall Street Journal (12/11, A14, Fialka, 2.04M) reports, "In one of its final acts, the Republican Congress modestly increased the nation's domestic oil and natural-gas supplies, permitting more drilling for oil and natural-gas in the Gulf of Mexico. When Democrats take control next month, they will attempt to change the direction of energy policy, focusing more on shrinking demand, especially for gasoline and other products that rely heavily on imported oil." The Journal adds, "President Bush is an enthusiastic backer of ethanol, and boosting federal support could be an area where the White House and the new Congress find common ground. Senate Democrats will consider more direct approaches to curbing fossil-fuel demand, including raising efficiency standards for auto makers." Democrats "appear less willing to consider the supply-side solutions that have been popular in the Republican Congress. Their most recent big energy bill, last year, was heavy on incentives for coal, as well as for ethanol and nuclear power."

DOE Finds Power Grid Could Fuel 180 Million Electric Cars. The Wall Street Journal (12/11, A14, Fialka, 2.04M) reports, "The nation's existing electric power grid could fuel as many as 180 million electric cars, a Department of Energy study estimates. The study, being released today by the department's Pacific Northwest National Laboratory, is the federal government's first look at the grid's capacity to handle the demands of so-called plug-in hybrids."

FDA Mulls Rules For Preventing E. Coli Outbreaks. The New York Times (12/11, Martin, 1.16M) reports that with "processed fresh produce like bagged salads and baby carrots growing in popularity in the past decade, the Food and Drug Administration realized as long ago as 2000 that recommendations for safe handling of the products were needed." The FDA "went so far as to draft guidelines and kept the issue high on its priority list, but pressed by budget cuts and competing F.D.A. demands, the proposal languished." Now, with the "recent outbreaks of E.coli related to processed vegetables, the F.D.A.'s oversight of produce is likely to be treated with new urgency."

The Washington Post (12/11, Shin, 690K) reports in a front page story that the "patchwork of federal and state regulations that is supposed to ensure food safety has become less effective as the nation's produce supply has grown increasingly industrial." Consumer advocates "think that tougher mandatory food safety standards and stepped-up enforcement are the answer."

Taco Bell E. Coli Outbreak Slowing. USA Today (12/11, Weise, 2.27M) reports the "E. coli outbreak tied to Taco Bell restaurants in four states may be finally slowing down. … The onset of the last reported case was Dec. 2."

Schlosser Urges Democrats To Step Up Regulation Of Food Production. In a New York Times op-ed (12/11), author Eric Schlosser says, "This fall has brought plenty of bad news about food poisoning. … It is time for the new Democratic Congress to reverse a decades-long weakening of regulations and face up to the food-safety threats of the 21st century."

Agreement Would Limit Use Of Great Lakes Water. USA Today (12/11, 15A, Cauchon, 2.27M) reports a "new multistate agreement working its way through state legislatures builds a legal wall around the largest source of fresh water in the world. The deal would ensure that no Great Lakes water is ever shipped outside the region."

FBI/DEA/ATF/USMS:

Former Virginia Sheriff's Deputy Pleads Guilty To Drug, Racketeering Conspiracy. The Martinsville (VA) Bulletin (12/10) reported a former Henry County Sheriff's Office deputy "has pleaded guilty to two charges in the sheriff's office scandal after reaching a plea agreement with the government. … Bradley Scott Martin, 33, entered guilty pleas on one count of racketeering conspiracy and one count of drug conspiracy in district court in Roanoke on Friday, according to Heidi Coy with the U.S. Attorney's Office. … The indictments were the result of a nearly two-year investigation by federal authorities into an alleged eight-year scheme involving some sheriff's office personnel. According to the indictment, in 2001, a Drug Enforcement Administration (DEA) agent from Texas placed a telephone call to the Henry County Sheriff's Office to advise officers that a drug ledger had been seized which indicated shipments of drugs were being delivered to 'Brad Martin's' house in Martinsville."

The Roanoke (VA) Times (12/9) reported, "Martin and 11 other current and former deputies and former Henry County Sheriff Frank Cassell are named in a 48-count federal indictment."

On its Web site, WDBJ-TV, Roanoke (12/8) also reports on Martin's guilty plea.

Prosecutors Drop Some Charges. The AP (12/8) reported, "The federal indictment of Henry County's former sheriff and a dozen past and present members of his department has led prosecutors to drop charges against 28 people because of the taint of the alleged corruption. The charges dropped include 16 felony drug counts and 25 misdemeanor and traffic infractions. 'These charges could not be effectively prosecuted without the testimony of one or more individuals currently under federal indictment,' Commonwealth's Attorney Bob Bushnell said. … He said he does not expect any more charges to be dropped."

Three Drug Gang Members Sentenced In Maryland. The Annapolis (MD) Capital (12/9) reported three men who "admitted being part of a Severn drug gang known as the 'Pioneer City Boys' were sentenced to federal prison. Federal prosecutors said Tony Maurice Horne Jr. and Troemaine Herbert Storey, both of Glen Burnie, and Jerome Otto Waters Jr. of Annapolis were part of a gang that used violence and intimidation to keep competitors out and silence people who might go to the police. … An associate, Calvin I. Savoy of Severn, was convicted in October of drug charges and of shooting a county police officer during a melee in Odenton in 2004. … The shooting of the officer touched off an investigation by county police and the U.S. Drug Enforcement Administration that culminated with the September 2005 indictment of seven men."

Ohio Doctor Accused Of Illegally Prescribing $10 Million Worth Of Painkillers. The Toledo(OH) Blade (12/9) reported a Michigan physician "was arraigned…in federal court on charges that he used a Toledo medical office to illegally prescribe more than $10 million in painkillers to patients. A 26-count indictment, filed Wednesday in U.S. District Court in Toledo…charges Dr. Leo M. Ognen, 54, with drug conspiracy and drug distribution. … The charges stem from a U.S. Drug Enforcement Administration investigation into the alleged illegal dispensing of over two million doses of OxyContin and oxycodone and 1.1 million Percocet tablets at his medical practice in Toledo from January, 2002, to October, 2004."

Steroid Seizure In Maryland Said To Be Among Largest. The Baltimore Sun (12/9, Dolan) reported it "seemed like a routine seizure when federal customs agents intercepted a package of steroids at John F. Kennedy Airport in New York. From JFK, the investigation led authorities to Anne Arundel County to what they now call one of the largest stashes of man-made muscle enhancers found in the region. Federal authorities and Anne Arundel County police searched the locker of the Bally's personal trainer last summer and wrote in court papers that they found about 40,000 vials and tablets of suspected anabolic steroids stuffed inside a locked chest. 'It's unprecedented, as far as we're concerned,' said Floyd Pond, deputy director of the Washington-Baltimore High Intensity Drug Trafficking Area task force program. Ed Marcinko, a spokesman for the Drug Enforcement Administration in Baltimore, said he agreed with Pond's assessment."

Study Finds Drugs As Common As Alcohol In Car Crashes. The AP (12/8) reported the "focus on the dangers of drinking and driving may have overshadowed a similarly serious problem: the effect of drugs, including prescription medication, on drivers. According to a federal study…West Virginia medical examiners have found that drugs turn up almost as frequently as alcohol in the victims of fatal car crashes. The drugs found most often are prescription medications like painkillers and depressants." The federal Centers for Disease Control "is able to draw that conclusion because West Virginia — unlike most states — routinely tests the victims of fatal crashes for drugs and prescription medications as well as alcohol."

Doping Case Appeals Seen As Useless By Athletes. According to the Los Angeles Times (12/11, Hiltzik), athletes "see doping case appeals as futile exercise. … The WADA rules govern the admissibility of evidence, the burden of proof and the selection of the arbitrators themselves. In each category they tend to favor the accusers. Athletes wishing to compete in national, international and Olympic events subject to WADA jurisdiction have no option but to agree to this system. Anti-doping authorities argue that these rules — indeed, the very requirement that appeals be heard by arbitrators, rather than in court — are crucial to ensuring a fast and efficient process."

In a separate story, the Los Angeles Times (12/10, Hiltzik) reported the worldwide sports anti-doping program, "created to fight performance-enhancing drug use in international athletics, imposes severe punishments for accidental or technical infractions, relies at times on disputed scientific evidence and resists outside scrutiny, a Times investigation has found. Elite athletes have been barred from the Olympics, forced to relinquish medals, titles or prize money and confronted with potentially career-ending suspensions after testing positive for a banned substance at such low concentrations it could have no detectable effect on performance, records show. … The findings emerge from a Times examination of more than 250 anti-doping cases involving runners, cyclists, skiers, tennis players and competitors in dozens of other sports from around the world."

The Los Angeles Times (12/11) also includes a list of "questionable" doping cases.

Meth-Makers Move Into Woods To Avoid Detection. USA Today (12/11, Keen, 2.27M) reports hunters "are finding methamphetamine labs or their remnants in remote areas this fall." Federal and state laws "restricting sales of cold tablets containing ephedrine or pseudoephedrine, key components of meth, have reduced the number of labs." But some meth makers "are moving to isolated areas to escape detection."

Walters Says Opium Poppies In Afghanistan Will Be Sprayed With Herbicide. The AP (12/10) reported the top U.S. anti-drug official "said Saturday that Afghan poppies would be sprayed with herbicide to combat an opium trade that produced a record heroin haul this year, a measure likely to anger farmers and scare Afghans unfamiliar with weed killers. John Walters…said Afghanistan could turn into a narco-state unless 'giant steps' are made toward eliminating poppy cultivation. … Afghans are deeply opposed to spraying poppies. … But Walters said [President] Karzai and other officials have agreed to ground spraying. 'I think the president has said yes, and I think some of the ministers have repeated yes,' Walters said." There are more than 80 media references to spraying Afghanistan's opium poppies. News outlets that used the AP story include CBS News, the Wall Street Journal, Washington Post, Forbes, Houston Chronicle, Newsday, and Kansas City Star.

NYTimes Says New Jersey Needs Sterile Needle Program. The New York Times (12/11, 1.16M) says in an editorial that New Jersey's drug-related HIV infection rate "is said to be twice the national average. … At the moment, however, New Jersey is the only state that is still resisting this proven AIDS-prevention strategy." New Jersey lawmakers "should bear this in mind as they approach the vote. A vote for the needle access program is a vote for saving the lives of men, women and unborn children."

TAX:

IRS Headquarters Reopens Six Months After Flooding. The Washington Post (12/11, D4, Barr, 690K) "Federal Diary" reports the IRS headquarters on Constitution Avenue in Washington "has reopened, almost six months after heavy rains flooded the basement and sub-basement, destroying electrical and air-conditioning equipment."

CONGRESS-ADMINISTRATION:

GOP Uses Final Days Of Congressional Control To Approve Popular Tax Items. The Christian Science Monitor (12/11, Chaddock, 59K) reports, "Republicans used their final hours in charge of Congress to make good on promises to many of Washington's most powerful interests as well as to American families they hope to woo back in 2008. The 11th-hour output includes popular tax extenders, such as the research and development tax credit for businesses and the tax break for college tuition."

Thomas Credited With Pushing HSA Provision Attached To Tax-And-Trade Package. The Washington Post (12/11, A4, Birnbaum, Montgomery, 690K) reports, "Republican lawmakers, with little public debate, quietly added a billion-dollar health-care benefit to legislation that was rushed through Congress just before it adjourned Saturday morning. Acting at the urging of several major business lobbies eager to reduce their medical-insurance costs" and House Ways and Means Committee Chairman Bill Thomas, "lawmakers adopted the provision even though only a single committee had previously approved it. The provision…expands the amount of money that can be contributed tax-free to health savings accounts (HSAs)." That it "remained in the bill was thanks largely to Thomas."

Health Care Legislation Balances Funding With Increased Transparency. The Wall Street Journal (12/11, A8, Lueck, 2.04M) reports Congress "authorized billions of dollars in spending to shore up government health initiatives…passing legislation that included provisions aimed at injecting more transparency and accountability into the programs."

Offshore Drilling Bill Draws Mixed Reviews. The Christian Science Monitor (12/11, Knickerbocker, 59K) reports, "As one of its final acts, the 109th Congress Friday approved opening to oil and gas development 8.3 million previously protected acres off the Gulf Coast - a last bid to influence energy and environmental policy before the Democrats assume control. Industry officials are pleased; environmentalists much less so."

Congress Approves Ban On Fraudulently Obtaining Phone Records. The Wall Street Journal (12/11, A6, Rogers, Matthews, 2.04M) reports, "Spurred by the Hewlett-Packard Co. scandal, Congress approved legislation that would make it a federal crime to obtain an individual's telephone records without his or her approval. The measure spells out new federal criminal penalties for those who buy and sell such fraudulently obtained records. The White House said President Bush will sign the measure. The bill targets 'pretexting' tactics, where investigators use schemes to impersonate their target and gain access to private phone records."

Novak Describes Angry Exchange Between GOP Senators Over Earmarks. In his column for the Washington Post (12/11, A19, 690K) Robert Novak writes, "The sterile, confused lame-duck session of the Republican-controlled 109th Congress ended with a quiet victory by reformers that staved off an estimated 10,000 earmarks. … The hero of the lame-duck session was" Sen. Jim DeMint, who "was instrumental in blocking a Senate-House conference on a military construction appropriations bill, which would then be used as the last train out of town to carry pork." Novak continues, "The first closed-door meeting of Republican senators after their drubbing in the election erupted in discord after the leadership laid out plans for an omnibus spending bill, putting all unfinished appropriations bills in one package. … But DeMint rose to make clear that he and his fellow freshman Republican, Sen. Tom Coburn of Oklahoma, would use the many parliamentary devices at their disposal to block an omnibus bill." Sen. Ted Stevens "erupted with an exhibition of his famous hair-trigger temper." Sen. Thad Cochran "made the case in calmer language." Sen. John McCain, "happy to have two Senate rookies pick up the anti-pork mantle he has carried for many years, was making snide comments in a stage whisper. But DeMint was not about to be moved by either threats or persuasion."

Frist Blames "Obstructionist" Democrats For Blocking Popular Measures. In an op-ed for USA Today (12/11, 21A, 2.27M) Sen. Bill Frist writes, "The Congressional session that just concluded actually leaves a solid record of achievement for America. … Nonetheless, some widely supported measures fell victim to obstructionist tactics. Democrats, for example, blocked popular proposals to make it easier for small businesses to buy health coverage for their employees, reform our broken medical liability system, do more adult stem cell research, and increase the minimum wage."

USA Today Blasts Departing GOP Congress. USA Today (12/11, 21A, 2.27M), in an editorial titled, "109th

DOJ_NMG_0104093

Congress' Big Success: Lowering The Achievement Bar: Shoddy ethics, obsession with perks of power left GOP little to brag about," writers, "In the end, nothing became the 109th Congress so much as its going, which it finally did Saturday on the heels of an ethics report that seemed to symbolize two years of feckless behavior. Even some key Republicans left town lamenting a record of failure. … Anything went if it helped preserve GOP power, but very little was achieved to address the nation's problems."

WPost Praises Fisheries Bill. The Washington Post (12/11, A18, 690K), in an editorial, writes, "Congress passed an important piece of legislation for the health of America's oceans. Two commissions in recent years have concluded that only bold policies can prevent the collapse of coastal ecosystems. The bill, which reauthorized and improved upon the nation's fisheries management laws, wasn't bold enough and contained a few unfortunate compromises, but it represents progress."

Pelosi Attracting Unprecedented Media Attention. The Los Angeles Times (12/11, Fiore, 850K) reports that as Rep. Nancy Pelosi "prepares to be sworn in Jan. 4 as the first female speaker of the House, she has become an object of fascination and curiosity in political circles and beyond. Barbara Walters interviewed her as one of the year's 10 most fascinating people. People magazine has written about her twice in recent weeks. … Only weeks ago, Republicans were doing their best in the heat of the campaign to paint Pelosi, 66, as a conservative's nightmare — a San Francisco liberal out of touch with the American mainstream. But more recently, a poll measuring political charisma showed that she had 'dramatically improved her standing' with the public, sponsors of the survey said, with voters knowing her better and feeling warmer toward her."

Pelosi Rewarding Younger Members Credited With Improving Democrats' Image. The Washington Post (12/11, A12, Layton, 690K) reports, "They call themselves the '30-Something Working Group,' a loose collection of House Democrats in their 30s and 40s who have begun making waves. … The core of the group -- Reps. Kendrick Meek and Debbie Wasserman Schultz of Florida and Timothy J. Ryan of Ohio -- began talking at 10 or 11 p.m. Never mind that the House chamber was essentially empty at that hour. C-SPAN was recording the sessions, and insomniacs around the country got to know the three young Democrats. The trio sometimes used props and took irreverent jabs at the Republicans in honing their party's message." According to the Post, "The young Democrats played an important role in helping their party take control of Congress, and now they are beginning to reap the benefits." Pelosi "is making room for these and other young House Democrats, giving them opportunities they would not normally enjoy under the rigid seniority system that typically defines life in the Capitol."

Work On Appropriations Bills Awaits Democrats. USA Today (12/11, 9A, 2.27M) reports, "When the Democrats take control of Congress next month, they will also have to take charge of resolving spending issues that the old Congress couldn't. As the clock ticked toward adjournment over the weekend, Congress approved a flurry of last-minute bills, but could not reach a deal on nearly a dozen annual spending bills for the fiscal year that began Oct. 1. … Budget work on about $400 billion for agencies as varied as the Education Department, the Department of Agriculture and Health and Human Services will be left unfinished also."

The Wall Street Journal (12/11, A6, Rogers, 2.04M) writes, "In the closing hours of the Republican-controlled Congress, impatient House Democrats took a swing at oil and gas interests -- a sign of things to come in January. The punch fell wide: Their amendment, seeking to recoup royalties from energy companies drilling on federal lands, failed 207-205. There was pride in coming so close. But the defeat also betrayed a level of confusion in the new majority and fear that it won't have the resources needed to carry out its agenda after midterm election victories."

U.S. News and World Report (12/18, Brush, 2.03M) reports, "The lame duck Republican-led Congress punted nearly a half-trillion dollars in unfinished spending over to next year-to the Democrats, that is. Just when the Democrats hope to be talking about the minimum wage and college tuition and fulfilling their campaign pledges for a 'new direction,' they'll be saddled with looking backward and making a host of spending decisions fraught with peril. Their plans to hit the ground running with a flurry of politically popular initiatives may just have run into a gaping pothole. That's because the lawmakers who left Washington last week…completed only two (defense and homeland security) of the 11 spending bills that finance 13 government agencies."

Agriculture Lobby Expected To Face Concerted Opposition In Crafting New Farm Bill. U.S. News and World Report (12/18, Schulte, 2.03M) reports, "The agriculture industry is hoping for a 2007 bumper crop-of money. When Congress reconvenes in January, one of its top priorities will be hashing out a new six-year farm bill, an always anticipated Washington ritual that has regularly delivered massive subsidies to the industry and howls of protest from budget hawks and others. … While Big Ag is pushing for another barnburner, the largess of the 2002 farm bill, penned at a time of government surplus, is gone. This time, nothing will come easy." According to US News, "an odd-couple alliance is forming among Bread for the World, the libertarian Cato Institute, the liberal Environmental Defense, and the conservative Club for Growth. Expect talks to accelerate by early spring. Most insiders predict calls for reform will keep Big Ag from going home with the usual honey pot, but it won't be left hungry, either. For some, that's enough."

Democrats To Probe Interior Department's Handling Of Oil And Gas Royalties. U.S. News and World Report (12/18, Pound, 2.03M) reports, "For years the Department of Interior's Minerals Management Service operated pretty much in the backwaters of the nation's capital, drawing little scrutiny from the press or Capitol Hill. Such obscurity, however, is a thing of the past. Last summer, congressional investigators discovered that the agency had bungled its job so badly that energy companies legally avoided paying an estimated $2 billion in royalties on oil and natural gas extracted from federal waters. The final tab to taxpayers could reach $10 billion." Sen. Ron Wyden "will chair a subcommittee and vows a 'very vigorous' investigation of the oil and gas leasing program run by the minerals agency. … In the House, says a senior aide to Rep. Nick Rahall, the West Virginia Democrat expected to chair the House Resources Committee, 'there will be an intensive and exhaustive review of royalty underpayments.'"

Jordan Confirmed To 3rd Circuit Bench. The Legal Intelligencer (12/11, Bennett) reports, "The U.S. Senate confirmed Judge Kent A. Jordan to the 3rd U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals on Friday." The Intelligencer continues, "Jordan, formerly a judge for the U.S. District Court for the District of Delaware, was nominated in June to replace Judge Jane R. Roth, who took senior status on the appellate court effective May 31. Both Roth and Jordan are Republicans." The Intelligencer adds, "Directly before his appointment to the district court in 2002, Jordan was vice president and general counsel of the Corporation Services Co. in Wilmington, Del. He joined the company in 1998 after five years as a partner with Wilmington firm Morris James Hitchens & Williams. … From 1987 to 1992, Jordan was an Assistant U.S. Attorney, after having spent two years as an associate with Potter Anderson & Corroon, another Wilmington firm. … Admitted to the Delaware bar in 1984, Jordan clerked for Judge James L. Latchum of the Delaware District Court from 1984 to 1985, after receiving his J.D. from the Georgetown University Law Center. He received his B.A. from Brigham Young University in 1981. Jordan was born in West Point, N.Y., and resides in Delaware. … Historically, two seats on the 3rd Circuit bench have gone to Delaware jurists. Jordan's nomination continues the tradition. Roth is from Delaware, and the state's other representative on the court is Judge Thomas L. Ambro, who joined from private bankruptcy practice at Wilmington firm Richards Layton & Finger. He was nominated by President Bill Clinton and confirmed in 2000."

San Francisco Protestors Urge Pelosi To Seek Bush's Impeachment. The San Francisco Chronicle (12/11, King, 384K) reports a "small but spirited rally in San Francisco called on" incoming House Speaker Nancy Pelosi "to move impeachment" of President Bush "to the top of the legislative agenda."

Bush Attends "Christmas In Washington" Concert. The AP (12/10, Sanner) reports President Bush "enjoyed a lively set of Christmas music Sunday night" at "the annual 'Christmas in Washington' concert at the National Building Museum. The event benefited the Children's National Medical Center." Bush "said U.S. troops abroad 'must know that our nation is grateful for your service.'"

Book Explores Cheney's Role In Bush Administration. The Financial Times (12/11, Daniel) examines the book "Vice," in which sets out to depict how Vice President Cheney "has become the most powerful vice-presidency in history, 'insulated from any accountability -- from the Congress and even from the president with whom he shared executive power'. … Reinforcing the image of Mr Cheney as the shadow president, the authors reveal the ways he has bolstered his authority."

Watchdog Group Urges DOD Inquiry Into Evangelical Video. The Washington Post (12/11, Cooperman, 690K) reports, "A military watchdog group is asking the Defense Department to investigate whether seven

Army and Air Force officers violated regulations by appearing in uniform in a promotional video for an evangelical Christian organization. In the video, much of which was filmed inside the Pentagon, four generals and three colonels praise the Christian Embassy, a group that evangelizes among military leaders, politicians and diplomats in Washington. Some of the officers describe their efforts to spread their faith within the military." The Military Religious Freedom Foundation "is requesting an investigation in a letter to the Defense Department's inspector general."

Discovery Crew Prepares For Docking With International Space Station. USA Today (12/11, 5A, Watson, 2.27M) reports, "Early data from Saturday's launch of space shuttle Discovery show the ship is in good health and suffered no damage on the way to orbit, deputy shuttle program manager John Shannon said Sunday. 'It was a very typical ascent,' Shannon said. 'The team sees nothing of concern at this time.'" The AP (12/11, Borenstein) reports the shuttle "is to dock with the space station Monday to begin the intricate work. Three complicated spacewalks are planned to rewire the space station from a temporary to a permanent power source." The Christian Science Monitor (12/11, Spotts, 59K) previews the work ahead for the Discovery crew.

Bill Would Limit USPS Rate Hikes. The Wall Street Journal (12/11, A8, Mckinnon, Brooks, 2.04M) reports the Postal Service "generally will be barred from raising postage rates beyond the rate of inflation for the next decade under an overhaul passed by Congress." The new law – "the first major changes to the service in more than three decades -- aims to stabilize rates for households and bulk mailers and to help the service cope with the challenges of the Internet and compete against delivery companies such as FedEx Corp. and United Parcel Service Inc. The White House said President Bush would sign the bill."

NYTimes Criticizes Administration For "Muzzling" Scientists. In an editorial headlined "Muzzling Those Pesky Scientists," the New York Times (12/11, 1.16M) says the EPA "disclosed last week that it had revised -- stood on their head is more like it -- procedures it has used for 25 years to set standards for air pollutants like soot and lead. … This is disheartening, but not surprising. Whether the issue is birth control or global warming or clean air, this administration has already acquired a special place in regulatory history for the audacity with which it has manipulated or muzzled science (and in some cases individual scientists) that might discomfit its industrial allies or interfere with its political agenda."

Krugman Criticizes Administration For Privatizing Government Functions. In his New York Times (12/11, 1.16M) column, Paul Krugman says, "Outsourcing of the government's responsibilities -- not to panels of supposed wise men, but to private companies with the right connections -- has been one of the hallmarks" of the Bush Administration, and "privatization through outsourcing is one reason the administration has failed on so many fronts." It is "now clear that there's a fundamental error in the antigovernment ideology embraced by today's conservative movement. Conservatives look at the virtues of market competition and leap to the conclusion that private ownership, in itself, is some kind of magic elixir. But there's no reason to assume that a private company hired to perform a public service will do better than people employed directly by the government."

Kurtz Says Leaks Show Administration's Unity Breaking Down. In his Washington Post (12/11, C1, 690K) "Media Matters" column, Howard Kurtz says, "Washington is awash in leaks these days, giving us a rare glimpse of what really goes on behind the carefully manicured landscape of official statements." With the leaks of memos by Defense Secretary Donald Rumsfeld and National Security Adviser Stephen Hadley, "it is clear that the administration's once-legendary discipline has broken down. What is also clear is that the private doubts of top officials are closer to the media's dark portrait of the war than to the 'absolutely, we're winning' rhetoric of President Bush. That is especially noteworthy in light of all the criticism that administration officials have heaped on correspondents in Iraq for focusing too heavily on violence and ignoring signs of progress."

Summers Concerned By Populist Policy Proposals. In a Financial Times (12/11) op-ed, Harvard's Lawrence Summers says, "If the new Congress sees itself as having a mandate for anything in the economic area, it is for policies that 'stand up' for ordinary Americans against the threat they perceive from corporate and moneyed interests. These populist impulses have roots much deeper than campaign rhetoric." Summers decries "populist policy proposals that cut against the grain of the market system by, for example, limiting free trade agreements, restricting outsourcing or limiting the ability of successful companies to expand. The track record of such populist proposals is dismal. They rarely achieve their objectives and come with huge collateral costs."

Additionally, in an op-ed for the Los Angeles Times (12/11, 850K), Summers writes, "The freshman class" in Congress "is under enormous pressure to respond not just to the economic insecurity that middle-class voters feel but to their resentment toward the disproportionately prospering corporate elite. If the new Congress sees itself as having any kind of economic mandate, it is for policies that 'stand up' for ordinary Americans against the perceived threat from corporate and moneyed interests.

OTHER NEWS:

"Spunky" Economy Said To Be Surmounting Downturns. The Christian Science Monitor (12/11, Scherer, 59K) says the US economy is "spunky," as evidence suggests it is "weathering the downturns in the housing and auto markets. The economy does have a little wobble, and some economists believe the US is entering a period of subpar growth. But as a whole, it appears to be avoiding dire predictions of a sharp rise in unemployment and a loss of business confidence." And the Wall Street Journal (12/11, C1, Browning, 2.04M) says investors "are widely expecting an investor-friendly announcement" from the Fed tomorrow. The Fed "is expected to leave target interest rates unchanged, fueling hopes that it will start cutting rates some time next year, which would be good news for stocks and bonds."

Retiring, Defeated Members Of Congress Entertain Offers From Academia. The AP (12/11, Superville) reports, "The future is bright for ex-members of Congress." Rep. Sherwood Boehlert "is joining the Woodrow Wilson International Center for Scholars in Washington." Rep. Jim Leach "is sifting through offers from prestigious East Coast universities — Georgetown, Harvard and Princeton among them — as well as schools in his Midwestern home state." Sen. Mike DeWine "is talking to universities about teaching and law firms about legal work as he prepares to re-enter private life for the first time in 30 years."

Obama Hits New Hampshire With "Huge Media Horde" In Tow. ABC World News (12/10, story 6, 2:50, Harris, 8.78M) reported, "It is still the year 2006, but in New Hampshire, it looked more like 2008." Sen. Barack Obama "has not yet announced whether he'll run for president, but when the Democratic star paid his first visit to New Hampshire today, he was welcomed like a candidate." ABC (Tapper) said the "excitement Obama is generating with crowds in his first-ever visit to the first in the nation primary state could be bad news for his possible Democratic primary rivals," including Sen. Hillary Clinton.

NBC Nightly News (12/10, story 4, 2:35, Reid, 9.87M) said Obama "said that he is baffled by how quickly he's become a superstar of the Democratic Party. Here in New Hampshire his supporters say they are not surprised at all, that he is a politician with a gift." Also on NBC Nightly News (12/10, story 5, 1:45, Seigenthaler, 9.87M), CNBC's John Harwood was asked if there is "any doubt that Barack Obama is running." Harwood said, "Very little doubt. … When you talk to his advisors, it is clear that he is into this."

The Washington Post (12/11, Balz, 690K) reports on its front page that "the political phenomenon known as Sen. Barack Obama" descended on New Hampshire Sunday, "drawing enthusiastic crowds and trailed by a huge media horde as he continued to stoke interest in a possible bid for the White House in 2008." In Portsmouth, "it was standing-room-only at a book signing," and in Manchester, "1,500 people paid $25 apiece to hear him speak at a celebration of the New Hampshire Democratic Party's historic victories in last month's midterm elections. To the question everyone wanted answered -- Is he going to run? -- Obama was noncommittal." But Obama closed his Manchester speech "with words that seemed to signal growing interest in a campaign. 'America is ready to turn the page,' he said. 'America is ready for a new set of challenges. This is our time. A new generation is prepared to lead.'"

USA Today (12/11, Lawrence, 2.27M) says the "half-Kansan, half-Kenyan author and politician, who electrified the 2004 Democratic convention with his keynote speech, says it is 'a little surprising' to him and 'completely baffling' to his wife that his 15 minutes of fame have extended well beyond 15 minutes. But there's no doubt they have. The large crowds and pop-star response Obama drew here underscored the new reality for Democrats seeking their party's nomination: New York Sen. Hillary Rodham Clinton is no longer alone at the top." The AP (12/10, Pickler) also highlights Obama's "15 minutes of fame" remark.

The New York Times (12/11, Nagourney, 1.16M) says the visit was the "first time in his life" that Obama has visited the leadoff primary state, where he offered "a message of hope while proclaiming himself wary of the wave of hype that surrounded his visit. His visit gave Democrats in two sold-out halls a chance to inspect the man who has emerged as their party's strongest alternative" to Clinton. The Los Angeles Times (12/11, McDermott, Barabak, 850K) headlines its report "Crowds Adore Obama" and says the "freshman" senator is "borne aloft by a popularity bubble that seems to float higher by the day." The Baltimore Sun (12/11, West, 257K) says Obama "appears to have put his party under a spell that has veteran politicians reaching back to the Kennedy era for comparisons."

AFP (12/10) says Obama "is expected to make a decision" on a run "in the next few weeks." McClatchy (12/11, Thomma) also reports on Obama's New Hampshire visit.

Clinton's "It Takes a Village" To Be Re-Released This Week. The New York Daily News/AP (12/11) reports Clinton "is polishing up her most famous phrase as she edges closer to a presidential run, writing in a new introduction to her book 'It Takes a Village' that Sept. 11 and the Internet make her tome on child-rearing even more relevant today." In the 10th anniversary edition of the book, which goes on sale tomorrow, Clinton writes, "The five years since 9/11 have reinforced one of my main points: How children are raised anywhere can impact our lives and our children's futures."

Four New Yorkers Eyeing White House. Newsday (12/11, Clarridge, Gordon, Thrush, Virasami) examines the four possible presidential candidates from New York. For Rudy Giuliani, the question is whether a "thrice-married New Yorker on the wrong side of his party on the Big Three -- gays, guns and God" -- can get elected president. Giuliani "is riding high on 9/11 name recognition, and some believe that alone can take him far into the race -- perhaps if only as" Sen. John McCain's running mate. Newsday says if Clinton is "not running, she's walking as fast as she can." She "was supposed to engage in a slow rollout" of her campaign this month, but she "seems to have speeded things up, possibly to deal with the looming threat posed by emerging star" Obama. Gov. George Pataki "is expected to make his decision in the next few weeks," according to a spokeswoman. And while New York Mayor Michael Bloomberg "insists he's not a candidate," he "is confident he would make a good president. … Political observers say he could free up $500 million of his own funds to run as an independent."

McCain Addresses New York Jewish Crowd. Newsday/AP (12/11, Pyle) reports McCain paid "a visit to the home turf" of Clinton and Giuliani, addressing a crowd at New York's Yeshiva University on Sunday where he said "Israel and the world are threatened by a 'possibly deranged and surely dangerous regime' in Iran."

McCain, Romney Top "Potential Heirs" To Bush Family "Machine." The Los Angeles Times (12/11, Wallsten, 850K) reports that "with the Bushes preparing to stand down from a quarter century in top elected offices, a frenzied competition has erupted in the Republican Party over who will inherit a fundraising and vote-getting machine built by the family over the years into one of the most valuable assets in modern politics." The "leading potential heirs to that political fortune so far" are McCain and, "a bit surprisingly, Massachusetts Gov. Mitt Romney, who has emerged as a top-tier contender by wooing social conservatives considered crucial in the early primary contests."

McCain's Play For GOP Base Seen As Endangering His General Election Appeal. Time's Karen Tumulty (12/18) reports, "McCain '08 will be a bigger, more conventional operation -- a tank, not a slingshot. The prevailing wisdom about McCain used to be that his bipartisan appeal would make him a sure bet in a presidential race - -if only he could get past the Republican primary. But as more and more of the party establishment climb aboard a campaign that McCain has not yet even formally launched, it's starting to look as if the opposite may be true. By trying to become the perfect candidate for the primaries, McCain could be creating difficulties for himself in a general election. His hard-line position on Iraq is a perfect case in point. McCain has continued to press for more troops there, and spent last week dismissing the Iraq Study Group recommendation to bring them home as nothing short of a recipe for defeat. That's the kind of strong, consistent hawkishness that G.O.P. primary voters look for. … The problem is that exit polls in last month's election said only 17% of voters overall share that view, which could leave the other 83% wondering whether McCain's famous independent streak, so appealing on most issues, would be such a good thing to have in a Commander in Chief who has the power to take the country to war."

Possible Candidates Rush To Establish Exploratory Committees. The Washington Post (12/11, A17, Goldfarb, 690K) examines the early formation of exploratory committees Giuliani, McCain, and Sens. Evan Bayh and Sam Brownback. The "ideas behind creating an exploratory committee, strategists and experts say, are to create buzz -- and to do what everybody expects you to do." Attorney Kenneth Gross, who specializes in politics and elections, said, "You get two press releases, one when you form the exploratory committee, and one when you say you're actually running." New Mexico Gov. Bill Richardson "apparently trying to get three bites out of the apple," recently "announced that he would announce next month whether he would form an exploratory committee," while Gov. Tom Vilsack "bypassed the exploratory stage" and entered the presidential race directly. Romney reportedly could do the same.

Columnist Says California Will Be "Meaningless" In Nomination Contests. In his Los Angeles Times (12/11, 850K) column, George Skelton writes, "What's sure to be a hot presidential contest is warming up and once again California is likely to be a mere spectator in a lousy seat. … California's 2008 presidential primary won't be held until June, long after the nominations already have been locked up. Our votes will be meaningless."

Jefferson's Victory Creates Uncertainty For New Orleans. The Washington Post (12/11, A3, Whoriskey, 690K) writes that Rep. William Jefferson "may be a pariah in some Washington political circles," but New Orleans voters "weighed in over the weekend with their own verdict regarding their scandal-plagued congressman: He's still our guy." Still, Jefferson's "emphatic reelection victory…poses a quandary for Democrats, some of whom have shunned him politically, and possibly also for the city, as leaders here seek to project an image of civic probity as they lobby for more federal money for recovery from Hurricane Katrina." The Wall Street Journal (12/11, Lovley, 2.04M) says Jefferson's win "leaves the state frozen in the scandal, which could cramp the flow of rebuilding funds from Washington, experts warn."

The New York Times (12/11, Nossiter, 1.16M) headlines its story on Jefferson "New Orleans Voters Support Their Man Over F.B.I.," writing that while "the late-night comedians could joke all they wanted about the $90,000" the FBI "said it found in Mr. Jefferson's freezer," and "white New Orleans could tut-tut at the seamy portrait outlined by the F.B.I. in its investigation of him," supporters "aw another picture: of a godly man persecuted by a racially biased government."

Bonilla, Rodriguez Face Off Tuesday In TX23. The Washington Post (12/11, A4, Moreno, 690K) reports on Tuesday's runoff election in TX23, where GOP Rep. Henry Bonilla faces Democratic ex-Rep. Ciro Rodriguez, who has "accused Bonilla of voting to cut veterans' benefits and to deny health-care coverage for National Guardsmen returning from Iraq. Bonilla countered by saying that Rodriguez showed 'dangerous judgment' in Congress by opposing a law that allowed secret evidence to be used in immigration proceedings against suspected terrorists and by accepting a $250 contribution from a man later convicted of conducting illegal business transactions with Libya." The Los Angeles Times (12/11, Hart, 850K) says in November, "a well-financed Bonilla won 49% of the vote, just shy of the majority he needed to win outright." The AP (12/10, White) says the campaign has been marked by "negative campaigning."

The San Antonio Express News (12/11, Jefferson) reports former President Clinton campaigned for Rodriguez Sunday, telling supporters, "You couldn't have a clearer choice. You couldn't have a better candidate. And you've got just about 48 hours to bring it home."

Virginia Democrats Aim To Keep Up Momentum. The Washington Post (12/11, B1, Craig, 690K) writes that "what was unthinkable in Virginia six months ago is now the political reality: With" Sen.-elect Jim Webb's win, "the state has three prominent Democrats" -- Webb, Gov. Tim Kaine, and popular ex-Gov. Mark Warner -- "who say they are working as a team to build the party in a historically Republican state. Their first mission is trying to defeat Republicans in next year's legislative races."

"Bushies" Reportedly Angry Over Rove's Inaccurate Midterm Predictions. U.S. News and World Report's "Washington Whispers" column (12/18, Bedard) reports, "It's an ugly rumor, but it's spreading like wildfire: Karl Rove has lost his touch. In an amazing betrayal within a family where top political aide Rove is royalty, Bushies have been sneering at his pre-election happy talk that the GOP would keep the Senate and take a slight hit in the House, both soon to be run by Democrats. And now we learn that President Bush really believed the GOP was safe, too. On the day before the elections, he asked embattled House GOP leader Dennis Hastert to run for speaker again so he could guide the White House's agenda in Congress."

Bush 41 Said To Be "Weepy" Often. U.S. News and World Report's "Washington Whispers" column (12/18, Bedard) reports, "Those weren't tears of pain former President Bush shed last week during a tribute to his son Jeb, Florida's outgoing governor. Just the opposite. Family friends say the old guy is getting more emotional and has been prone to joyful crying jags when bragging on his kids. And-bless his heart-he doesn't try to stop it; he just lets the tears pour out. His buddies tell us that Bush, 82, also gets weepy when discussing the importance of his family and the blessings he has enjoyed throughout his life. 'He has always been an emotional guy,' says a pal.

DeLay To Unveil New Blog. U.S. News and World Report's "Washington Whispers" column (12/18, Bedard) reports, "Tom DeLay's back, this time on the Internet. Friends tell us that" Delay "this week unveils TomDeLay.com, where he'll blog - DeLay's Daily - on newsy issues and build a coalition he's calling Grassroots, Action, and Information Network. Sources said the right-leaning Texan will give GAIN members insider information on the conservative movement and urge them to step in on key issues."

Washington State Officials Moving To "Plain" Language. USA Today/AP (12/11, 18A, Corte) reports Washington state officials "want to deploy changes to alleviate state personnel's employment of acronyms, jargon and legalese that routinely pervade interfaces with constituents. Or, in plain speak: Talk to the public as you would talk to any other person — simply, and in clear language."

Waste Company's Name On Arena Concerns Some In Utah. The New York Times (12/11, Stolz, 1.16M) reports some in Utah "fear that a recent change in the name of the city's professional basketball arena may create for Utah...associations with corruption and nuclear waste. ... [I]n November, a hazardous waste services company based here, EnergySolutions," won the naming rights contract for home of the Utah Jazz. The company's president "is looking to overcome the negative publicity that the company, known until 10 months ago as Envirocare of Utah, has received over its operation of a large nuclear waste facility in the Utah desert."

Key Commission's Report To Recommend Overhaul Of Education Standards. Time (12/18, Wallis, Steptoe, 4.03M), in its cover story titled "How to Bring Our Schools Out of the 20th Century," writes, "This week…the New Commission on the Skills of the American Workforce, a high-powered, bipartisan assembly of Education Secretaries and business, government and other education leaders, releases a blueprint for rethinking American education from pre-K to 12 and beyond to better prepare students to thrive in the global economy. While that report includes some controversial proposals, there is nonetheless a remarkable consensus among educators and business and policy leaders on one key conclusion: we need to bring what we teach and how we teach into the 21st century. Right now we're aiming too low. Competency in reading and math--the focus of so much No Child Left Behind (NCLB) testing -- is the meager minimum. Scientific and technical skills are, likewise, utterly necessary but insufficient. Today's economy demands not only a high-level competence in the traditional academic disciplines but also what might be called 21st century skills."

WPost Says Maryland, Virginia Should Adopt Public Smoking Ban. In an editorial, the Washington Post (12/11, A18, 690K) says, "State lawmakers in Maryland and Virginia may have heard later than most, but the debate over the health effects of secondhand smoke is over. A landmark report by the surgeon general in the summer confirmed that breathing in smoky bars, restaurants or waiting rooms causes lung cancer and heart disease, not to mention chronic coughs, irritated nostrils and, for pregnant women who wait on tables or tend bars in smoke-filled establishments, babies with lower birth weights. The report also poured cold water on complaints from restaurant and bar owners: There is growing evidence that more people will frequent restaurants and bars when a smoking ban is in place."

LATimes Sees Long Road Ahead On "Medical Records Morass." The Los Angeles Times (12/11, 850K) editorializes, "Your medical records can save your life, or they can almost kill you. So the prospect of making them more easily accessible is at once comforting and scary -- and a new effort to convert them into digital form will raise the stakes on both counts." Five major corporations who "provide health benefits to 2.5 million people announced plans last week to gather employees' records from medical groups, hospitals, insurers and laboratories, then store them online. Employees can add or delete information to correct errors and fill in blanks." The main objective of the Dossia program "is to help them give complete, accurate information to their healthcare providers." The "most important contribution Dossia is likely to make…is that it will show how much more work needs to be done throughout the industry to solve the medical records morass in a way that works for doctors and patients alike."

Dobson Comments On Mary Cheney's Pregnancy. In an essay for Time (12/18, 4.03M), Focus on the Family's James Dobson writes, "A number of social conservatives, myself included, have recently been asked to respond to the news that Mary Cheney, the Vice President's daughter, is pregnant with a child she intends to raise with her lesbian partner. Implicit in this issue is an effort to get us to criticize the Bush Administration or the Cheney family. … With all due respect to Cheney and her partner, Heather Poe, the majority of more than 30 years of social-science evidence indicates that children do best on every measure of well-being when raised by their married mother and father."

Retired CBS Correspondent Names Source Of Vietnam War "Bombshell" Story. In an op-ed for the New York Times (12/11, 1.16M), retired CBS News correspondent Murray Fromson remembers an August 7, 1967, New York Times story that proved to be "a bombshell that resonated in both Washington and Saigon, caused consternation in the United States Army and the intelligence community and gradually altered perceptions of American success or failure for the remainder of the Vietnam War." Fromson identifies the anonymous general who told him and the Times' R. W. Apple, Jr., "We've reached a stalemate and we should find a dignified way out." Fromson says the "officer in question, then a three-star general, now 90 years old and retired and living in Hawaii, is Frederick Weyand."

Media Trends Criticized. In a Wall Street Journal 12/11, A18) op-ed, Dow Jones Chairman Peter Kann says the media are "need of some mending. At its best news informs and enlightens the citizens of a free society and thereby safeguards and strengthens our democracy. At its worst -- dishonest, unfair, irresponsible -- the media has potential to erode the public trust on which its own success depends and to corrode the democratic system of which it is so indispensably a part." Kann then touches on "10 current trends in the mass media that ought to disturb us." Among other things, Kann criticizes the "blurring of the lines between journalism and entertainment," the "blurring of lines between news and opinion," the "blending of news and advertising, sponsorships or other commercial relationships," the "exaggerated tendency toward pessimism," and "social orthodoxy, or political correctness."

Annan Expected To Deliver Harsh Critique Of US In Farewell. USA Today (12/11, A1, Slavin, 2.27M) reports on its front page that in his farewell address today, retiring United Nations Secretary-General Kofi Annan "plans to deliver a tough critique of President Bush's policies" and "accuse the administration of trying to secure the United States from terrorism in part by dominating other nations through force, committing what he termed human rights abuses and taking military action without broad international support." Though Annan has "long been a critic of the war in Iraq and other Bush foreign policies," the speech is expected to be "among his toughest" and is "unusual for a U.N. secretary-general concluding his tenure."

Annan Outlines "Five Lessons" Learned During Leadership. Writing in an op-ed for the Washington Post (12/11, A19, 690K), Annan outlines "five lessons" he has learned during his 10 year tenure as UN secretary general. Among them, Annan says are the lessons that "in today's world we are all responsible for each other's security" and "each other's welfare." He also notes that "both security and prosperity depend on respect for human rights and the rule of law." His "fourth lesson, therefore, is that governments must be accountable for their actions, in the international as well as the domestic arena." However, Annan says such accountability can be achieved "only through multilateral institutions," which "must be organized in a fair and democratic way, giving the poor and the weak some influence over the actions of the rich and the strong. … More than ever, Americans, like the rest of humanity, need a functioning global system. Experience has shown, time and again, that the system works poorly when the United States remains aloof but it functions much better when there is farsighted US leadership."

Bolton's Position Expected To Stay Empty For Months. The Washington Post (12/11, A17, Kamen, 690K) "In the Loop" column reports that that "it's beginning to look like the post of US ambassador to the United Nations is once again going to be vacant for several months." Kamen says "unless President Bush uses his recess appointment powers once again, a new ambassador probably won't make it through the Senate much before March, and that's if the eventual nominee isn't controversial." As a result, deputy ambassador Alejandro Wolf "looks to be acting ambassador for a bit."

US May Soon Seek UN Vote On Iran Sanctions. The AP (12/11, Jahn) reports Washington "and its closest Western allies" may soon call a vote on UNSC sanctions against Iran, "even at the risk that Russia and China may abstain or veto the measures," officials said Sunday. An unidentified US official said American officials, along with the French and British counterparts, are "talking about a vote as soon as possible." Meanwhile, a second US official said the Russians "now want even more concessions," including "insisting that any resolution not mention tentative Russian plans to build a second reactor for the Iranians." The Russians also want to" limit any sanctions to three months, after which they would be reviewed," the official said.

State Department Used Google When Compiling Iran Sanctions List. In a front page article titled "Seeking Iran Intelligence, US Tries Google," the Washington Post (12/11, A1, Linzer, 690K) reports that "when the State Department recently asked the CIA for names of Iranians who could be sanctioned for their involvement in a clandestine nuclear weapons program, the agency refused, citing a large workload and a desire to protect its sources and tradecraft. Frustrated, the State Department assigned a junior Foreign Service officer to find the names another way -- by using Google." According to three officials, "those with the most hits under search terms such as 'Iran and nuclear'…became targets for international rebuke Friday when a sanctions resolution circulated at the United Nations."

Arab Leaders To Start Joint Nuclear Energy Program. The New York Times (12/11, Fattah, 1.16M) reports, "Arab leaders, meeting in the Saudi capital, Riyadh, on Sunday, said they intended to start a joint nuclear energy development program, a move certain to heighten concerns over a possible race for nuclear power in the oil-rich Persian Gulf. Leaders of the Gulf Cooperation Council concluded a two-day summit meeting in Riyadh on Sunday, agreeing to study how to proceed with development of such capacity." The Times adds, "Publicly, officials of the gulf council said the development of a nuclear energy program would help meet their rising demand for electricity, despite the huge oil reserves. ... But analysts and officials said the announcement had a different purpose -- to warn the United States not to acquiesce to Iran's nuclear ambitions as pressure grows on the Bush administration to reach out to Iran for help in stabilizing Iraq."

Will Regards Ahmadinejad As 2006's "Most Consequential" Person. Newsweek's George Will (12/18) writes, "How gruesome was 2006? The year's most consequential person was Iran's president, who says the Holocaust did not happen and vows to complete it. Regarding his nuclear aspirations, Mahmoud Ahmadinejad, whose manias are leavened with realism, treated the United Nations as a figment of the imagination of a fiction — the 'international community.'"

Hezbollah Issues Deadline As Beirut Protests Grow. NBC Nightly News (12/10, story 9, 0:15, Seigenthaler, 9.87M) reported, "In Lebanon anti-government pressure grows. Hundreds of thousands turned out for a massive rally in Beirut following a call by the Hezbollah-led opposition to step up efforts to bring down the US backed government there." The AP (12/11, Ghattas, Karam) reports that Lebanese Prime Minister Fuad Saniora was given "an ultimatum of a 'few days' to…form a national unity government with a big role for Hezbollah or face an escalating campaign to oust him." Despite the "heated rhetoric," the AP says Sunday's protests "remained peaceful and left the door open to the possibility of a settlement."

The Washington Post (12/11, A13, Shadid, 690K) said Naim Kassem, the deputy leader of Hezbollah, addressing "the biggest crowds yet in downtown Beirut," urged Saniora to "hold a news conference tonight or tomorrow…and announce [his] resignation as a gesture to preserve the unity of the Lebanese people and rejection of foreign tutelage." McClatchy (12/11, Lasseter) says demonstrators threatened "an escalation in a siege on the prime minister's headquarters" if he refused to resign. McClatchy notes that "while accounts vary of what the heightened tactics could consist of -- a government worker's strike and a storming of the headquarters have both been mentioned -- it's clear that the nation is headed toward a breaking point."

ABC World News (12/10, story 3, 2:15, Harris, 8.78M) said Sunday's protests "threatened to bring down the government." ABC (Dinnick) said Lebanon has become "another battleground where US interests are clashing with Iranian and Syrian agendas. Hezbollah leader Hassan Nasrallah promised the rallies will stay peaceful, but there are fears Lebanon will once again slide into violence, so an international mediator was called in to get both sides talking but there may be not much to discuss." The Los Angeles Times (12/11, Stack, 850K) says the protestors' "crushing show of political strength came carefully packaged with a harsh threat: Time for a political compromise is running out."

The New York Times (12/11, A3, Slackman, 1.16M) notes that "in many ways, Hezbollah has adopted a strategy that has been cheered by the White House in the past, in places like Ukraine, and even Lebanon, leaning on large, peaceful crowds to force unpopular governments to resign and pave the way for elections. But this time Washington and its allies have said the protest amounts to a coup d'état, fueling charges that the United States supports democratic practices only when its allies are winning."

USA Today (12/11, A12, Stinson, 2.27M) says "pressure on the government could increase today" as Hezbollah is expected to "call for a work strike" that "could close Beirut's international airport and shipping ports and slow other public services."

WSJournal Says Hezbollah Committed War Crimes In Lebanon. In an editorial, the Wall Street Journal (12/11, 2.04M) notes the release of "a remarkable report by retired Lieutenant Colonel Reuven Erlich of Israel's Intelligence and Terrorism Information Center. Relying heavily on captured Hezbollah documents, onsite and aerial photography and other first-hand evidence, the report shows how the Shiite group put innocent civilians at risk by deliberately deploying its forces in cities, towns and often private homes." The report also shows "how the use of civilian cover was explicitly part of Hezbollah's strategy." Such evidence, the Journal writes, demonstrates that "Hezbollah, not Israel, that is guilty of war crimes here." Beyond the war in Lebanon, the Journal says "these images suggest how Islamists seek to use the restraint of Western powers against them." Therefore, it says "our political leadership needs to speak as candidly as Israelis now are speaking about this enemy strategy, so the American people can understand and be steeled against this new civilian battleground."

Carter Defends Use Of "Apartheid" To Describe The Plight Of The Palestinians. In an interview with Newsweek's Eleanor Clift (12/18) former president Carter said of his new book "Palestine: Peace Not Apartheid," that "one of the purposes of the book was to provoke discussion, which is very rarely heard in this country, and to open up some possibility that we could rejuvenate or restart the peace talks in Israel that have been absent for six years." Asked if he "agonized" over the use of the term "apartheid," Carter responded, "Not really, because I knew that's an accurate description of what's going on in Palestine. I would say that the plight of the Palestinians now — the confiscation of their land, that they're being suppressed completely against voicing their disapproval of what's happening, the building of the wall that intrudes deep within their territory, the complete separation of Israelis from the Palestinians — all of those things in many ways are worse than some of the aspects of apartheid in South Africa."

ISG Characterized As Naïve Regarding Arab Regard For Palestinians. Time's Lisa Beyer (12/18) writes, "In lumping the Iraq mess in with the Palestinian problem -- and suggesting the first could not be fixed unless the second was too -- the Baker-Hamilton commission lent credibility to a corrosive myth: that the fundamental problem in the Arab world is the plight of the Palestinians. It is a falsehood perpetuated not just by the likes of Saddam Hussein and Osama bin Laden, who came late to the slogan after their actual beefs…gained insufficient traction in the Arab world. … In a decade of reporting in the region, I found it rarely took more than the arching of an eyebrow to get the most candid of Arab thinkers to acknowledge that the tears shed for the Palestinians today outside the West Bank and Gaza are of the crocodile variety."

Saudi Minister's Comments Suggest OPEC May Further Cut Output. The Financial Times (12/11, Hoyos) reports, "Two years ago Saudi Arabia, the world's biggest oil exporter, opened its spigots and let supply out-pace demand. The result was a gradual build up in oil inventories in the US, Europe and several Asian oil-consuming countries." But "[t]his month Ali Naimi, the country's influential oil minister, appeared abruptly to reverse that accommodating policy. At a meeting in Cairo he told reporters that the market was 'significantly' oversupplied." High inventories worry "Naimi because, as the spare-oil cushion in consuming countries has grown, some of the power to influence world oil prices has shifted from [OPEC] to its customers." Naimi's "utterance and the immediate echo of agreement from other ministers in Cairo is the best indication yet that the kingdom and Opec are seriously considering another cut to further trim the inventories outside their control."

Expectations Low For Six-Party North Korea Talks. The Wall Street Journal (12/11, A12, Ramstad, 2.04M) reports Pyongyang will return to the six party talks "in Beijing next Monday. But expectations are low that the meeting, the first such one in 13 months, can produce a breakthrough, reducing tensions with neighbors and the US." At the talks, the US is "ready to offer more specific incentives to North Korea than were agreed to in September 2005," but "even with offers of big political and economic incentives," the Journal says Pyongyang is "unlikely to end its nuclear program quickly." Assistant Secretary Hill, "struck a cautious tone in discussing expectations for next week's meeting." In an email, Hill said, "We've got some things we need done, and I suspect they will have some of their own ideas for what they want from the process. So we'll see what we can come up with."

AFP (12/11, Malakunas) reports the State Department announced late on Sunday that the talks would resume "around December 16" in Beijing, with a firm date expected to be confirmed Monday. Spokeswoman Joanne Moore said Washington expected the talks to focus on "implementing an agreement in September last year when the North agreed to give up its nuclear program." Meanwhile, the AP (12/11, Kim) reports that the talks "are likely to resume in the week starting Dec. 18," South Korea's top nuclear envoy said Sunday. Chun Yung-woo told The AP that he expects the talks to resume "in the week starting Dec. 18, but that consultations are still under way and China will announce the date soon."

Bush Says Vietnam Trade Deal Marks "Significant Step." The Financial Times (12/11, Kazmin, Callan) reports Vietnamese and US business leaders "hailed a US Congressional vote Sunday to permanently normalize trade relations with Vietnam, the final step on the long road to reconciliation between the two countries after their bitter war 30 years ago." President Bush said the development "marks a significant step forward in the process of normalizing relations with Vietnam, and will benefit both our nations." USTR Susan Schwab said the bill "shows that contrary to conventional wisdom, Democrats and Republicans, the administration and Congress, can work together to further our vital trade agenda."

China's Growth Threatens Role Of Foreign Investment. The Wall Street Journal (12/11, A1, Batson, 2.04M) reports in a front page article that China's entry into the World Trade Organization, "five years ago today, sparked an economic expansion that is the envy of the world. But now, that very growth is posing new problems for China and its increasingly uneasy trading partners." The Journal notes that "by becoming more open, China has become stronger and more prosperous. But the growing size and sophistication of its domestic economy have made the outside world less important to China's economic vigor," raising the "important question: Will China continue to be ever-more welcoming to foreign investment in the years ahead?" Even as China has begun to take "a more active role in international affairs, its economic strategy has shifted inward," and Treasury Secretary Henry Paulson's visit to Beijing this week is "part of a continuing effort by China's trading partners to deal with this new reality."

The Financial Times (12/11, Beattie, McGregor) notes that as China marks its five-year anniversary, China's "challenges will, if anything, increase rather than diminish now its five-year transition period is over," as "evinced by US saber-rattling ahead of its official mission to Beijing this week headed by Hank Paulson." The milestone marks a difference that is "more symbolic than practical, though it does coincide with several deadlines for commitments, such as opening up the banking sector," the Times notes.

Paulson Says Economic Relationship Key To US, Chinese Prosperity. Treasury Secretary Paulson writes in the Washington Post (12/11, A19, 690K) that "managing our economic relationship with China to ensure both nations benefit is vital to our nation's future prosperity. A market-based economy in China, with sustainable economic growth and full participation in rules-based international trade, is in our best interest -- and in the interest of the Chinese people." Paulson says the goal of this week's delegation is "to advance our common interests and find solutions to issues that strain our relationship." For example, he says "transparency and respect for the rule of law are core principles that affect all economic policy and trade issues," and that by "working on these principles across government ministries can enhance our ability to reach agreement on a number of key issues that we negotiate ministry-by-ministry."

Schwab Says China's Economic Record "Mixed," But Shows Signs Of Improvement. For her part, USTR Susan Schwab writes in the Financial Times (12/11) that China's anniversary "provides the opportunity to take stock -- through a congressionally mandated report issued on Monday by the office of the US Trade Representative -- of China's integration into the global economy and its compliance with WTO obligations." China's record, she notes, is "profoundly mixed," but Schwab says China has "moved with resolve to reform some of its economic and governmental structures over the past five years." Schwab also notes that during this week's meetings, administration officials will "clearly convey our view that a slowdown in reform hinders China's development and undermines the health of our bilateral ties." A strong trade relationship with China, she says, "depends on China's continued reform, and on a commitment to expand free and fair trade based on decisions by the actors in the market -- not by bureaucrats."

Mallaby Urges Sanctions For Currency Manipulations. Washington Post (12/11, A19, 690K) columnist Sebastian Mallaby says China's membership in the WTO "has gone astonishingly well," but "an awkward question hovers over Treasury Secretary Henry Paulson's China trip this week: How to deal with a country that appears to distort trade not through tariffs or quotas but through currency and savings policies?" This dilemma, he writes, "reflects a lopsidedness in the rules of globalization. To keep the trade playing field balanced, the WTO presides over a vast apparatus of quasi-law governing subsidies and tariffs; violators can be hauled in front of WTO tribunals. But there is no equivalent mechanism, other than a dormant provision buried in the charter of the International Monetary Fund, to punish countries that skew trade by manipulating their currencies. And there is no sanction at all for pursuing a growth strategy that relies on exports more than domestic consumption."

Rights Group Urges China To End Legal Restrictions. The New York Times (12/11, Kahn, 1.16M) reports that rules "requiring Chinese lawyers to submit to government supervision when representing clients in politically delicate cases have dealt a serious blow to the country's legal system and should be rescinded," Human Rights Watch said in a report to be issued Monday. The rights group said the rules, known as "guiding opinions," effectively "shut down the legal system to people fighting official land confiscations, forced relocation, corruption, pollution and other politically delicate matters in China's one-party system."

Local Elections Ease Pressure On Taiwan's Leader. The Wall Street Journal (12/11, A14, Dean, Piling, 2.04M) reports that a "better-than-expected performance by Taiwan's governing party in weekend mayoral elections could ease political pressure on President Chen Shui-bian and complicate the opposition's efforts to win back control of the government…in 2008 presidential elections." The elections for mayor in Taiwan's two biggest cities, Taipei and Kaohsiung, were "watched closely as indicators of public support for Mr. Chen's Democratic Progressive Party following a spate of corruption scandals affecting people close to the president." However, the Times cautions that the results are "far from signaling an end to Mr. Chen's troubles," but analysts "said the mixed outcome could at least mean that Mr. Chen avoids pressure from his party to resign before his second and final four-year term ends in 2008."

Former Chilean Dictator Pinochet Dead At 91. The death of Augusto Pinochet Ugarte, the former military dictator of Chile, receives prominent and extensive coverage across major media. ABC World News (12/10, story 5, 1:55, Berman, 8.78M) called Pinochet "one of the world's most notorious dictators," saying he "kept brutal control over his country and his opponents for almost 20 years. Now victims of his regime will never see him brought to justice." NBC Nightly News (12/10, story 6, 0:35, Seigenthaler, 9.87M) called his tenure a "17-year reign of terror."

At the start of its 2,600-word report, the New York Times (12/11, Kandell, 1.16M) says the "brutal dictator who repressed and reshaped Chile for nearly two decades and became a notorious symbol of human rights abuse and corruption" died Sunday at age 91, "a week after being hospitalized and undergoing angioplasty and another operation after an acute heart attack." The Washington Post (12/11, A1, Reel, Smith, 690K) says in the lead of its 2,000-word story that Pinochet's government "murdered and tortured thousands during his repressive 17-year rule." The Los Angeles Times (12/11, Rotella, McDonnell, 850K) starts a 2,700-word report by saying Pinochet was the "embodiment of the brutal and intensely anti-communist South American military dictator."

The Chicago Tribune (12/11, McMahon, 617K) says Pinochet ended his life "weakened by ill health, pursued by government prosecutors and abandoned by all but his most loyal defenders." McClatchy (12/11, Hall, Chang, Hughes) says he was "hounded by human rights groups until the end and defended with equal zeal by the armed forces." The Christian Science Monitor (12/11, Ross, 59K) and the AP (12/10) are among others reporting on Pinochet's death.

The Washington Post (12/11, A16, Franklin, 690K) reports "thousands of jubilant Chileans streamed into the streets of Santiago" after learning that Pinochet had died. Many "danced and popped open champagne, while caravans of cars with horns blaring toured the capital for hours." The New York Times (12/11, Bonnefoy, 1.16M) says that while "thousands of demonstrators took to the streets in celebration," within hours "the revelry was marred by violence, with confrontations breaking out and the police using tear gas and water cannons against a large group marching toward the presidential palace."

More Commentary On Pinochet's Death. The New York Times (12/11, 1.16M) writes in an editorial that "the central puzzle" about Pinochet "was that until recently he retained admirers in Chile and abroad, especially among people emerging from Communism. He masked his corruption and brutality by tailoring his level of repression to just what he needed to retain power and prestige."

The Los Angeles Times (12/11, 850K) editorializes, "It's a coincidence that Jeane Kirkpatrick" and Pinochet "died only a few days apart. But in death as in life, the two are associated with a political theory that defined the early days of the neoconservative movement in the United States. Unfortunately for Kirkpatrick, its author, the theory proved to be dead wrong. The idea was that right-wing authoritarian governments were much better bets for conversion to democracy than left-wing totalitarian ones."

USA Today (12/11, 21A, 2.27M) editorializes that Pinochet and Saddam Hussein "have long been members of the club of tyrants who killed thousands of their citizens. The difference between them emerged Sunday when Pinochet died. … Numerous attempts to bring him to justice failed. Saddam, sitting in a Baghdad jail cell after a court sentenced him to death, must surely be envious."

In a Los Angeles Times (12/11, 850K) op-ed, USC Annenberg School for Communication visiting professor Marc Cooper, who worked as a translator to Chilean President Salvador Allende, overthrown by Pinochet in 1973, writes, "Not with little irony did the gods choose to reclaim former Chilean dictator Augusto Pinochet on Sunday, which was International Human Rights Day. … If human justice failed on previous occasions to fully snare Pinochet, the greater forces of nature and biology this time imposed the maximum sentence -- and on the most appropriate day of the calendar."

Ros-Lehtinen Denies Urging Killing Of Castro. The New York Times/AP (12/11, A23) reports Florida Rep. Ileana Ros-Lehtinen "says a video showing her calling for Fidel Castro's assassination is fake, a charge denied Sunday by the film's director." The congresswoman appears in the 28-second clip made available on the Internet by the makers of a new British documentary, "638 Ways to Kill Castro." In it, she says: "I welcome the opportunity of having anyone assassinate Fidel Castro and any leader who is oppressing the people." However, Ros-Lehtinen says the filmmakers spliced clips together to make the sound bite.

American Journalist's Murder Draws Attention To Mexico's Justice System. The New York Times (12/11, A17, McKinley, Moynihan, 1.16M) reports the investigation into the death of American journalist Bradley Roland Will last month in Mexico "seemed cut and dried" until Dec. 1 "when a judge freed two of the men photographed shooting at the protesters, citing a lack of evidence." In addition to "underscoring how infrequently killings of journalists and antigovernment protesters are solved in Mexico," the case has "drawn widespread attention because it reveals the sad clash of left-wing idealism…with the murky realities of Mexican politics." The protesters said he was killed by "government-backed paramilitary thugs who had already killed a dozen others since the conflict here began in May," and "charge that his death is still more proof that the state government remains repressive, its prosecutors willing to cover up crimes by government officials."

Darfur Crisis Threatens To Draw Neighboring Nations Into Regional Conflict. The Christian Science Monitor (12/11, Schapiro, 59K) reports the crisis in Darfur has "exploded in recent weeks, and now threatens to drag fragile neighboring countries into a regional war. Both Chad and the Central African Republic (CAR) have become engulfed in fighting that involves a toxic mix of rebel groups, government forces, armed militias, and civilians." In eastern Chad, "hundreds of aid workers have been evacuated due to increased hostilities between military forces and anti-government rebel groups, while Arab militiamen have ventured deeper into the country to conduct assaults, resulting in the displacement of nearly 100,000 Chadians. And atrocities committed by a variety of rebel groups and armed bandits over the past few months have forced tens of thousands of people from the CAR to cross the border into Chad."

Thirty Killed In Darfur Ambush; Investigators Taken Hostage. The Washington Post/AP (12/11, A16) reports militiamen "ambushed a refugee convoy in western Darfur, killing about 30 civilians, and African Union peacekeepers investigating the attack were taken hostage by rioters," the AU and the United Nations said Sunday. An international aid worker said that the assailants were janjaweed. Meanwhile, African Union spokesman Noureddine Mezni said "rioters angry over the deaths were holding captive a helicopter crew and eight peacekeepers sent to investigate."

Halliburton Employees Attacked In Algeria. The Houston Chronicle/AP (12/11) reports that two vehicles carrying employees of an affiliate of Houston-based Halliburton co. were attacked Sunday near Algiers, killing one Algerian driver, witnesses said. The "full extent of the casualties" in the attack was not immediately clear. Nine American employees of BRC, or Brown & Root-Condor, were returning to a Sheraton Hotel from their offices when they were attacked.

Indonesia's Aceh Province To Hold First Election Since Tsunami. The Christian Science Monitor (12/11, Montlake, 59K) reports that voters in the Indonesian province of Aceh go to the polls Monday, "nearly two years after a devastating tsunami scoured its coastline and released an outpouring of international aid for the stricken survivors." The ballot is the first since the signing in August 2005 of "a landmark peace accord between the Indonesian government and armed rebels, who agreed to lay down their weapons in return for political autonomy for Aceh." Former rebels are now "competing in electoral races for the governorship and 19 district mayors and regents."

The New York Times (12/11, A4, Mydans, 1.16M) reports the tsunami "seems to have taken the fire out of a 29-year conflict. A hard-won peace agreement that made the election possible appears to be holding. There are still obstacles ahead, but if the process continues to move forward, an armed insurgency group will perform the rare feat of transforming itself into a political party within the government it opposed." The Times notes that "even as post-tsunami reconstruction has bogged down in bureaucratic confusion and corruption, the dismantling of the war has proceeded quickly with what appears to be a genuine commitment from both sides."

Bangladesh Deploys Troops To Quell Pre-election Violence. The New York Times (12/11, Sengupta, 1.16M) reports briefly that the interim government in Bangladesh, "faced with mounting opposition party protests, has deployed the army in what appears to be an attempt to check pre-election violence." The order by President Iajuddin Ahmed was issued Saturday night, "on the eve of opposition party threats to surround the presidential palace." Although political violence has "become routine in Bangladesh," it "remains unclear to what extent the president enjoys the full backing of the interim government in his decision to pull out the army."

Economist Awarded Nobel Peace Prize For Fight Against Poverty. ABC World News (12/10, story 4, 0:15, Harris, 8.78M) reported, "Bangladeshi economist Mohammed Yunus, accepting this year's Noble Peace Prize for his work helping the poor with small loans, expressed hope that his award would inspire new thinking about fighting terrorism." USA Today/AP (12/11) notes that Yunus "shared the award with his Grameen Bank for helping people rise above poverty by giving them microcredit" loans.

NBC Nightly News (12/10, story 11, 0:35, Seigenthaler, 9.87M) reported, "At the Nobel Peace Prize ceremony in Sweden, awards were handed out to six Americans for physics, medicine, and economics and to a Turkish author for literature. The Peace Prize was presented in Norway to an economist from Bangladesh known as the banker to the poor. In his acceptance speech, Mohammed Unis said the world should get on with fighting poverty and stop wasting money fighting wars."

German Police Investigating Russian Businessman Who Met With Litvinenko. The New York Times (12/11, Myers, Landler, 1.16M) reports German authorities "announced Sunday that they had begun a criminal investigation of" Russian businessman Dmitri V. Kovtun "after finding traces of polonium 210 around Hamburg beginning on Oct. 28 — four days before he met in London with" Alexander Litvinenko. The Times notes the announcement "raised the possibility that the polonium was carried from Moscow to London by way of Germany."

The Wall Street Journal (12/11, A14, Crawford, Cullison, Mollenkamp, 2.04M) reports, "Scotland Yard, Russian police and about 300 German police and other officials are involved in the investigation of Mr. Litvinenko's death, raising diplomatic tensions between Russia and the West. Yesterday, investigators in Hamburg complained that Russian authorities aren't cooperating and haven't responded to their request for access to the Aeroflot plane that transported Mr. Kovtun to Hamburg from Moscow, said Thomas Menzel, head of Hamburg's special investigation squad for the case."

The Washington Post (12/11, A13, Smiley, Finn, 690K) reports Menzel "said Kovtun, a Soviet army veteran and business consultant who had lived in Germany for 12 years, flew to Hamburg from Moscow on an Aeroflot flight. 'Aeroflot is not available to us. It is probable that he was already contaminated when he flew on the plane,' Menzel said. 'We have not received any answers to our questions so far' from Russian authorities." USA Today/AP (12/11) reports, "German prosecutors did not say whether they suspect Kovtun might have been involved in Litvinenko's death. But they said they were investigating him on suspicion he may have improperly handled radioactive material."

Litvinenko Said To Have Converted To Islam. Time (12/18, McAllister, 4.03M) reports, "Several close friends said [Alexander] Litvinenko had converted to Islam a few days before he died, in a kind of atonement for atrocities Russia (and perhaps Litvinenko himself) had committed in Chechnya, although another doubted any conversion had taken place. Litvinenko's widow Marina had requested a nondenominational service at the graveside, but an imam interrupted the proceedings to perform Islamic rites."

EU Expected To Halt Membership Talks With Turkey. The Wall Street Journal (12/11, A12, Echikson, 2.04M) reports European foreign ministers will meet today in Brussels to consider "a last-ditch Turkish proposal to end a deadlock over Cyprus that threatens Turkey's membership talks with the European Union." EU ambassadors failed to reach a decision last week, and diplomats in Ankara "expect foreign ministers to fail, pushing the issue to EU heads of state who meet Dec. 15 and 16 in Brussels" who are expected "to suspend parts of Turkey's membership negotiations." The Times notes that "pessimists fear the partial pause will evolve into a more permanent freeze, turning Turkey toward nationalism and away from the West."

Similarly, the Christian Science Monitor (12/11, Schleifer, 59K) says EU leaders "appear likely to decide at a summit later this week to partially suspend talks on Turkey's membership." But as EU foreign ministers prepare to discuss the issue, "some observers -- particularly in Europe -- see Turkey's stance as self-defeating obstinancy. But others say it is in fact fueled by a greater sense of self-confidence, the result of a surging economy and an increased sense of its own growing strategic importance, which may dampen the effects of any rupture with the EU."

NATO Urged To Extend Membership To Balkan Nations. Former Croatian prime minister, Miomir Zuzul, writes in the Wall Street Journal (12/11, 2.04M) that although the "search for peace and democratic reform in the Middle East is NATO's most important challenge," this focus on security and reform "outside Europe threatens to sideline NATO's core responsibility to act within Europe." Zuzul notes that the Alliance "contributed to the economic growth and democratization of postwar Western Europe," which "makes it imperative that NATO's doors remain open to new European members hoping to make a similar journey from the days of dictatorship, discord and privation to democracy, peace and prosperity." He warns that while "a key portion of the European geopolitical space -- the Balkans -- remains unsettled," the "best, the only, way to stabilize what otherwise might become Europe's ghetto is the region's gradual integration into NATO."

TERRORISM NEWS:

Zuckerman Contends Children Of Immigrants Represent Terrorism Threat. U.S. News and World Report's Mortimer Zuckerman (12/18) writes, "Today all eyes are on Iraq. It's called the center of the war on terrorism, but it must not monopolize our attention. We need a third eye because we are now less likely to be attacked by international terrorists than by homegrown American citizens, self-radicalized individuals who are members of groups inspired by al Qaeda propaganda. … The threat is from second- and third-generation children of immigrants, fluent in English and accustomed to American society but using the legal rights of U.S. citizenship to rebel from within. They have learned the Koran on the Internet; they lead small clusters of 20 to 25 mostly young men who share feelings of alienation, a longing for self-importance, a need to be a part of some larger group or cause. They have developed what is called 'adversarial assimilation.'"

HOMELAND RESPONSE:

Imams Seek Out-Of-Court Settlement With US Airways. The Washington Times (12/11, Hudson, 88K) reports, "A group of Muslim imams is seeking an out-of-court settlement with US Airways, saying they should not have been removed from a Minnesota-to-Phoenix flight last month and were not behaving suspiciously. Five of the six Islamic religious leaders have retained the Council on American-Islamic Relations for legal representation and are seeking a 'mutually agreeable' resolution, said Nihad Awad, CAIR executive director. US Airways scheduled a meeting with the imams on Dec. 4 to discuss the incident, but the men canceled it and hired the activist group to act as legal counsel." The Times notes, "The imams and CAIR officials maintain that press reports as well as Internet sites and blogs have circulated charges they say misrepresent the facts of the Nov. 20 incident. … CAIR says the men were handcuffed for several hours and is also demanding hearings on religious and ethnic profiling at airports."

Governors Demand Congress Make Changes To Real ID Act. U.S. News and World Report (12/18, Marek, 2.03M) reports, "Back in May 2005, few really considered the broad implications of the Real ID Act, a bill designed to improve the security of driver's licenses in every state. Attached to an emergency funding measure for the Iraq war, Real ID slipped through Congress and was signed by the president-with little scrutiny but big effects. … These days Real ID is hard to miss, and the nation's governors are up in arms over it. In less than two years, it will require states to begin issuing upgraded driver's licenses to roughly 245 million Americans. Although most governors say they'd like to improve identification security, many say the Real ID Act creates a multibillion-dollar unfunded mandate and deadlines that are impossible to meet. It may also mean longer lines at Department of Motor Vehicles offices nationwide and new costs for consumers. Governors like Mike Huckabee of Arkansas hope the new Congress 'will throw us a lifeline' and make changes to Real ID."

Post-Katrina Hispanic Baby Boom Surprises New Orleans. The New York Times (12/11, Porter, 1.16M) reports that in the "latest twist to the demographic transformation of New Orleans since it was swamped by Hurricane Katrina last year, hundreds of babies are being born to Latino immigrant workers, both legal and illegal, who flocked to the city to toil on its reconstruction." The baby boom "has come as a big surprise — and a financial strain — to this historically black and white city, which before the hurricane had only a small Latino community and virtually no experience of illegal immigration."

WAR NEWS:

Baker, Hamilton Downplay Differences With Bush As They Defend ISG Report. Iraq Study Group co-chairs James Baker and Lee Hamilton appeared on the Sunday political talk shows to defend the report they issued last week and to downplay their differences with the White House. Senators appearing on the shows were largely open to the ISG recommendations.

The Washington Post (12/11, A15, Abramowitz, 690K) says Baker "said for the first time yesterday that the Iraq Study Group remains committed to democracy in Iraq," as he and Hamilton "offered conciliatory words to a Bush administration that has reacted coolly to the panel's key recommendations." Comments on Sunday "appeared part of an effort by Baker and Hamilton to use the Sunday talk shows to play down talk of rifts between the panel and the Bush administration." Baker said he "understands the administration's internal studies call for some of the things his panel urged." Baker also "sought to portray the panel's proposal for a more aggressive Middle East diplomatic effort as less ambitious than its critics have suggested."

The two men appeared on four of the Sunday morning shows. On NBC's Meet the Press (12/10, Russert), Hamilton said that in Iraq "the violence is increasing…more American casualties; basic services of government not being delivered; neighborhoods falling apart; casualties going up. Everywhere you look, it's dire, it's grave, it is deteriorating. And, in a sense, the question is, can we stop the deterioration, not can we improve it." On that same program, Baker said, "All of our military leaders in Iraq and over here recognize that we're not going to win this war militarily. We're going to win it politically." On CNN's Late Edition (12/10, Blitzer), Baker said, "The whole future of Iraq depends upon whether or not the Iraqi government can effect a program of national reconciliation between Kurds, Shia and Sunni."

Bush Intends To "Chart Own Course." NBC Nightly News (12/10, story 3, 2:40, Seigenthaler, 9.87M) reported, "Following the Iraq Study Group report, the President will be getting more advice from his advisors about his options in Iraq." NBC (Ohm) added, "At the same time the President embraces the Iraq Study Group's call for a new way forward in Iraq, there is strong indication he plans to chart his own course relying on his advisors and military commanders. ... President Bush has already distanced himself from the commission's key recommendations, withdrawing combat troops by 2008 and talking directly with Syria and Iran. One scenario the Administration is considering, increasing the number of troops by 20,000. A move that was openly questioned by close ally British Prime Minister Tony Blair." ABC World News (12/10, story 2, 2:25, Harris, 8.78M) reported, "There are signs he may reject many of the recommendations from the Iraq Study Group, whose two principal players went on television repeatedly to defend their report."

Baker Emphasizes "Limited" Nature Of Proposed Talks With Iran And Syria. Regarding the ISG's recommendation that the US reach out to Iran and Syria, Baker said on Meet the Press, "One thing I want to make sure everybody understands…is the limited nature of what we are proposing. … With respect to Iran, we're suggesting doing nothing more than this administration did in connection with Afghanistan. … With respect to Syria, there's a whole long list ever things that we lay out in the report that we think Syria needs to do." On Fox News Sunday (12/10, Wallace), Baker reiterated that point: "These are very limited proposals."

Senators appearing on the Sunday programs were open to the idea of outreach to Tehran and Damascus. Sen. Carl Levin, on CBS' Face the Nation (12/03, Schieffer) said, "We should be very skeptical of Iran doing anything to be helpful to us -- for that matter, Syria being helpful either. We ought to talk to them without any great expectation that they're going to be helpful." Sen. Christopher Dodd said on Fox News Sunday, "We've got a very large agenda in that region, and I think you ought to engage and explore whether or not you can get cooperation on some critical issues. Don't make it conditioned on a bunch of things that aren't going to happen anyway." On that same show, Sen. Sam Brownback said President Bush "really should look at these recommendations very seriously. And it seems to me that what Baker-Hamilton provides us is a chance to kind of reset the table and get a bipartisan buy-in -- and not just a bipartisan buy-in, a global buy-in."

Baker Discusses 2008 Withdrawal Date. During his own Fox News Sunday appearance, Baker was asked how important it is that the US meet the goal of having most military forces out of Iraq by 2008. He replied, "We didn't put out a specific date that was not the Administration's own date. This is the date by which Gen. George Casey said the training and equipping mission would be completed." On CBS, Baker said, "Young American men and women should not be asked to have, as their primary mission there, refereeing a sectarian violence between the various sects in Iraq."

On ABC's This Week (12/10, Stephanopoulos), Sen. Joseph Biden said, "No one, no one, no one but the President and the Vice President is talking about if we're going to draw down American troops. Everyone is talking about how and when. That is a fundamental shift since November 6." Sen. Trent Lott said on CBS that the ISG "did good work. They've come up with some good ideas, and I think we ought to consider it carefully. ... And I also support the idea of milestones."

ISG Stresses "Stability" Over "Democracy." The Christian Science Monitor (12/11, Lafranchi, 59K) reports that President Bush and the ISG have "competing visions": The ISG "places a high priority on restarting the Israeli-Palestinian peace process and reenergizing America's role in it. Mr. Bush, who has never viewed that conflict as ripe for the kind of intense US diplomacy Mr. Baker had dedicated to it, continues to see success in Iraq as the demonstration project for peace and reform in the region." Bush "has not given up on the idea of a functioning democracy as the answer to Iraq's ills - indeed, Weekly Standard editor William Kristol has taken to calling him 'the last neocon.' In stark contrast, the study group's report emphasizes stability as the most pressing need, passing over goals of regional freedom and democracy."

ISG Faults US For Still Lacking Intelligence On Iraqi Foes. The New York Times (12/11, Risen, 1.16M) reports, "Nearly four years after the invasion of Iraq, the United States still does not understand the enemy that American troops are fighting according to last week's report by the Iraq Study Group. The commission's final report harshly criticized United States intelligence officials for failing to answer basic questions about the nature of the Sunni insurgency or the increasingly powerful Shiite militias." The intelligence community "has had some success hunting Al Qaeda in Iraq…but that terrorist organization is small and is not the main enemy confronting American troops." The ISG echoes

"complaints quietly voiced in recent months by a number of current and former American officials, who have warned of the failure by American intelligence officers in Iraq to adequately penetrate the Sunni insurgency." It faults the DIA for rotating "its analysts from one posting to another so frequently that few develop any real depth of understanding of the insurgency" and the administration for failing "to significantly improve on-the-ground intelligence about the enemy" and for regularly underreporting "the level of violence in Iraq."

Smith Reiterates His Criticism Of Bush's Handling Of Iraq War. Sen. Gordon Smith, appearing on ABC's This Week, was asked what "triggered" his bluntly critical speech last week during which he called the administration's Iraq war policies "absurd" and potentially" criminal." Smith answered, "Waking up the other morning and turning on the news and hearing that yet another 10 of our soldiers died the same way that several thousand have…through roadside bombs. And I went from steamed to boiled."

More Commentary. In his Los Angeles Times (12/11, 850K) column, Niall Ferguson writes, "Most commentators have interpreted the report of the Iraq Study Group as a well-crafted admission of defeat. ... Yet anyone who bothers to read the report carefully…can see that it neither proposes 'quitting' Iraq nor pins serious hope on Iranian or Syrian assistance. Quite the reverse. ... Most readers of the report assume that it is directed at Bush. That is wrong. Its principal target audience is Congress," and the aim "is not to persuade a stubborn president to admit defeat. Rather, the report's aim is to convince legislators that withdrawal from Iraq -- no matter how much their constituents may yearn for it -- is not an option."

In his New York Times (12/11, 1.16M) column, Bob Herbert writes, "The primary value of the Baker-Hamilton report is that it embodies, in clear and explicit language, the consensus that has emerged in the U.S. about the current state of the war. It's not so much a blueprint for action as a recognition of reality. ... It is time to pull the troops out of harm's way."

In his Washington Post (12/11, A19, 690K) column, Jackson Diehl writes, "Some people suppose that President Bush's freedom agenda was buried last Wednesday by the report of the Iraq Study Group. In fact, history will show that the administration largely smothered its own baby, even before Iraq's descent into civil war propelled the resurrection of James Baker and other 'realist' friends of Middle Eastern dictators."

Bolten Said To Have Engineered Rumsfeld Ouster, Bush Response To ISG. Newsweek's Weston Kosova (12/18) reports that the "challenge" for the Bush administration following the release of the Iraq Study Group's report "was to make the president appear as though he were taking the release of the report seriously, without necessarily embracing its conclusions. … The change in Bush's approach had its beginnings well before the Baker group put pen to paper. It came about in part because of a slow, careful effort by Bush's closest aides — under the direction of chief of staff Josh Bolten — to convince the president that he had to listen to different voices on Iraq, and ultimately change direction." Kosova continues, "When Bolten took charge of the West Wing last April, he was one of the few people in the White House who were willing to admit that Iraq was broken and that the president was stuck. He worried that Bush had been hearing the same bad advice from the same people for nearly three years. Over the summer, Bolten began the first of his efforts to puncture Bush's bubble by having the president sit down with some of the harshest critics of the war — conservatives who had turned against the effort. … That was just the start. In the weeks before the Republicans lost Congress, while Karl Rove was predicting victory, Bolten tasked a small group of trusted aides to plan for electoral defeat and its aftermath. The first step was to fire the abrasive, out-of-touch Rumsfeld and replace him with straight-talking Robert Gates. The second was to ready a respectful response to the pending Baker-Hamilton report but to downplay its importance by stressing it is just one of several government reports on the war effort that Bush is reviewing."

ISG Report's "Patronizing" Advice Said To Have Engendered "Bitterness" In White House. Time (12/18, Duffy, Allen, 4.03M) reports, "despite all the fanfare, the report was aimed at an audience of one--Bush. For most of the week, he looked none too pleased about the round-the-clock talking-to he was getting. … Within a day, he was putting some distance between himself and the best seller: 'I don't think Jim Baker and Lee Hamilton expect us to accept every recommendation.' That comment reflected the West Wing's exceeding bitterness about the report. Some of the pushback was substantive. The suggestions on how to engage directly with Iran and Syria -- the parts resisted most unambiguously by the President -- were surprisingly specific and prescriptive, not the platitudes the Administration had expected. Bush aides chafed at the patronizing directive."

U.S. News and World Report (12/18, Whitelaw, 2.03M) reports, "It is unclear how many of the group's 79 recommendations President Bush will embrace-or even whether any changes in U.S. policy can have much effect on the ground in Iraq. … Perhaps most damning, the Iraq Study Group blasts the Bush administration for routinely undercounting the violence by, for instance, excluding sectarian attacks when the perpetrator cannot be determined. So while 93 attacks or violent incidents were recorded on one day last July, an Iraq Study Group review turned up 1,100 violent incidents that day."

U.S. News and World Report's Gloria Borger (12/18) writes, "At one point, Vernon Jordan, a skilled Washington insider, put it pretty bluntly to the president, according to a panel member's paraphrase: Jordan: 'What do you mean by victory? When my mama told me to clean the garage, I cleaned the garage because I knew what she meant. But I don't understand what you mean.' Bush: 'You have to speak to the American people with a simple message here. They understand what victory is, and if you come off of it, they'll think you're giving up.' Some members say they were stunned by the response. And when they left, they were puzzled by one more thing: During their entire session, Vice President Dick Cheney--a key architect of the war in Iraq -- never said a word. Not one."

Haass Contends US May Benefit From Lessons Learned From Iraq Experience. In an essay for Time (12/18, 4.03M), Richard Haass, president of the Council on Foreign Relations, writes, "ironically, the winding down of the U.S. involvement in Iraq will have a salutary effect--namely, it will slow the draw on American economic, diplomatic and military resources, all of which are in dire need of replenishment. In fact, U.S. diplomacy will in some ways be liberated as American involvement in Iraq recedes. The U.S. could, if it so chose, be an effective proponent for Arab-Israeli peace . If the U.S. and Iran prove able to cooperate over Iraq, they might manage broader talks on other issues that divide them, including Iran's nuclear program."

ISG Report Said To Expose Bush's "Shortcomings." Newsweek's Jonathan Alter (12/18) writes, "Beyond the headlines and major policy recommendations, the Iraq Study Group's mercifully readable report shows how President Bush's personal shortcomings manifest themselves in appalling miscues on the ground. … This is what happens when you have a president who is incurious and impatient with inconvenient facts he doesn't 'need to know': hundreds of thousands of dead Iraqis, nearly 3,000 dead Americans and what the Baker-Hamilton Commission estimates as a $2 trillion tab for our children."

ISG Goal For Embedded Advisors Called "Wildly Optimistic."

Time (12/18, Kukis, 4.03M) reports, "There are now more than 4,000 U.S. soldiers serving as advisers to Iraqi security forces. If the recommendations made by the Iraq Study Group are put into practice, that number will grow substantially. The Baker commission's report calls for the number of U.S. troops embedded with Iraqi units to increase to as many as 20,000 over the next year. The report argues that boosting the number of advisers will lead to improvements in the quality of Iraqi forces and pave the way for a pullback of all U.S. troops from the front lines by 2008. But based on where Iraq's forces stand today, such a timetable is wildly optimistic. Iraq's 300,000-strong security forces -- in particular the national police, which is overseen by the Interior Ministry -- have been so thoroughly infiltrated by militias that some U.S. trainers will have to bring in new recruits and retrain much of the current batch before they can turn combat responsibilities over to the Iraqis. There are already concerns that by rushing to strengthen the Iraqis, U.S. forces may be ignoring abuses committed by the very people they're training."

Pentagon Has Been Training Officers To Act As Iraq Advisors Since July. Newsweek (12/18, Hirsh, Peraino, Childress, 3.12M) reports that "since July, 11-man squads of U.S. advisers have been going through a crash 60-day training program that is the core of America's effort to draw down its presence in Iraq. The idea: replace the 140,000-strong U.S. combat force there now with smaller, far less visible advisory teams. Embedding as many as 20,000 of these U.S. advisers with Iraqi Army and national police — a fourfold increase over current plans — is the key military recommendation of the Iraq Study Group report just released to thunderous attention. But the U.S. Army doesn't need any prodding. … As the Army ramps up the program, however, its many perils are becoming clearer. Most of the trainees are career U.S. military officers, many of them thirty- to forty something desk jockeys who are logistical wizards, intelligence specialists and administrators. They have all the expertise the Iraqi Army needs and more, but many have barely used their weapons since basic."

Strengthened Militias Likely To Continue Undermining Maliki Government. U.S. News and World Report (12/18, Mulrine, 2.03M) reports, "As the violence in Baghdad grows worse, the militias are gaining strength, in part by promising safety and services for Iraqis in desperate need of both-and by delivering retribution in the tit-for-tat cycle of sectarian attacks by Sunni insurgents and Shiite militias. In its report last week, the bipartisan Iraq Study Group stressed the corrosive effect of Shiite militia activities that 'undermine the authority of the Iraqi government and security forces, as well as the ability of Sunnis to join a peaceful political process.' Reining in the militias is just one of the hurdles to implementing the panel's prescriptions for national reconciliation. The committee's report raises doubts about the willingness and ability of Prime Minister Nouri al-Maliki even to confront the militia problem."

In an interview with U.S. News and World Report (12/18, Mulrine, 2.03M) Lt. Gen. Martin Dempsey, "the senior American commander in Iraq responsible for training and equipping Iraqi security forces," is quoted as saying, "militias exist when in the eyes of the people the standing government isn't providing something-and in this case that something would be security. So we've got to continue to demonstrate to the people by accelerated transition to legitimate Iraqi security force control-because the more the Iraqi government can be seen as being in charge, the more the people will gain confidence in them, and the better off we'll be in terms of dealing with the militias."

US Hopeful Tribal Leaders Can Subdue Insurgents In Anbar. Newsweek (12/18, Childress, 3.12M) reports, "No part of Iraq needs fixing more desperately than insurgency-ravaged Anbar province and its capital, Ramadi. And U.S. forces are increasingly sure it can't be fixed without the help of tribes who have always been more loyal to their sheiks than to the government. Before the 2003 invasion, Saddam Hussein had to buy the sheiks' support with wealth and special privileges, and Anbar's tribes fought fiercely long after he was gone. Then Al Qaeda muscled in, claiming the Sunni-dominated region and killing sheiks who dared to challenge the jihadists' aims. After one well-known tribal leader was assassinated this summer, a group of 15 Ramadi sheiks banded together for survival's sake. They called themselves Sawa — Arabic for 'the awakening' — and cut a deal with the Americans: in exchange for protection against Al Qaeda, they would bring local police ranks up to strength."

Talabani Says ISG Report "An Insult" To Iraqis. Iraqi President Jalal Talabani's strong reaction to the Iraq Study Group was covered by NBC and by several major newspapers. NBC Nightly News (12/10, lead story, 1:55, Maceda, 9.87M) said Talabani "called that report's recommendations an insult to the people of Iraq." Talabani: "I think that Baker and Hamilton is not fair and not just and it contains some very dangerous articles." Maceda: "The report also condemned by anti-US Shiite cleric, Moqtada al Sadr, who said it was designed to divide and finish Iraq. But sectarian violence seems to be doing just that as ethnic cleansing of minority Sunni and Shiite families from formerly mixed areas goes unchecked.

USA Today/AP (12/11, Gamel) reports Talabani continued his criticism of the ISG report, a day after he expressed agreement with Kurdish regional leader Massoud Barzani about the report's failings. Talabani said it "contained dangerous recommendations that would undermine his country's sovereignty and were 'an insult to the people of Iraq.'" Described as "one of the staunchest U.S. supporters within the Iraqi leadership," he nonetheless "also said U.S. training of Iraq's army and police had gone 'from failure to failure.'" The Washington Post (12/11, A15, Trejos, 690K) reports Talabani said the report "does not respect the will of the Iraqis in dealing with their problems." He was "particularly critical of recommendations to embed thousands of US troops with Iraqi security forces to train and advise them, to centralize control of the country's oil revenue and to allow former loyalists of deposed president Saddam Hussein back into their old government jobs."

The New York Times (12/11, A12, Semple, 1.16M) reports that Talabani's remarks "amounted to an extraordinarily harsh denunciation of a central American strategy in Iraq and challenged a major recommendation by the Iraq Study Group in Washington." The Los Angeles Times (12/11, Moore, 850K) reports that Talabani "accused the bipartisan U.S. commission of condescension and ignorance." Another recommendation he denounced was one "to postpone a Kurdish bid for control over the northern oil hub of Kirkuk." His remarks "could lend support to Bush administration critics of the commission findings and to some conservatives who have called the study a plan for capitulation."

Talks Underway To Replace Maliki. The AP (12/11, Hendawi, Abdul-Zahra) reports that "major partners" in Iraq's governing coalition are engaged in "behind-the-scenes talks" to oust Iraqi PM Nouri al-Maliki "amid discontent over his failure to quell raging violence," according to lawmakers involved. The talks are "aimed at forming a new parliamentary bloc that would seek to replace the current government and that would likely exclude supporters of the radical Shiite cleric Muqtada al-Sadr." Instead, the "new alliance would be led by senior Shiite politician Abdul-Aziz al-Hakim, who met with President Bush last week."

Rumsfeld Returns Home After Final Iraq Trip. ABC World News (12/10, lead story, 2:30, Harris, 8.78M) reported, "As the debate over what to do next in Iraq grinds on, one of the most polarizing figures in this conflict, outgoing Defense Secretary Donald Rumsfeld, made a final and surprise visit to the troops that are fighting the war that may very well define his legacy. … Rumsfeld's tumultuous tenure ends in eight days when his more reserved replacement, Robert Gates, takes over. From a man who has been blamed from everything to the Abu Ghraib prison abuse scandal to failing to have a plan to win the peace, this seemed to be an emotional trip coming face to face with soldiers carrying out a mission that he told the President isn't working."

NBC Nightly News (12/10, lead story, 1:55, Maceda, 9.87M) said Rumsfeld "paid his most secretive visit to Iraq and no doubt his last as Secretary of Defense. He said that he wanted to thank the troops posing with US Marines and soldiers at an air base in restive al Anbar province. He met with medevac units and fighter pilots, and at mission headquarters, he was defiantly on message that history would favorably judge him and the war."

US Trainers Work With Iraqi Army. NBC Nightly News (12/10, story 2, 2:10, Seigenthaler, 9.87M) reported on "what could be the main focus for American troops in the future." NBC (Arraf) added, "In eastern Baghdad morning comes early for American trainers with the Iraqi army. This could be the US exit strategy. Small groups of advisors embedded with Iraqi forces as large American units leave.

But that exit runs through dangerous territory. They are scanning for the new roadside bombs, the kind that's killed a colonel and four other trainers in the past two weeks. ... This brigade proved it is capable of fighting on its own according to its trainers. But to be able to sustain itself, it has to be able to improve its ability to provide fuel and ammunition and treat its wounded. They say that could take up to a year."

Conflict Closes In On Iraqi Sunnis. The Washington Post (12/11, A1, Raghavan, 690K) reports, "In the past two months, Shiite militiamen have tightened their grip" on the "central Baghdad neighborhood of Tobji, purging dozens of Sunni families, by fear and by threats. ... So Farouk began preparing to do what neither his father nor his grandfather could have imagined in their Iraq: flee Tobji, an enclave where Shiites and Sunnis have coexisted for more than half a century. Farouk plans to join the more than 400,000 Iraqis who have fled their homes, an exodus that is reshaping the face of Baghdad into neighborhoods polarized along sectarian lines. ... Sunnis were once part of the country's privileged class, with government jobs, but their days and nights are now filled with fear and dread unlike anything they felt since the toppling of President Saddam Hussein."

Iraq Fails To Spend "Billions" In Oil Revenues. The New York Times (12/11, Glanz, 1.16M) reports, "Iraq is failing to spend billions of dollars of oil revenues that have been set aside to rebuild its damaged roads, schools and power stations and to repair refineries and pipelines. Iraqi ministries are spending as little as 15 percent of the 2006 capital budgets they received for the rebuilding ... In essence, the money is available -- despite extensive sabotage, the oil money is flowing -- but the Iraqi system has not been able to put it to work." Reasons include "large turnover in government personnel" and "a strange new one: bureaucrats are so fearful and confused by anticorruption measures put in place by the American and Iraqi governments that they are afraid to sign off on contracts."

"Christian Peacemaker" Ex-Hostages Urge Forgiveness. The Christian Science Monitor (12/11, Rice-Oxley, Murphy, 59K) reports, "Three pacifists who were held hostage for 118 days in Iraq and were released only after a fourth colleague was murdered, publicly forgave their captors Friday. ... the members of the Christian Peacemaker Teams (CPT) said they were reluctant to testify against four alleged captors in Iraqi custody because of the possibility that they will face harsh punishment, especially the death penalty." The three survivors "say they would be hypocrites if they gave in to the anger created by their ordeal, and participated in the traditional avenues of justice."

Taliban, Allies "Tighten Grip" In Northern Pakistan. The New York Times (12/11, A1, Gall, Khan, 1.16M) reports, "Islamic militants are using a recent peace deal with the government to consolidate their hold in northern Pakistan, vastly expanding their training of suicide bombers and other recruits and fortifying alliances with Al Qaeda and foreign fighters, diplomats and intelligence officials from several nations say. The result, they say, is virtually a Taliban mini-state" in which the militants are "openly flouting" the September accord "under which they agreed to end…help for the Taliban insurgency." Intelligence officials warn that the growing network "is potentially disastrous for efforts to combat terrorism as far away as Europe and the United States."

Afghanistan Is Cited As Lesson In Aligning US, Iranian Interests. The Wall Street Journal (12/11, A10, Solomon, 2.04M) reports, "As pressure mounts on the White House to engage Tehran over Iraq, Afghanistan offers an example of how U.S. and Iranian interests can constructively align in the Islamic world." Reportedly, "Tehran today is playing an important role in seeking to stabilize post-Taliban Afghanistan. The Iranian government has pledged $560 million in development aid to President Hamid Karzai's government since 2002, these officials say, roughly half of which has been disbursed." But "critics say Iran has largely acted out of self-interest in Afghanistan. They say Tehran's support for Mr. Karzai's government is in part aimed at ridding the country of Tehran's enemy, the Taliban Sunni militia, while seeking to usher in stable conditions that could hasten a U.S. withdrawal from Central Asia." The increased Iranian presence might include "a larger presence inside the country" of Iranian intelligence agents. The Journal states that Iran "has offered little indication that it would be willing, or even able, to play the same type of stabilizing role in Iraq that it has in Afghanistan. ... Still, current and former U.S. diplomats say, Iran may be cooperative in Iraq if Washington offers it a more direct role."

Army Running Short On Officers, Sergeants. In a 3,200-word story, the Wall Street Journal (12/11, Jaffe, 2.04M) says a "big strain on the Army is a shortage of people." While having had to lower recruiting standards, "the Army has found itself short of officers and sergeants. Today, it is down about 3,000 active-duty officers, a deficiency that it says will grow to about 3,700 in 2008." The officer and sergeant shortage "is felt even more acutely" upon deployment in Afghanistan and Iraq. The Journal adds that a generational gulf among officers "was clear last month in their reaction" to Secretary Donald Rumsfeld's dismissal: "Many senior officers quietly celebrated his departure," while "junior officers ... tended to view Mr. Rumsfeld as 'part of a larger problem that hasn't been solved yet.'"

CORPORATE SCANDALS:

Industries Eager To Hire Departing Committee Counsels. The Washington Post (12/11, D1, Birnbaum, 690K) writes, "As soon as Democrats take over Congress next month, all sorts of businesses will no doubt face sharp-elbowed congressional hearings called O & I -- oversight and investigations. And they'll need a strong defense. Luckily for corporate America, many of the people who formerly conducted those nasty and frequently televised inquiries have switched sides and are available for hire to the highest bidders. For the right fee, a company can retain a former chief counsel to almost any of the most marauding committees on Capitol Hill. … Two former aides to the House's Government Reform Committee are also forming a partnership partly in hopes of attracting clients who want to know how to defeat the kinds of investigations they once managed. Barbara J. Comstock and Mark Corallo are setting out on their new venture because, Comstock said, 'it helps to know the history of the committee, its subpoena power.'"

CRIMINAL LAW:

Federal Death Penalty Cases Abound In Brooklyn Court. Long Island Newsday (12/11, Destefano) reports, "This is the season for the death penalty in Brooklyn federal court. … There have been no capital punishment trials in the federal court on Cadman Plaza East since 2003. But now three such cases are under way, and a fourth is expected to commence late next year. … 'It looks like death is rampant in Brooklyn,' said Ephraim Savitt, who is defending one of the cases involving Ronell Wilson, 24, who is charged with murdering two police officers." Newsday continues, "Monday, jurors will continue to hear testimony in Wilson's trial for the March 2003 murders of undercover detectives Rodney Andrews, 34, and James Nemorin, 36. … In another courtroom, the jury selection process is expected to finish in the case of accused drug racketeer and murderer Kenneth McGriff, 46, whose trial is slated for January." Newsday adds, "Next week, another jury begins grappling with whether to execute Martin Aguilar, after convicting him last week of murder for hire. Aguilar, 33, was convicted of killing Jose Fernandez in 2002 and dumping his body in a storm drain at historic Green-Wood Cemetery in Brooklyn. If the jury decides not to execute Aguilar, he will get life in prison. … Also, pretrial hearings are scheduled for Monday in the case of Guyanese immigrants Richard James and Ronald Malley, who face the death penalty in a trial slated for next year . They are accused of killing people in an insurance scam." Newsday notes, "Savitt said he believes the spate of capital cases in Brooklyn is a logical result of aggressive decisions by the Department of Justice in recent years to seek the death penalty. … 'The overall picture is the maturation of death penalty cases that have increased in the current administration,' said Savitt, of Manhattan."

Lawmakers Ask DOJ To Probe Amtrak's Legal Bills. The Wall Street Journal (12/11, Page A8, Koppel) reports, "Two congressmen have asked the Justice Department to look into Amtrak's use of outside legal counsel." The Journal continues, "In a Dec. 4 letter to Attorney General Alberto Gonzales, Rep. Don Young (R., Alaska) and Rep. John Mica (R., Fla.) complain that the federally subsidized railroad hasn't received fair and reasonable value for fees it has paid to law firms. … 'We urge you to conduct an investigation...and take appropriate action,' they wrote. Mr. Young is chairman of the House Committee on Transportation & Infrastructure; Mr. Mica recently was chosen to serve as the top-ranking Republican member of the committee when the 110th Congress convenes." The Journal adds, "The letter follows two recent public reports that concluded some of Amtrak's outside law firms engaged in sloppy billing practices, in violation of the railroad's internal billing guidelines. … Amtrak spokesman Cliff Black said: 'We don't believe the allegations related to Amtrak's use of outside counsel have merit or that they warrant review by the Justice Department, but we stand ready to cooperate and provide information as it is requested.' Earlier this year, Amtrak indicated that it had worked to improve its oversight of legal fees." The Journal notes, "An October report, issued jointly by Amtrak's Office of Inspector General and the Department of Transportation's inspector general, concluded that law firms had, among other things, engaged in 'block billing' in which they lumped tasks under one entry of an invoice, rather than itemizing the cost of each task. Block billing is prohibited by Amtrak, according to the report. According to the October report, from 2002 to 2005, Amtrak spent more than $100 million on outside lawyers."

FBI, IRS Philadelphia Airport Probe Focusing On Minority Contract Fraud. The Philadelphia Inquirer (12/11, Shiffman, 385K) reports, "Retail at Philadelphia International Airport may have entered a gilded age, but federal agents continue to investigate suspected pay-to-play corruption there. The current FBI and IRS investigation is related to minority business contracts held by airport shops, people familiar with the matter said." The Inquirer notes, "The focus of the investigation is the federal program designed to help disadvantaged business owners…get a fair share of airport contracts. … In some cases, the minorities have lent little more than their name, ethnic status and political sway - and have done little work."

Financial Difficulties Commonplace Among New York Mobsters. The New York Times (12/10, Rashbaum, 1.16M) reported that in New York City's five crime families, "Some mobsters reap millions from rackets, and in some cases from legitimate enterprises, but many struggle to maintain a middle-class existence, and some are routinely broke. The impoverished gangster barely eking out a living is so commonplace that mobsters have a word for these poorer men of honor: brokesters. The archetypal Hollywood image of a wiseguy with prodigious appetites, swaggering in a finely tailored suit with a diamond pinkie ring and a fat roll of 50s, conceals the more nuanced reality of mob economics, according to some prosecutors, federal agents, organized-crime experts and a few mobsters. Crime figures are not immune to ordinary financial burdens and woes, like struggling to make car payments and finding money for groceries."

Minnesota Criminologist Thinks Serial Killer Behind Drownings. The AP (12/11) reports, "Rumors have persisted for years that a serial killer is prowling Interstate 94" in Minnesota, "hunting young men in college bars and plunging them underwater. Investigators, though, say there's no evidence of foul play. They say the victims were so drunk they fell in the river and died." But St. Cloud State University criminologist Douglas Gilbertson "completed a study this spring he believes shows patterns that indicate some of the cases could be murders -- and could be linked." The AP noted, St. Cloud police Chief Dennis Ballantine, whose department investigated the drowning death of a St. Cloud State student this spring and concluded it was an accident, called Gilbertson's study a collection of coincidences. … Police in La Crosse have asked the FBI to recheck their findings in the drownings, however."

WSJournal Says Hype Of Foley Allegations Was Unwarranted. In an editorial, the Wall Street Journal (12/11, 2.04M) says, "Charges of GOP malfeasance helped Democrats in last month's elections, especially those Mark Foley electronic messages to a former Congressional page that became an October sensation. So it's worth noting that the House Ethics Committee report on the episode that was released last Friday concluded with a whimper." The Committee's "conclusions have been criticized as weak in some circles, but this is mostly from the same crowd that had shouted 'coverup' without any evidence." Republicans "owe their defeat last month to much more than the Foley episode, but the Ethics report makes clear that the political uproar at the time far exceeded the actual transgressions."

CIVIL RIGHTS:

Schwarzenegger Seeks Prison System Reform. The New York Times (12/11, Steinhauer, 1.16M) reports with "the November election behind them, Gov. Arnold Schwarzenegger and state lawmakers from both parties say the time is ripe for the first major overhaul of the" California prison system "since the 1970s." Schwarzenegger "recently took the extraordinary step of declaring a state of emergency in the prison system, a move generally reserved for areas hit by natural disasters." Prison overcrowding is "so severe that 16,000 inmates are assigned cots in hallways and gyms; last month, the state began asking for volunteers to be moved to prisons out of state."

NYTimes Says Reports Show Voting Machines Need Paper Records. The New York Times (12/11, 1.16M) says in an editorial, "Two influential federal advisory groups have added their voices to an emerging national consensus that voting machines must produce a voter-verified paper record if they are to be trusted. One of those groups, the one dominated not by scientists but by election officials, was more grudging than it should have been. But their analyses should give further support to members of Congress who plan to push next month for a strong federal law requiring voter-verified paper records."

ANTITRUST:

Proposed Monsanto Deal Sparks Crop-Biotech Industry Backlash. The Wall Street Journal (12/11, Page C1, Kilman) reports, "Monsanto Co.'s second attempt in seven years to bring southern seed giant Delta & Pine Land Co. to the altar could be running into trouble." The Journal continues, "An unusual backlash against the proposed combination is taking root across the U.S. Farm Belt, driven in part by rivals in the crop-biotechnology industry, which Monsanto dominates." The Journal adds, "The proposed $1.5 billion deal announced in August would give Monsanto more control over a major crop by a biotechnology company than ever before allowed, a prospect that upsets antibiotechnology activists. Delta & Pine Land's seeds produce half of America's cotton, the nation's fifth-biggest crop. Delta's market share is highest in southern states such as Georgia, where 92% of the cotton is grown from Delta seed. … Wall Street is treating the acquisition as a done deal. Delta & Pine Land stock has hovered just under the $42-a-share offer since Aug. 15, when it jumped 11% on news of the agreement. The shares were at

DOJ_NMG_0104120

$40.64, down 24 cents, Friday in 4 p.m. New York Stock Exchange composite trading. Monsanto shares fell 43 cents to $48.08 Friday on the Big Board. Monsanto is trading at more than 25 times estimated earnings for its next fiscal year, according to Thomson Financial, compared with about 16 for the stocks in the Standard & Poor's 500-stock index." The Journal notes, 'Analysts have applauded the proposed combination because it would allow Monsanto to speed penetration of the cottonseed market with new genetically modified traits while ending several years of costly litigation between the two firms over their first breakup. Some biotech-industry leaders are prodding the attorneys general of several states to look into the combination as an antitrust review by the Justice Department extends into its fourth month."

WSJournal Hopes SCOTUS Rules Against Plaintiffs In Baby Bell Case. The Wall Street Journal (12/11, 2.04M) says the plaintiffs in Bell Atlantic v. Twombly, "a class-action suit in which plaintiffs allege that the Baby Bell phone companies conspired to suppress competition in violation of antitrust laws," claim that BellSouth, Verizon, "and the other Bells agreed among themselves to refrain from competing against each other and to prevent smaller telecom rivals from entering their respective markets." But the Justices "seemed unpersuaded that actual facts supporting these claims weren't necessary." The High Court's "skepticism is warranted and we can hope will be reflected in its decision."

ENVIRONMENT:

Democrats To Seek Reduction In US Energy Demand. The Wall Street Journal (12/11, A14, Fialka, 2.04M) reports, "In one of its final acts, the Republican Congress modestly increased the nation's domestic oil and natural-gas supplies, permitting more drilling for oil and natural-gas in the Gulf of Mexico. When Democrats take control next month, they will attempt to change the direction of energy policy, focusing more on shrinking demand, especially for gasoline and other products that rely heavily on imported oil." The Journal adds, "President Bush is an enthusiastic backer of ethanol, and boosting federal support could be an area where the White House and the new Congress find common ground. Senate Democrats will consider more direct approaches to curbing fossil-fuel demand, including raising efficiency standards for auto makers." Democrats "appear less willing to consider the supply-side solutions that have been popular in the Republican Congress. Their most recent big energy bill, last year, was heavy on incentives for coal, as well as for ethanol and nuclear power."

DOE Finds Power Grid Could Fuel 180 Million Electric Cars. The Wall Street Journal (12/11, A14, Fialka, 2.04M) reports, "The nation's existing electric power grid could fuel as many as 180 million electric cars, a Department of Energy study estimates. The study, being released today by the department's Pacific Northwest National Laboratory, is the federal government's first look at the grid's capacity to handle the demands of so-called plug-in hybrids."

FDA Mulls Rules For Preventing E. Coli Outbreaks. The New York Times (12/11, Martin, 1.16M) reports that with "processed fresh produce like bagged salads and baby carrots growing in popularity in the past decade, the Food and Drug Administration realized as long ago as 2000 that recommendations for safe handling of the products were needed." The FDA "went so far as to draft guidelines and kept the issue high on its priority list, but pressed by budget cuts and competing F.D.A. demands, the proposal languished." Now, with the "recent outbreaks of E.coli related to processed vegetables, the F.D.A.'s oversight of produce is likely to be treated with new urgency."

The Washington Post (12/11, Shin, 690K) reports in a front page story that the "patchwork of federal and state regulations that is supposed to ensure food safety has become less effective as the nation's produce supply has grown increasingly industrial." Consumer advocates "think that tougher mandatory food safety standards and stepped-up enforcement are the answer."

Taco Bell E. Coli Outbreak Slowing. USA Today (12/11, Weise, 2.27M) reports the "E. coli outbreak tied to Taco Bell restaurants in four states may be finally slowing down. … The onset of the last reported case was Dec. 2."

Schlosser Urges Democrats To Step Up Regulation Of Food Production. In a New York Times op-ed (12/11), author Eric Schlosser says, "This fall has brought plenty of bad news about food poisoning. … It is time for the new Democratic Congress to reverse a decades-long weakening of regulations and face up to the food-safety threats of the 21st century."

Agreement Would Limit Use Of Great Lakes Water. USA Today (12/11, 15A, Cauchon, 2.27M) reports a "new multistate agreement working its way through state legislatures builds a legal wall around the largest source of fresh water in the world. The deal would ensure that no Great Lakes water is ever shipped outside the region."

FBI/DEA/ATF/USMS:

Former Virginia Sheriff's Deputy Pleads Guilty To Drug, Racketeering Conspiracy. The Martinsville (VA) Bulletin (12/10) reported a former Henry

DOJ_NMG_0104121

County Sheriff's Office deputy "has pleaded guilty to two charges in the sheriff's office scandal after reaching a plea agreement with the government. … Bradley Scott Martin, 33, entered guilty pleas on one count of racketeering conspiracy and one count of drug conspiracy in district court in Roanoke on Friday, according to Heidi Coy with the U.S. Attorney's Office. … The indictments were the result of a nearly two-year investigation by federal authorities into an alleged eight-year scheme involving some sheriff's office personnel. According to the indictment, in 2001, a Drug Enforcement Administration (DEA) agent from Texas placed a telephone call to the Henry County Sheriff's Office to advise officers that a drug ledger had been seized which indicated shipments of drugs were being delivered to 'Brad Martin's' house in Martinsville."

The Roanoke (VA) Times (12/9) reported, "Martin and 11 other current and former deputies and former Henry County Sheriff Frank Cassell are named in a 48-count federal indictment."

On its Web site, WDBJ-TV, Roanoke (12/8) also reports on Martin's guilty plea.

Prosecutors Drop Some Charges. The AP (12/8) reported, "The federal indictment of Henry County's former sheriff and a dozen past and present members of his department has led prosecutors to drop charges against 28 people because of the taint of the alleged corruption. The charges dropped include 16 felony drug counts and 25 misdemeanor and traffic infractions. 'These charges could not be effectively prosecuted without the testimony of one or more individuals currently under federal indictment,' Commonwealth's Attorney Bob Bushnell said. … He said he does not expect any more charges to be dropped."

Three Drug Gang Members Sentenced In Maryland. The Annapolis (MD) Capital (12/9) reported three men who "admitted being part of a Severn drug gang known as the 'Pioneer City Boys' were sentenced to federal prison. Federal prosecutors said Tony Maurice Horne Jr. and Troemaine Herbert Storey, both of Glen Burnie, and Jerome Otto Waters Jr. of Annapolis were part of a gang that used violence and intimidation to keep competitors out and silence people who might go to the police. … An associate, Calvin I. Savoy of Severn, was convicted in October of drug charges and of shooting a county police officer during a melee in Odenton in 2004. … The shooting of the officer touched off an investigation by county police and the U.S. Drug Enforcement Administration that culminated with the September 2005 indictment of seven men."

Ohio Doctor Accused Of Illegally Prescribing $10 Million Worth Of Painkillers. The Toledo(OH) Blade (12/9) reported a Michigan physician "was arraigned…in federal court on charges that he used a Toledo medical office to illegally prescribe more than $10 million in painkillers to patients. A 26-count indictment, filed Wednesday in U.S. District Court in Toledo…charges Dr. Leo M. Ognen, 54, with drug conspiracy and drug distribution. … The charges stem from a U.S. Drug Enforcement Administration investigation into the alleged illegal dispensing of over two million doses of OxyContin and oxycodone and 1.1 million Percocet tablets at his medical practice in Toledo from January, 2002, to October, 2004."

Steroid Seizure In Maryland Said To Be Among Largest. The Baltimore Sun (12/9, Dolan) reported it "seemed like a routine seizure when federal customs agents intercepted a package of steroids at John F. Kennedy Airport in New York. From JFK, the investigation led authorities to Anne Arundel County to what they now call one of the largest stashes of man-made muscle enhancers found in the region. Federal authorities and Anne Arundel County police searched the locker of the Bally's personal trainer last summer and wrote in court papers that they found about 40,000 vials and tablets of suspected anabolic steroids stuffed inside a locked chest. 'It's unprecedented, as far as we're concerned,' said Floyd Pond, deputy director of the Washington-Baltimore High Intensity Drug Trafficking Area task force program. Ed Marcinko, a spokesman for the Drug Enforcement Administration in Baltimore, said he agreed with Pond's assessment."

Study Finds Drugs As Common As Alcohol In Car Crashes. The AP (12/8) reported the "focus on the dangers of drinking and driving may have overshadowed a similarly serious problem: the effect of drugs, including prescription medication, on drivers. According to a federal study…West Virginia medical examiners have found that drugs turn up almost as frequently as alcohol in the victims of fatal car crashes. The drugs found most often are prescription medications like painkillers and depressants." The federal Centers for Disease Control "is able to draw that conclusion because West Virginia — unlike most states — routinely tests the victims of fatal crashes for drugs and prescription medications as well as alcohol."

Doping Case Appeals Seen As Useless By Athletes. According to the Los Angeles Times (12/11, Hiltzik), athletes "see doping case appeals as futile exercise. … The WADA rules govern the admissibility of evidence, the burden of proof and the selection of the arbitrators themselves. In each category they tend to favor the accusers. Athletes wishing to compete in national, international and Olympic events subject to WADA jurisdiction have no option but to agree to this system. Anti-doping authorities argue that these rules — indeed, the very requirement that appeals be heard by arbitrators, rather than in court — are crucial to ensuring a fast and efficient process."

In a separate story, the Los Angeles Times (12/10, Hiltzik) reported the worldwide sports anti-doping program, "created to fight performance-enhancing drug use in international athletics, imposes severe punishments for accidental or technical infractions, relies at times on disputed scientific evidence and resists outside scrutiny, a Times investigation has found. Elite athletes have been barred from the Olympics, forced to relinquish medals, titles or prize money and confronted with potentially career-ending suspensions after testing positive for a banned substance at such low concentrations it could have no detectable effect on performance, records show. … The findings emerge from a Times examination of more than 250 anti-doping cases involving runners, cyclists, skiers, tennis players and competitors in dozens of other sports from around the world."

The Los Angeles Times (12/11) also includes a list of "questionable" doping cases.

Meth-Makers Move Into Woods To Avoid Detection. USA Today (12/11, Keen, 2.27M) reports hunters "are finding methamphetamine labs or their remnants in remote areas this fall." Federal and state laws "restricting sales of cold tablets containing ephedrine or pseudoephedrine, key components of meth, have reduced the number of labs." But some meth makers "are moving to isolated areas to escape detection."

Walters Says Opium Poppies In Afghanistan Will Be Sprayed With Herbicide. The AP (12/10) reported the top U.S. anti-drug official "said Saturday that Afghan poppies would be sprayed with herbicide to combat an opium trade that produced a record heroin haul this year, a measure likely to anger farmers and scare Afghans unfamiliar with weed killers. John Walters…said Afghanistan could turn into a narco-state unless 'giant steps' are made toward eliminating poppy cultivation. … Afghans are deeply opposed to spraying poppies. … But Walters said [President] Karzai and other officials have agreed to ground spraying. 'I think the president has said yes, and I think some of the ministers have repeated yes,' Walters said." There are more than 80 media references to spraying Afghanistan's opium poppies. News outlets that used the AP story include CBS News, the Wall Street Journal, Washington Post, Forbes, Houston Chronicle, Newsday, and Kansas City Star.

NYTimes Says New Jersey Needs Sterile Needle Program. The New York Times (12/11, 1.16M) says in an editorial that New Jersey's drug-related HIV infection rate "is said to be twice the national average. … At the moment, however, New Jersey is the only state that is still resisting this proven AIDS-prevention strategy." New Jersey lawmakers "should bear this in mind as they approach the vote. A vote for the needle access program is a vote for saving the lives of men, women and unborn children."

IRS Headquarters Reopens Six Months After Flooding. The Washington Post (12/11, D4, Barr, 690K) "Federal Diary" reports the IRS headquarters on Constitution Avenue in Washington "has reopened, almost six months after heavy rains flooded the basement and sub-basement, destroying electrical and air-conditioning equipment."

CONGRESS-ADMINISTRATION:

GOP Uses Final Days Of Congressional Control To Approve Popular Tax Items. The Christian Science Monitor (12/11, Chaddock, 59K) reports, "Republicans used their final hours in charge of Congress to make good on promises to many of Washington's most powerful interests as well as to American families they hope to woo back in 2008. The 11th-hour output includes popular tax extenders, such as the research and development tax credit for businesses and the tax break for college tuition."

Thomas Credited With Pushing HSA Provision Attached To Tax-And-Trade Package. The Washington Post (12/11, A4, Birnbaum, Montgomery, 690K) reports, "Republican lawmakers, with little public debate, quietly added a billion-dollar health-care benefit to legislation that was rushed through Congress just before it adjourned Saturday morning. Acting at the urging of several major business lobbies eager to reduce their medical-insurance costs" and House Ways and Means Committee Chairman Bill Thomas, "lawmakers adopted the provision even though only a single committee had previously approved it. The provision…expands the amount of money that can be contributed tax-free to health savings accounts (HSAs)." That it "remained in the bill was thanks largely to Thomas."

Health Care Legislation Balances Funding With Increased Transparency. The Wall Street Journal (12/11, A8, Lueck, 2.04M) reports Congress "authorized billions of dollars in spending to shore up government health initiatives…passing legislation that included provisions aimed at injecting more transparency and accountability into the programs."

Offshore Drilling Bill Draws Mixed Reviews. The Christian Science Monitor (12/11, Knickerbocker, 59K) reports, "As one of its final acts, the 109th Congress Friday approved opening to oil and gas development 8.3 million previously protected acres off the Gulf Coast - a last bid to influence energy and environmental policy before the Democrats assume control. Industry officials are pleased; environmentalists much less so."

Congress Approves Ban On Fraudulently Obtaining Phone Records. The Wall Street Journal (12/11, A6, Rogers, Matthews, 2.04M) reports, "Spurred by the Hewlett-Packard Co. scandal, Congress approved legislation that would make it a federal crime to obtain an individual's telephone records without his or her approval. The measure spells out new federal criminal penalties for those who buy and sell such fraudulently obtained records. The White House said President Bush will sign the measure. The bill targets 'pretexting' tactics, where investigators use schemes to impersonate their target and gain access to private phone records."

Novak Describes Angry Exchange Between GOP Senators Over Earmarks. In his column for the Washington Post (12/11, A19, 690K) Robert Novak writes, "The sterile, confused lame-duck session of the Republican-controlled 109th Congress ended with a quiet victory by reformers that staved off an estimated 10,000 earmarks. … The hero of the lame-duck session was" Sen. Jim DeMint, who "was instrumental in blocking a Senate-House conference on a military construction appropriations bill, which would then be used as the last train out of town to carry pork." Novak continues, "The first closed-door meeting of Republican senators after their drubbing in the election erupted in discord after the leadership laid out plans for an omnibus spending bill, putting all unfinished appropriations bills in one package. … But DeMint rose to make clear that he and his fellow freshman Republican, Sen. Tom Coburn of Oklahoma, would use the many parliamentary devices at their disposal to block an omnibus bill." Sen. Ted Stevens "erupted with an exhibition of his famous hair-trigger temper." Sen. Thad Cochran "made the case in calmer language." Sen. John McCain, "happy to have two Senate rookies pick up the anti-pork mantle he has carried for many years, was making snide comments in a stage whisper. But DeMint was not about to be moved by either threats or persuasion."

Frist Blames "Obstructionist" Democrats For Blocking Popular Measures. In an op-ed for USA Today (12/11, 21A, 2.27M) Sen. Bill Frist writes, "The Congressional session that just concluded actually leaves a solid record of achievement for America. … Nonetheless, some widely supported measures fell victim to obstructionist tactics. Democrats, for example, blocked popular proposals to make it easier for small businesses to buy health coverage for their employees, reform our broken medical liability system, do more adult stem cell research, and increase the minimum wage."

USA Today Blasts Departing GOP Congress. USA Today (12/11, 21A, 2.27M), in an editorial titled, "109th Congress' Big Success: Lowering The Achievement Bar: Shoddy ethics, obsession with perks of power left GOP little to brag about," writers, "In the end, nothing became the 109th Congress so much as its going, which it finally did Saturday on the heels of an ethics report that seemed to symbolize two years of feckless behavior. Even some key Republicans left town lamenting a record of failure. … Anything went if it helped preserve GOP power, but very little was achieved to address the nation's problems."

WPost Praises Fisheries Bill. The Washington Post (12/11, A18, 690K), in an editorial, writes, "Congress passed an important piece of legislation for the health of America's oceans. Two commissions in recent years have concluded that only bold policies can prevent the collapse of coastal ecosystems. The bill, which reauthorized and improved upon the nation's fisheries management laws, wasn't bold enough and contained a few unfortunate compromises, but it represents progress."

Pelosi Attracting Unprecedented Media Attention. The Los Angeles Times (12/11, Fiore, 850K) reports that as Rep. Nancy Pelosi "prepares to be sworn in Jan. 4 as the first female speaker of the House, she has become an object of fascination and curiosity in political circles and beyond. Barbara Walters interviewed her as one of the year's 10 most fascinating people. People magazine has written about her twice in recent weeks. … Only weeks ago, Republicans were doing their best in the heat of the campaign to paint Pelosi, 66, as a conservative's nightmare — a San Francisco liberal out of touch with the American mainstream. But more recently, a poll measuring political charisma showed that she had 'dramatically improved her standing' with the public, sponsors of the survey said, with voters knowing her better and feeling warmer toward her."

Pelosi Rewarding Younger Members Credited With Improving Democrats' Image. The Washington Post (12/11, A12, Layton, 690K) reports, "They call themselves the '30-Something Working Group,' a loose collection of House Democrats in their 30s and 40s who have begun making waves. … The core of the group -- Reps. Kendrick Meek and Debbie Wasserman Schultz of Florida and Timothy J. Ryan of Ohio -- began talking at 10 or 11 p.m. Never mind that the House chamber was essentially empty at that hour. C-SPAN was recording the sessions, and insomniacs around the country got to know the three young Democrats. The trio sometimes used props and took irreverent jabs at the Republicans in honing their party's message." According to the Post, "The young Democrats played an important role in helping their party take control of Congress, and now they are beginning to reap the benefits." Pelosi "is making room for these and other young House Democrats, giving them opportunities they would not normally enjoy under the rigid seniority system that typically defines life in the Capitol."

Work On Appropriations Bills Awaits Democrats. USA Today (12/11, 9A, 2.27M) reports, "When the Democrats take control of Congress next month, they will also have to take charge of resolving spending issues that the old Congress couldn't. As the clock ticked toward adjournment over the weekend, Congress approved a flurry of last-minute bills, but could not reach a deal on nearly a dozen annual spending bills for the fiscal year that began Oct. 1. … Budget work on about $400 billion for agencies as varied as the Education Department, the Department of Agriculture and Health and Human Services will be left unfinished also."

The Wall Street Journal (12/11, A6, Rogers, 2.04M) writes, "In the closing hours of the Republican-controlled Congress, impatient House Democrats took a swing at oil and gas interests -- a sign of things to come in January. The punch fell wide: Their amendment, seeking to recoup royalties from energy companies drilling on federal lands, failed 207-205. There was pride in coming so close. But the defeat also betrayed a level of confusion in the new majority and fear that it won't have the resources needed to carry out its agenda after midterm election victories."

U.S. News and World Report (12/18, Brush, 2.03M) reports, "The lame duck Republican-led Congress punted nearly a half-trillion dollars in unfinished spending over to next year-to the Democrats, that is. Just when the Democrats hope to be talking about the minimum wage and college tuition and fulfilling their campaign pledges for a 'new direction,' they'll be saddled with looking backward and making a host of spending decisions fraught with peril. Their plans to hit the ground running with a flurry of politically popular initiatives may just have run into a gaping pothole. That's because the lawmakers who left Washington last week…completed only two (defense and homeland security) of the 11 spending bills that finance 13 government agencies."

Agriculture Lobby Expected To Face Concerted Opposition In Crafting New Farm Bill. U.S. News and World Report (12/18, Schulte, 2.03M) reports, "The agriculture industry is hoping for a 2007 bumper crop-of money. When Congress reconvenes in January, one of its top priorities will be hashing out a new six-year farm bill, an always anticipated Washington ritual that has regularly delivered massive subsidies to the industry and howls of protest from budget hawks and others. … While Big Ag is pushing for another barnburner, the largess of the 2002 farm bill, penned at a time of government surplus, is gone. This time, nothing will come easy." According to US News, "an odd-couple alliance is forming among Bread for the World, the libertarian Cato Institute, the liberal Environmental Defense, and the conservative Club for Growth. Expect talks to accelerate by early spring. Most insiders predict calls for reform will keep Big Ag from going home with the usual honey pot, but it won't be left hungry, either. For some, that's enough."

Democrats To Probe Interior Department's Handling Of Oil And Gas Royalties. U.S. News and World Report (12/18, Pound, 2.03M) reports, "For years the Department of Interior's Minerals Management Service operated pretty much in the backwaters of the nation's capital, drawing little scrutiny from the press or Capitol Hill. Such obscurity, however, is a thing of the past. Last summer, congressional investigators discovered that the agency had bungled its job so badly that energy companies legally avoided paying an estimated $2 billion in royalties on oil and natural gas extracted from federal waters. The final tab to taxpayers could reach $10 billion." Sen. Ron Wyden "will chair a subcommittee and vows a 'very vigorous' investigation of the oil and gas leasing program run by the minerals agency. … In the House, says a senior aide to Rep. Nick Rahall, the West Virginia Democrat expected to chair the House Resources Committee, 'there will be an intensive and exhaustive review of royalty underpayments.'"

Jordan Confirmed To 3rd Circuit Bench. The Legal Intelligencer (12/11, Bennett) reports, "The U.S. Senate confirmed Judge Kent A. Jordan to the 3rd U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals on Friday." The Intelligencer continues, "Jordan, formerly a judge for the U.S. District Court for the District of Delaware, was nominated in June to replace Judge Jane R. Roth, who took senior status on the appellate court effective May 31. Both Roth and Jordan are Republicans." The Intelligencer adds, "Directly before his appointment to the district court in 2002, Jordan was vice president and general counsel of the Corporation Services Co. in Wilmington, Del. He joined the company in 1998 after five years as a partner with Wilmington firm Morris James Hitchens & Williams. … From 1987 to 1992, Jordan was an Assistant U.S. Attorney, after having spent two years as an associate with Potter Anderson & Corroon, another Wilmington firm. … Admitted to the Delaware bar in 1984, Jordan clerked for Judge James L. Latchum of the Delaware District Court from 1984 to 1985, after receiving his J.D. from the Georgetown University Law Center. He received his B.A. from Brigham Young University in 1981. Jordan was born in West Point, N.Y., and resides in Delaware. … Historically, two seats on the 3rd Circuit bench have gone to Delaware jurists. Jordan's nomination continues the tradition. Roth is from Delaware, and the state's other representative on the court is Judge Thomas L. Ambro, who joined from private bankruptcy practice at Wilmington firm Richards Layton & Finger. He was nominated by President Bill Clinton and confirmed in 2000."

San Francisco Protestors Urge Pelosi To Seek Bush's Impeachment. The San Francisco Chronicle (12/11, King, 384K) reports a "small but spirited rally in San Francisco called on" incoming House Speaker Nancy Pelosi "to move impeachment" of President Bush "to the top of the legislative agenda."

Bush Attends "Christmas In Washington" Concert. The AP (12/10, Sanner) reports President Bush "enjoyed a lively set of Christmas music Sunday night" at "the annual 'Christmas in Washington' concert at the National Building Museum. The event benefited the Children's National Medical Center." Bush "said U.S. troops abroad 'must know that our nation is grateful for your service.'"

Book Explores Cheney's Role In Bush Administration. The Financial Times (12/11, Daniel) examines the book "Vice," in which sets out to depict how Vice President Cheney "has become the most powerful vice-presidency in history, 'insulated from any accountability -- from the Congress and even from the president with whom he shared executive power'. … Reinforcing the image of Mr Cheney as the shadow president, the authors reveal the ways he has bolstered his authority."

Watchdog Group Urges DOD Inquiry Into Evangelical Video. The Washington Post (12/11, Cooperman, 690K) reports, "A military watchdog group is asking the Defense Department to investigate whether seven Army and Air Force officers violated regulations by appearing in uniform in a promotional video for an evangelical Christian organization. In the video, much of which was filmed inside the Pentagon, four generals and three colonels praise the Christian Embassy, a group that evangelizes among military leaders, politicians and diplomats in Washington. Some of the officers describe their efforts to spread their faith within the military." The Military Religious Freedom Foundation "is requesting an investigation in a letter to the Defense Department's inspector general."

Discovery Crew Prepares For Docking With International Space Station. USA Today (12/11, 5A, Watson, 2.27M) reports, "Early data from Saturday's launch of space shuttle Discovery show the ship is in good health and suffered no damage on the way to orbit, deputy shuttle program manager John Shannon said Sunday. 'It was a very typical ascent,' Shannon said. 'The team sees nothing of concern at this time.'" The AP (12/11, Borenstein) reports the shuttle "is to dock with the space station Monday to begin the intricate work. Three complicated spacewalks are planned to rewire the space station from a temporary to a permanent power source." The Christian Science Monitor (12/11, Spotts, 59K) previews the work ahead for the Discovery crew.

Bill Would Limit USPS Rate Hikes. The Wall Street Journal (12/11, A8, Mckinnon, Brooks, 2.04M) reports the Postal Service "generally will be barred from raising postage rates beyond the rate of inflation for the next decade under an overhaul passed by Congress." The new law – "the first major changes to the service in more than three decades -- aims to stabilize rates for households and bulk mailers and to help the service cope with the challenges of the Internet and compete against delivery companies such as FedEx Corp. and United Parcel Service Inc. The White House said President Bush would sign the bill."

NYTimes Criticizes Administration For "Muzzling" Scientists. In an editorial headlined "Muzzling Those Pesky Scientists," the New York Times (12/11, 1.16M) says the EPA "disclosed last week that it had revised -- stood on their head is more like it -- procedures it has used for 25 years to set standards for air pollutants like soot and lead. … This is disheartening, but not surprising. Whether the issue is birth control or global warming or clean air, this administration has already acquired a special place in regulatory history for the audacity with which it has manipulated or muzzled science (and in some cases individual scientists) that might discomfit its industrial allies or interfere with its political agenda."

Krugman Criticizes Administration For Privatizing Government Functions. In his New York Times (12/11, 1.16M) column, Paul Krugman says, "Outsourcing of the government's responsibilities -- not to panels of supposed wise men, but to private companies with the right connections -- has been one of the hallmarks" of the Bush Administration, and "privatization through outsourcing is one reason the administration has failed on so many fronts." It is "now clear that there's a fundamental error in the antigovernment ideology embraced by today's conservative movement. Conservatives look at the virtues of market competition and leap to the conclusion that private ownership, in itself, is some kind of magic elixir. But there's no reason to assume that a private company hired to perform a public service will do better than people employed directly by the government."

Kurtz Says Leaks Show Administration's Unity Breaking Down. In his Washington Post (12/11, C1, 690K) "Media Matters" column, Howard Kurtz says, "Washington is awash in leaks these days, giving us a rare glimpse of what really goes on behind the carefully manicured landscape of official statements." With the leaks of memos by Defense Secretary Donald Rumsfeld and National Security Adviser Stephen Hadley, "it is clear that the administration's once-legendary discipline has broken down. What is also clear is that the private doubts of top officials are closer to the media's dark portrait of the war than to the 'absolutely, we're winning' rhetoric of President Bush. That is especially noteworthy in light of all the criticism that administration officials have heaped on correspondents in Iraq for focusing too heavily on violence and ignoring signs of progress."

Summers Concerned By Populist Policy Proposals. In a Financial Times (12/11) op-ed, Harvard's Lawrence Summers says, "If the new Congress sees itself as having a mandate for anything in the economic area, it is for policies that 'stand up' for ordinary Americans against the threat they perceive from corporate and moneyed interests. These populist impulses have roots much deeper than campaign rhetoric." Summers decries "populist policy proposals that cut against the grain of the market system by, for example, limiting free trade agreements, restricting outsourcing or limiting the ability of successful companies to expand. The track record of such populist proposals is dismal. They rarely achieve their objectives and come with huge collateral costs."

Additionally, in an op-ed for the Los Angeles Times (12/11, 850K), Summers writes, "The freshman class" in Congress "is under enormous pressure to respond not just to the economic insecurity that middle-class voters feel but to their resentment toward the disproportionately prospering corporate elite. If the new Congress sees itself as having any kind of economic mandate, it is for policies that 'stand up' for ordinary Americans against the perceived threat from corporate and moneyed interests.

OTHER NEWS:

"Spunky" Economy Said To Be Surmounting Downturns. The Christian Science Monitor (12/11, Scherer, 59K) says the US economy is "spunky," as evidence suggests it is "weathering the downturns in the housing and auto markets. The economy does have a little wobble, and some economists believe the US is entering a period of subpar growth. But as a whole, it appears to be avoiding dire predictions of a sharp rise in unemployment and a loss of business confidence." And the Wall Street Journal (12/11, C1, Browning, 2.04M) says investors "are widely expecting an investor-friendly announcement" from the Fed tomorrow. The Fed "is expected to leave target interest rates unchanged, fueling hopes that it will start cutting rates some time next year, which would be good news for stocks and bonds."

Retiring, Defeated Members Of Congress Entertain Offers From Academia. The AP (12/11, Superville) reports, "The future is bright for ex-members of Congress." Rep. Sherwood Boehlert "is joining the Woodrow Wilson International Center for Scholars in Washington." Rep. Jim Leach "is sifting through offers from prestigious East Coast universities — Georgetown, Harvard and Princeton among them — as well as schools in his Midwestern home state." Sen. Mike DeWine "is talking to universities about teaching and law firms about legal work as he prepares to re-enter private life for the first time in 30 years."

Obama Hits New Hampshire With "Huge Media Horde" In Tow. ABC World News (12/10, story 6, 2:50, Harris, 8.78M) reported, "It is still the year 2006, but in New Hampshire, it looked more like 2008." Sen. Barack Obama "has not yet announced whether he'll run for president, but when the Democratic star paid his first visit to New Hampshire today, he was welcomed like a candidate." ABC (Tapper) said the "excitement Obama is generating with crowds in his first-ever visit to the first in the nation primary state could be bad news for his possible Democratic primary rivals," including Sen. Hillary Clinton.

NBC Nightly News (12/10, story 4, 2:35, Reid, 9.87M) said Obama "said that he is baffled by how quickly he's become a superstar of the Democratic Party. Here in New Hampshire his supporters say they are not surprised at all, that he is a politician with a gift." Also on NBC Nightly News (12/10, story 5, 1:45, Seigenthaler, 9.87M), CNBC's John Harwood was asked if there is "any doubt that Barack Obama is running." Harwood said, "Very little doubt. … When you talk to his advisors, it is clear that he is into this."

The Washington Post (12/11, Balz, 690K) reports on its front page that "the political phenomenon known as Sen. Barack Obama" descended on New Hampshire Sunday, "drawing enthusiastic crowds and trailed by a huge media horde as he continued to stoke interest in a possible bid for the White House in 2008." In Portsmouth, "it was standing-room-only at a book signing," and in Manchester, "1,500 people paid $25 apiece to hear him speak at a celebration of the New Hampshire Democratic Party's historic victories in last month's midterm elections. To the question everyone wanted answered -- Is he going to run? -- Obama was noncommittal." But Obama closed his Manchester speech "with words that seemed to signal growing interest in a campaign. 'America is ready to turn the page,' he said. 'America is ready for a new set of challenges. This is our time. A new generation is prepared to lead.'"

USA Today (12/11, Lawrence, 2.27M) says the "half-Kansan, half-Kenyan author and politician, who electrified the 2004 Democratic convention with his keynote speech, says it is 'a little surprising' to him and 'completely baffling' to his wife that his 15 minutes of fame have extended well beyond 15 minutes. But there's no doubt they have. The large crowds and pop-star response Obama drew here underscored the new reality for Democrats seeking their party's nomination: New York Sen. Hillary Rodham Clinton is no longer alone at the top." The AP (12/10, Pickler) also highlights Obama's "15 minutes of fame" remark.

The New York Times (12/11, Nagourney, 1.16M) says the visit was the "first time in his life" that Obama has visited the leadoff primary state, where he offered "a message of hope while proclaiming himself wary of the wave of hype that surrounded his visit. His visit gave Democrats in two sold-out halls a chance to inspect the man who has emerged as their party's strongest alternative" to Clinton. The Los Angeles Times (12/11, McDermott, Barabak, 850K) headlines its report "Crowds Adore Obama" and says the "freshman" senator is "borne aloft by a popularity bubble that seems to float higher by the day." The Baltimore Sun (12/11, West, 257K) says Obama "appears to have put his party under a spell that has veteran politicians reaching back to the Kennedy era for comparisons."

AFP (12/10) says Obama "is expected to make a decision" on a run "in the next few weeks." McClatchy (12/11, Thomma) also reports on Obama's New Hampshire visit.

Clinton's "It Takes a Village" To Be Re-Released This Week. The New York Daily News/AP (12/11) reports Clinton "is polishing up her most famous phrase as she edges closer to a presidential run, writing in a new introduction to her book 'It Takes a Village' that Sept. 11 and the Internet make her tome on child-rearing even more relevant today." In the 10th anniversary edition of the book, which goes on sale tomorrow, Clinton writes, "The five years since 9/11 have reinforced one of my main points: How children are raised anywhere can impact our lives and our children's futures."

Four New Yorkers Eyeing White House. Newsday (12/11, Clarridge, Gordon, Thrush, Virasami) examines the four possible presidential candidates from New York. For Rudy Giuliani, the question is whether a "thrice-married New Yorker on the wrong side of his party on the Big Three -- gays, guns and God" -- can get elected president. Giuliani "is riding high on 9/11 name recognition, and some believe that alone can take him far into the race -- perhaps if only as" Sen. John McCain's running mate. Newsday says if Clinton is "not running, she's walking as fast as she can." She "was supposed to engage in a slow rollout" of her campaign this month, but she "seems to have speeded things up, possibly to deal with the looming threat posed by emerging star" Obama. Gov. George Pataki "is expected to make his decision in the next few weeks," according to a spokeswoman. And while New York Mayor Michael Bloomberg "insists he's not a candidate," he "is confident he would make a good president. … Political observers say he could free up $500 million of his own funds to run as an independent."

McCain Addresses New York Jewish Crowd. Newsday/AP (12/11, Pyle) reports McCain paid "a visit to the home turf" of Clinton and Giuliani, addressing a crowd at New York's Yeshiva University on Sunday where he said "Israel and the world are threatened by a 'possibly deranged and surely dangerous regime' in Iran."

McCain, Romney Top "Potential Heirs" To Bush Family "Machine." The Los Angeles Times (12/11, Wallsten, 850K) reports that "with the Bushes preparing to stand down from a quarter century in top elected offices, a frenzied competition has erupted in the Republican Party over who will inherit a fundraising and vote-getting machine built by the family over the years into one of the most valuable assets in modern politics." The "leading potential heirs to that political fortune so far" are McCain and, "a bit surprisingly, Massachusetts Gov. Mitt Romney, who has emerged as a top-tier contender by wooing social conservatives considered crucial in the early primary contests."

McCain's Play For GOP Base Seen As Endangering His General Election Appeal. Time's Karen Tumulty (12/18) reports, "McCain '08 will be a bigger, more conventional operation -- a tank, not a slingshot. The prevailing wisdom about McCain used to be that his bipartisan appeal would make him a sure bet in a presidential race - -if only he could get past the Republican primary. But as more and more of the party establishment climb aboard a campaign that McCain has not yet even formally launched, it's starting to look as if the opposite may be true. By trying to become the perfect candidate for the primaries, McCain could be creating difficulties for himself in a general election. His hard-line position on Iraq is a perfect case in point. McCain has continued to press for more troops there, and spent last week dismissing the Iraq Study Group recommendation to bring them home as nothing short of a recipe for defeat. That's the kind of strong, consistent hawkishness that G.O.P. primary voters look for. … The problem is that exit polls in last month's election said only 17% of voters overall share that view, which could leave the other 83% wondering whether McCain's famous independent streak, so appealing on most issues, would be such a good thing to have in a Commander in Chief who has the power to take the country to war."

Possible Candidates Rush To Establish Exploratory Committees. The Washington Post (12/11, A17, Goldfarb, 690K) examines the early formation of exploratory committees Giuliani, McCain, and Sens. Evan Bayh and Sam Brownback. The "ideas behind creating an exploratory committee, strategists and experts say, are to create buzz -- and to do what everybody expects you to do." Attorney Kenneth Gross, who specializes in politics and elections, said, "You get two press releases, one when you form the exploratory committee, and one when you say you're actually running." New Mexico Gov. Bill Richardson "apparently trying to get three bites out of the apple," recently "announced that he would announce next month whether he would form an exploratory committee," while Gov. Tom Vilsack "bypassed the exploratory stage" and entered the presidential race directly. Romney reportedly could do the same.

Columnist Says California Will Be "Meaningless" In Nomination Contests. In his Los Angeles Times (12/11, 850K) column, George Skelton writes, "What's sure to be a hot presidential contest is warming up and once again California is likely to be a mere spectator in a lousy seat. … California's 2008 presidential primary won't be held until June, long after the nominations already have been locked up. Our votes will be meaningless."

Jefferson's Victory Creates Uncertainty For New Orleans. The Washington Post (12/11, A3, Whoriskey, 690K) writes that Rep. William Jefferson "may be a pariah in some Washington political circles," but New Orleans voters "weighed in over the weekend with their own verdict regarding their scandal-plagued congressman: He's still our guy." Still, Jefferson's "emphatic reelection victory…poses a quandary for Democrats, some of whom have shunned him politically, and possibly also for the city, as leaders here seek to project an image of civic probity as they lobby for more federal money for recovery from Hurricane Katrina." The Wall Street Journal (12/11, Lovley, 2.04M) says Jefferson's win "leaves the state frozen in the scandal, which could cramp the flow of rebuilding funds from Washington, experts warn."

The New York Times (12/11, Nossiter, 1.16M) headlines its story on Jefferson "New Orleans Voters Support Their Man Over F.B.I.," writing that while "the late-night comedians could joke all they wanted about the $90,000" the FBI "said it found in Mr. Jefferson's freezer," and "white New Orleans could tut-tut at the seamy portrait outlined by the F.B.I. in its investigation of him," supporters "aw another picture: of a godly man persecuted by a racially biased government."

Bonilla, Rodriguez Face Off Tuesday In TX23. The Washington Post (12/11, A4, Moreno, 690K) reports on Tuesday's runoff election in TX23, where GOP Rep. Henry Bonilla faces Democratic ex-Rep. Ciro Rodriguez, who has "accused Bonilla of voting to cut veterans' benefits and to deny health-care coverage for National Guardsmen returning from Iraq. Bonilla countered by saying that Rodriguez showed 'dangerous judgment' in Congress by opposing a law that allowed secret evidence to be used in immigration proceedings against suspected terrorists and by accepting a $250 contribution from a man later convicted of conducting illegal business transactions with Libya." The Los Angeles Times (12/11, Hart, 850K) says in November, "a well-financed Bonilla won 49% of the vote, just shy of the majority he needed to win outright." The AP (12/10, White) says the campaign has been marked by "negative campaigning."

The San Antonio Express News (12/11, Jefferson) reports former President Clinton campaigned for Rodriguez Sunday, telling supporters, "You couldn't have a clearer choice. You couldn't have a better candidate. And you've got just about 48 hours to bring it home."

Virginia Democrats Aim To Keep Up Momentum. The Washington Post (12/11, B1, Craig, 690K) writes that "what was unthinkable in Virginia six months ago is now the political reality: With" Sen.-elect Jim Webb's win, "the state has three prominent Democrats" -- Webb, Gov. Tim Kaine, and popular ex-Gov. Mark Warner -- "who say they are working as a team to build the party in a historically Republican state. Their first mission is trying to defeat Republicans in next year's legislative races."

"Bushies" Reportedly Angry Over Rove's Inaccurate Midterm Predictions. U.S. News and World Report's "Washington Whispers" column (12/18, Bedard) reports, "It's an ugly rumor, but it's spreading like wildfire: Karl Rove has lost his touch. In an amazing betrayal within a family where top political aide Rove is royalty, Bushies have been sneering at his pre-election happy talk that the GOP would keep the Senate and take a slight hit in the House, both soon to be run by Democrats. And now we learn that President Bush really believed the GOP was safe, too. On the day before the elections, he asked embattled House GOP leader Dennis Hastert to run for speaker again so he could guide the White House's agenda in Congress."

Bush 41 Said To Be "Weepy" Often. U.S. News and World Report's "Washington Whispers" column (12/18, Bedard) reports, "Those weren't tears of pain former President Bush shed last week during a tribute to his son Jeb, Florida's outgoing governor. Just the opposite. Family friends say the old guy is getting more emotional and has been prone to joyful crying jags when bragging on his kids. And-bless his heart-he doesn't try to stop it; he just lets the tears pour out. His buddies tell us that Bush, 82, also gets weepy when discussing the importance of his family and the blessings he has enjoyed throughout his life. 'He has always been an emotional guy,' says a pal.

DeLay To Unveil New Blog. U.S. News and World Report's "Washington Whispers" column (12/18, Bedard) reports, "Tom DeLay's back, this time on the Internet. Friends tell us that" Delay "this week unveils TomDeLay.com, where he'll blog - DeLay's Daily - on newsy issues and build a coalition he's calling Grassroots, Action, and Information Network. Sources said the right-leaning Texan will give GAIN members insider information on the conservative movement and urge them to step in on key issues."

Washington State Officials Moving To "Plain" Language. USA Today/AP (12/11, 18A, Corte) reports Washington state officials "want to deploy changes to alleviate state personnel's employment of acronyms, jargon and legalese that routinely pervade interfaces with constituents. Or, in plain speak: Talk to the public as you would talk to any other person — simply, and in clear language."

Waste Company's Name On Arena Concerns Some In Utah. The New York Times (12/11, Stolz, 1.16M) reports some in Utah "fear that a recent change in the name of the city's professional basketball arena may create for Utah...associations with corruption and nuclear waste. ... [I]n November, a hazardous waste services company based here, EnergySolutions," won the naming rights contract for home of the Utah Jazz. The company's president "is looking to overcome the negative publicity that the company, known until 10 months ago as Envirocare of Utah, has received over its operation of a large nuclear waste facility in the Utah desert."

Key Commission's Report To Recommend Overhaul Of Education Standards. Time (12/18, Wallis, Steptoe, 4.03M), in its cover story titled "How to Bring Our Schools Out of the 20th Century," writes, "This week…the New Commission on the Skills of the American Workforce, a high-powered, bipartisan assembly of Education Secretaries and business, government and other education leaders, releases a blueprint for rethinking American education from pre-K to 12 and beyond to better prepare students to thrive in the global economy. While that report includes some controversial proposals, there is nonetheless a remarkable consensus among educators and business and policy leaders on one key conclusion: we need to bring what we teach and how we teach into the 21st century. Right now we're aiming too low. Competency in reading and math--the focus of so much No Child Left Behind (NCLB) testing -- is the meager minimum. Scientific and technical skills are, likewise, utterly necessary but insufficient. Today's economy demands not only a high-level competence in the traditional academic disciplines but also what might be called 21st century skills."

WPost Says Maryland, Virginia Should Adopt Public Smoking Ban. In an editorial, the Washington Post (12/11, A18, 690K) says, "State lawmakers in Maryland and Virginia may have heard later than most, but the debate over the health effects of secondhand smoke is over. A landmark report by the surgeon general in the summer confirmed that breathing in smoky bars, restaurants or waiting rooms causes lung cancer and heart disease, not to mention chronic coughs, irritated nostrils and, for pregnant women who wait on tables or tend bars in smoke-filled establishments, babies with lower birth weights. The report also poured cold water on complaints from restaurant and bar owners: There is growing evidence that more people will frequent restaurants and bars when a smoking ban is in place."

LATimes Sees Long Road Ahead On "Medical Records Morass." The Los Angeles Times (12/11, 850K) editorializes, "Your medical records can save your life, or they can almost kill you. So the prospect of making them more easily accessible is at once comforting and scary -- and a new effort to convert them into digital form will raise the stakes on both counts." Five major corporations who "provide health benefits to 2.5 million people announced plans last week to gather employees' records from medical groups, hospitals, insurers and laboratories, then store them online. Employees can add or delete information to correct errors and fill in blanks." The main objective of the Dossia program "is to help them give complete, accurate information to their healthcare providers." The "most important contribution Dossia is likely to make…is that it will show how much more work needs to be done throughout the industry to solve the medical records morass in a way that works for doctors and patients alike."

Dobson Comments On Mary Cheney's Pregnancy. In an essay for Time (12/18, 4.03M), Focus on the Family's James Dobson writes, "A number of social conservatives, myself included, have recently been asked to respond to the news that Mary Cheney, the Vice President's daughter, is pregnant with a child she intends to raise with her lesbian partner. Implicit in this issue is an effort to get us to criticize the Bush Administration or the Cheney family. … With all due respect to Cheney and her partner, Heather Poe, the majority of more than 30 years of social-science evidence indicates that children do best on every measure of well-being when raised by their married mother and father."

Retired CBS Correspondent Names Source Of Vietnam War "Bombshell" Story. In an op-ed for the New York Times (12/11, 1.16M), retired CBS News correspondent Murray Fromson remembers an August 7, 1967, New York Times story that proved to be "a bombshell that resonated in both Washington and Saigon, caused consternation in the United States Army and the intelligence community and gradually altered perceptions of American success or failure for the remainder of the Vietnam War."

Fromson identifies the anonymous general who told him and the Times' R. W. Apple, Jr., "We've reached a stalemate and we should find a dignified way out." Fromson says the "officer in question, then a three-star general, now 90 years old and retired and living in Hawaii, is Frederick Weyand."

Media Trends Criticized. In a Wall Street Journal 12/11, A18) op-ed, Dow Jones Chairman Peter Kann says the media are "need of some mending. At its best news informs and enlightens the citizens of a free society and thereby safeguards and strengthens our democracy. At its worst -- dishonest, unfair, irresponsible -- the media has potential to erode the public trust on which its own success depends and to corrode the democratic system of which it is so indispensably a part." Kann then touches on "10 current trends in the mass media that ought to disturb us." Among other things, Kann criticizes the "blurring of the lines between journalism and entertainment," the "blurring of lines between news and opinion," the "blending of news and advertising, sponsorships or other commercial relationships," the "exaggerated tendency toward pessimism," and "social orthodoxy, or political correctness."

Annan Expected To Deliver Harsh Critique Of US In Farewell. USA Today (12/11, A1, Slavin, 2.27M) reports on its front page that in his farewell address today, retiring United Nations Secretary-General Kofi Annan "plans to deliver a tough critique of President Bush's policies" and "accuse the administration of trying to secure the United States from terrorism in part by dominating other nations through force, committing what he termed human rights abuses and taking military action without broad international support." Though Annan has "long been a critic of the war in Iraq and other Bush foreign policies," the speech is expected to be "among his toughest" and is "unusual for a U.N. secretary-general concluding his tenure."

Annan Outlines "Five Lessons" Learned During Leadership. Writing in an op-ed for the Washington Post (12/11, A19, 690K), Annan outlines "five lessons" he has learned during his 10 year tenure as UN secretary general. Among them, Annan says are the lessons that "in today's world we are all responsible for each other's security" and "each other's welfare." He also notes that "both security and prosperity depend on respect for human rights and the rule of law." His "fourth lesson, therefore, is that governments must be accountable for their actions, in the international as well as the domestic arena." However, Annan says such accountability can be achieved "only through multilateral institutions," which "must be organized in a fair and democratic way, giving the poor and the weak some influence over the actions of the rich and the strong. … More than ever, Americans, like the rest of humanity, need a functioning global system. Experience has shown, time and again, that the system works poorly when the United States remains aloof but it functions much better when there is farsighted US leadership."

Bolton's Position Expected To Stay Empty For Months. The Washington Post (12/11, A17, Kamen, 690K) "In the Loop" column reports that that "it's beginning to look like the post of US ambassador to the United Nations is once again going to be vacant for several months." Kamen says "unless President Bush uses his recess appointment powers once again, a new ambassador probably won't make it through the Senate much before March, and that's if the eventual nominee isn't controversial." As a result, deputy ambassador Alejandro Wolf "looks to be acting ambassador for a bit."

US May Soon Seek UN Vote On Iran Sanctions. The AP (12/11, Jahn) reports Washington "and its closest Western allies" may soon call a vote on UNSC sanctions against Iran, "even at the risk that Russia and China may abstain or veto the measures," officials said Sunday. An unidentified US official said American officials, along with the French and British counterparts, are "talking about a vote as soon as possible." Meanwhile, a second US official said the Russians "now want even more concessions," including "insisting that any resolution not mention tentative Russian plans to build a second reactor for the Iranians." The Russians also want to" limit any sanctions to three months, after which they would be reviewed," the official said.

State Department Used Google When Compiling Iran Sanctions List. In a front page article titled "Seeking Iran Intelligence, US Tries Google," the Washington Post (12/11, A1, Linzer, 690K) reports that "when the State Department recently asked the CIA for names of Iranians who could be sanctioned for their involvement in a clandestine nuclear weapons program, the agency refused, citing a large workload and a desire to protect its sources and tradecraft. Frustrated, the State Department assigned a junior Foreign Service officer to find the names another way -- by using Google." According to three officials, "those with the most hits under search terms such as 'Iran and nuclear'…became targets for international rebuke Friday when a sanctions resolution circulated at the United Nations."

Arab Leaders To Start Joint Nuclear Energy Program. The New York Times (12/11, Fattah, 1.16M) reports, "Arab leaders, meeting in the Saudi capital, Riyadh, on Sunday, said they intended to start a joint nuclear energy development program, a move certain to heighten concerns over a possible race for nuclear power in the oil-rich Persian Gulf. Leaders of the Gulf Cooperation Council concluded a two-day summit meeting in Riyadh on Sunday, agreeing to study how to proceed with development of such capacity." The Times adds, "Publicly, officials of the gulf council said the development of a nuclear energy program would help meet their rising demand for electricity, despite the huge oil reserves. ... But analysts and officials said the announcement had a different purpose -- to warn the United States not to acquiesce to Iran's nuclear ambitions as pressure grows on the Bush administration to reach out to Iran for help in stabilizing Iraq."

Will Regards Ahmadinejad As 2006's "Most Consequential" Person. Newsweek's George Will (12/18) writes, "How gruesome was 2006? The year's most consequential person was Iran's president, who says the Holocaust did not happen and vows to complete it. Regarding his nuclear aspirations, Mahmoud Ahmadinejad, whose manias are leavened with realism, treated the United Nations as a figment of the imagination of a fiction — the 'international community.'"

Hezbollah Issues Deadline As Beirut Protests Grow. NBC Nightly News (12/10, story 9, 0:15, Seigenthaler, 9.87M) reported, "In Lebanon anti-government pressure grows. Hundreds of thousands turned out for a massive rally in Beirut following a call by the Hezbollah-led opposition to step up efforts to bring down the US backed government there." The AP (12/11, Ghattas, Karam) reports that Lebanese Prime Minister Fuad Saniora was given "an ultimatum of a 'few days' to…form a national unity government with a big role for Hezbollah or face an escalating campaign to oust him." Despite the "heated rhetoric," the AP says Sunday's protests "remained peaceful and left the door open to the possibility of a settlement."

The Washington Post (12/11, A13, Shadid, 690K) said Naim Kassem, the deputy leader of Hezbollah, addressing "the biggest crowds yet in downtown Beirut," urged Saniora to "hold a news conference tonight or tomorrow…and announce [his] resignation as a gesture to preserve the unity of the Lebanese people and rejection of foreign tutelage." McClatchy (12/11, Lasseter) says demonstrators threatened "an escalation in a siege on the prime minister's headquarters" if he refused to resign. McClatchy notes that "while accounts vary of what the heightened tactics could consist of -- a government worker's strike and a storming of the headquarters have both been mentioned -- it's clear that the nation is headed toward a breaking point."

ABC World News (12/10, story 3, 2:15, Harris, 8.78M) said Sunday's protests "threatened to bring down the government." ABC (Dinnick) said Lebanon has become "another battleground where US interests are clashing with Iranian and Syrian agendas. Hezbollah leader Hassan Nasrallah promised the rallies will stay peaceful, but there are fears Lebanon will once again slide into violence, so an international mediator was called in to get both sides talking but there may be not much to discuss." The Los Angeles Times (12/11, Stack, 850K) says the protestors' "crushing show of political strength came carefully packaged with a harsh threat: Time for a political compromise is running out."

The New York Times (12/11, A3, Slackman, 1.16M) notes that "in many ways, Hezbollah has adopted a strategy that has been cheered by the White House in the past, in places like Ukraine, and even Lebanon, leaning on large, peaceful crowds to force unpopular governments to resign and pave the way for elections. But this time Washington and its allies have said the protest amounts to a coup d'état, fueling charges that the United States supports democratic practices only when its allies are winning."

USA Today (12/11, A12, Stinson, 2.27M) says "pressure on the government could increase today" as Hezbollah is expected to "call for a work strike" that "could close Beirut's international airport and shipping ports and slow other public services."

WSJournal Says Hezbollah Committed War Crimes In Lebanon. In an editorial, the Wall Street Journal (12/11, 2.04M) notes the release of "a remarkable report by retired Lieutenant Colonel Reuven Erlich of Israel's Intelligence and Terrorism Information Center. Relying heavily on captured Hezbollah documents, onsite and aerial photography and other first-hand evidence, the report shows how the Shiite group put innocent civilians at risk by deliberately deploying its forces in cities, towns and often private homes." The report also shows "how the use of civilian cover was explicitly part of Hezbollah's strategy." Such evidence, the Journal writes, demonstrates that "Hezbollah, not Israel, that is guilty of war crimes here." Beyond the war in Lebanon, the Journal says "these images suggest how Islamists seek to use the restraint of Western powers against them." Therefore, it says "our political leadership needs to speak as candidly as Israelis now are speaking about this enemy strategy, so the American people can understand and be steeled against this new civilian battleground."

Carter Defends Use Of "Apartheid" To Describe The Plight Of The Palestinians. In an interview with Newsweek's Eleanor Clift (12/18) former president Carter said of his new book "Palestine: Peace Not Apartheid," that "one of the purposes of the book was to provoke discussion, which is very rarely heard in this country, and to open up some possibility that we could rejuvenate or restart the peace talks in Israel that have been absent for six years." Asked if he "agonized" over the use of the term "apartheid," Carter responded, "Not really, because I knew that's an accurate description of what's going on in Palestine. I would say that the plight of the Palestinians now — the confiscation of their land, that they're being suppressed completely against voicing their disapproval of what's happening, the building of the wall that intrudes deep within their territory, the complete separation of Israelis from the Palestinians — all of those things in many ways are worse than some of the aspects of apartheid in South Africa."

ISG Characterized As Naïve Regarding Arab Regard For Palestinians. Time's Lisa Beyer (12/18) writes, "In lumping the Iraq mess in with the Palestinian problem -- and suggesting the first could not be fixed unless the second was too -- the Baker-Hamilton commission lent credibility to a corrosive myth: that the fundamental problem in the Arab world is the plight of the Palestinians. It is a falsehood perpetuated not just by the likes of Saddam Hussein and Osama bin Laden, who came late to the slogan after their actual beefs…gained insufficient traction in the Arab world. … In a decade of reporting in the region, I found it rarely took more than the arching of an eyebrow to get the most candid of Arab thinkers to acknowledge that the tears shed for the Palestinians today outside the West Bank and Gaza are of the crocodile variety."

Saudi Minister's Comments Suggest OPEC May Further Cut Output. The Financial Times (12/11, Hoyos) reports, "Two years ago Saudi Arabia, the world's biggest oil exporter, opened its spigots and let supply out-pace demand. The result was a gradual build up in oil inventories in the US, Europe and several Asian oil-consuming countries." But "[t]his month Ali Naimi, the country's influential oil minister, appeared abruptly to reverse that accommodating policy. At a meeting in Cairo he told reporters that the market was 'significantly' oversupplied." High inventories worry "Naimi because, as the spare-oil cushion in consuming countries has grown, some of the power to influence world oil prices has shifted from [OPEC] to its customers." Naimi's "utterance and the immediate echo of agreement from other ministers in Cairo is the best indication yet that the kingdom and Opec are seriously considering another cut to further trim the inventories outside their control."

Expectations Low For Six-Party North Korea Talks. The Wall Street Journal (12/11, A12, Ramstad, 2.04M) reports Pyongyang will return to the six party talks "in Beijing next Monday. But expectations are low that the meeting, the first such one in 13 months, can produce a breakthrough, reducing tensions with neighbors and the US." At the talks, the US is "ready to offer more specific incentives to North Korea than were agreed to in September 2005," but "even with offers of big political and economic incentives," the Journal says Pyongyang is "unlikely to end its nuclear program quickly." Assistant Secretary Hill, "struck a cautious tone in discussing expectations for next week's meeting." In an email, Hill said, "We've got some things we need done, and I suspect they will have some of their own ideas for what they want from the process. So we'll see what we can come up with."

AFP (12/11, Malakunas) reports the State Department announced late on Sunday that the talks would resume "around December 16" in Beijing, with a firm date expected to be confirmed Monday. Spokeswoman Joanne Moore said Washington expected the talks to focus on "implementing an agreement in September last year when the North agreed to give up its nuclear program." Meanwhile, the AP (12/11, Kim) reports that the talks "are likely to resume in the week starting Dec. 18," South Korea's top nuclear envoy said Sunday. Chun Yung-woo told The AP that he expects the talks to resume "in the week starting Dec. 18, but that consultations are still under way and China will announce the date soon."

Bush Says Vietnam Trade Deal Marks "Significant Step." The Financial Times (12/11, Kazmin, Callan) reports Vietnamese and US business leaders "hailed a US Congressional vote Sunday to permanently normalize trade relations with Vietnam, the final step on the long road to reconciliation between the two countries after their bitter war 30 years ago." President Bush said the development "marks a significant step forward in the process of normalizing relations with Vietnam, and will benefit both our nations." USTR Susan Schwab said the bill "shows that contrary to conventional wisdom, Democrats and Republicans, the administration and Congress, can work together to further our vital trade agenda."

China's Growth Threatens Role Of Foreign Investment. The Wall Street Journal (12/11, A1, Batson, 2.04M) reports in a front page article that China's entry into the World Trade Organization, "five years ago today, sparked an economic expansion that is the envy of the world. But now, that very growth is posing new problems for China and its increasingly uneasy trading partners." The Journal notes that "by becoming more open, China has become stronger and more prosperous. But the growing size and sophistication of its domestic economy have made the outside world less important to China's economic vigor," raising the "important question: Will China continue to be ever-more welcoming to foreign investment in the years ahead?" Even as China has begun to take "a more active role in international affairs, its economic strategy has shifted inward," and Treasury Secretary Henry Paulson's visit to Beijing this week is "part of a continuing effort by China's trading partners to deal with this new reality."

The Financial Times (12/11, Beattie, McGregor) notes that as China marks its five-year anniversary, China's "challenges will, if anything, increase rather than diminish now its five-year transition period is over," as "evinced by US saber-rattling ahead of its official mission to Beijing this week headed by Hank Paulson." The milestone marks a difference that is "more symbolic than practical, though it does coincide with several deadlines for commitments, such as opening up the banking sector," the Times notes.

Paulson Says Economic Relationship Key To US, Chinese Prosperity. Treasury Secretary Paulson writes in the Washington Post (12/11, A19, 690K) that "managing our economic relationship with China to ensure both nations benefit is vital to our nation's future prosperity. A market-based economy in China, with sustainable economic growth and full participation in rules-based international trade, is in our best interest -- and in the interest of the Chinese people." Paulson says the goal of this week's delegation is "to advance our common interests and find solutions to issues that strain our relationship." For example, he says "transparency and respect for the rule of law are core principles that affect all economic policy and trade issues," and that by "working on these principles across government ministries can enhance our ability to reach agreement on a number of key issues that we negotiate ministry-by-ministry."

Schwab Says China's Economic Record "Mixed," But Shows Signs Of Improvement. For her part, USTR Susan Schwab writes in the Financial Times (12/11) that China's anniversary "provides the opportunity to take stock -- through a congressionally mandated report issued on Monday by the office of the US Trade Representative -- of China's integration into the global economy and its compliance with WTO obligations." China's record, she notes, is "profoundly mixed," but Schwab says China has "moved with resolve to reform some of its economic and governmental structures over the past five years." Schwab also notes that during this week's meetings, administration officials will "clearly convey our view that a slowdown in reform hinders China's development and undermines the health of our bilateral ties." A strong trade relationship with China, she says, "depends on China's continued reform, and on a commitment to expand free and fair trade based on decisions by the actors in the market -- not by bureaucrats."

Mallaby Urges Sanctions For Currency Manipulations. Washington Post (12/11, A19, 690K) columnist Sebastian Mallaby says China's membership in the WTO "has gone astonishingly well," but "an awkward question hovers over Treasury Secretary Henry Paulson's China trip this week: How to deal with a country that appears to distort trade not through tariffs or quotas but through currency and savings policies?" This dilemma, he writes, "reflects a lopsidedness in the rules of globalization. To keep the trade playing field balanced, the WTO presides over a vast apparatus of quasi-law governing subsidies and tariffs; violators can be hauled in front of WTO tribunals. But there is no equivalent mechanism, other than a dormant provision buried in the charter of the International Monetary Fund, to punish countries that skew trade by manipulating their currencies. And there is no sanction at all for pursuing a growth strategy that relies on exports more than domestic consumption."

Rights Group Urges China To End Legal Restrictions. The New York Times (12/11, Kahn, 1.16M) reports that rules "requiring Chinese lawyers to submit to government supervision when representing clients in politically delicate cases have dealt a serious blow to the country's legal system and should be rescinded," Human Rights Watch said in a report to be issued Monday. The rights group said the rules, known as "guiding opinions," effectively "shut down the legal system to people fighting official land confiscations, forced relocation, corruption, pollution and other politically delicate matters in China's one-party system."

Local Elections Ease Pressure On Taiwan's Leader. The Wall Street Journal (12/11, A14, Dean, Piling, 2.04M) reports that a "better-than-expected performance by Taiwan's governing party in weekend mayoral elections could ease political pressure on President Chen Shui-bian and complicate the opposition's efforts to win back control of the government…in 2008 presidential elections." The elections for mayor in Taiwan's two biggest cities, Taipei and Kaohsiung, were "watched closely as indicators of public support for Mr. Chen's Democratic Progressive Party following a spate of corruption scandals affecting people close to the president." However, the Times cautions that the results are "far from signaling an end to Mr. Chen's troubles," but analysts "said the mixed outcome could at least mean that Mr. Chen avoids pressure from his party to resign before his second and final four-year term ends in 2008."

Former Chilean Dictator Pinochet Dead At 91. The death of Augusto Pinochet Ugarte, the former military dictator of Chile, receives prominent and extensive coverage across major media. ABC World News (12/10, story 5, 1:55, Berman, 8.78M) called Pinochet "one of the world's most notorious dictators," saying he "kept brutal control over his country and his opponents for almost 20 years. Now victims of his regime will never see him brought to justice." NBC Nightly News (12/10, story 6, 0:35, Seigenthaler, 9.87M) called his tenure a "17-year reign of terror."

At the start of its 2,600-word report, the New York Times (12/11, Kandell, 1.16M) says the "brutal dictator who repressed and reshaped Chile for nearly two decades and became a notorious symbol of human rights abuse and corruption" died Sunday at age 91, "a week after being hospitalized and undergoing angioplasty and another operation after an acute heart attack." The Washington Post (12/11, A1, Reel, Smith, 690K) says in the lead of its 2,000-word story that Pinochet's government "murdered and tortured thousands during his repressive 17-year rule." The Los Angeles Times (12/11, Rotella, McDonnell, 850K) starts a 2,700-word report by saying Pinochet was the "embodiment of the brutal and intensely anti-communist South American military dictator."

The Chicago Tribune (12/11, McMahon, 617K) says Pinochet ended his life "weakened by ill health, pursued by government prosecutors and abandoned by all but his most loyal defenders." McClatchy (12/11, Hall, Chang, Hughes) says he was "hounded by human rights groups until the end and defended with equal zeal by the armed forces." The Christian Science Monitor (12/11, Ross, 59K) and the AP (12/10) are among others reporting on Pinochet's death.

The Washington Post (12/11, A16, Franklin, 690K) reports "thousands of jubilant Chileans streamed into the streets of Santiago" after learning that Pinochet had died. Many "danced and popped open champagne, while caravans of cars with horns blaring toured the capital for hours." The New York Times (12/11, Bonnefoy, 1.16M) says that while "thousands of demonstrators took to the streets in celebration," within hours "the revelry was marred by violence, with confrontations breaking out and the police using tear gas and water cannons against a large group marching toward the presidential palace."

More Commentary On Pinochet's Death. The New York Times (12/11, 1.16M) writes in an editorial that "the central puzzle" about Pinochet "was that until recently he retained admirers in Chile and abroad, especially among people emerging from Communism. He masked his corruption and brutality by tailoring his level of repression to just what he needed to retain power and prestige."

The Los Angeles Times (12/11, 850K) editorializes, "It's a coincidence that Jeane Kirkpatrick" and Pinochet "died only a few days apart. But in death as in life, the two are associated with a political theory that defined the early days of the neoconservative movement in the United States. Unfortunately for Kirkpatrick, its author, the theory proved to be dead wrong. The idea was that right-wing authoritarian governments were much better bets for conversion to democracy than left-wing totalitarian ones."

USA Today (12/11, 21A, 2.27M) editorializes that Pinochet and Saddam Hussein "have long been members of the club of tyrants who killed thousands of their citizens. The difference between them emerged Sunday when Pinochet died. … Numerous attempts to bring him to justice failed. Saddam, sitting in a Baghdad jail cell after a court sentenced him to death, must surely be envious."

In a Los Angeles Times (12/11, 850K) op-ed, USC Annenberg School for Communication visiting professor Marc Cooper, who worked as a translator to Chilean President Salvador Allende, overthrown by Pinochet in 1973, writes, "Not with little irony did the gods choose to reclaim former Chilean dictator Augusto Pinochet on Sunday, which was International Human Rights Day. … If human justice failed on previous occasions to fully snare Pinochet, the greater forces of nature and biology this time imposed the maximum sentence -- and on the most appropriate day of the calendar."

Ros-Lehtinen Denies Urging Killing Of Castro. The New York Times/AP (12/11, A23) reports Florida Rep. Ileana Ros-Lehtinen "says a video showing her calling for Fidel Castro's assassination is fake, a charge denied Sunday by the film's director." The congresswoman appears in the 28-second clip made available on the Internet by the makers of a new British documentary, "638 Ways to Kill Castro." In it, she says: "I welcome the opportunity of having anyone assassinate Fidel Castro and any leader who is oppressing the people." However, Ros-Lehtinen says the filmmakers spliced clips together to make the sound bite.

American Journalist's Murder Draws Attention To Mexico's Justice System. The New York Times (12/11, A17, McKinley, Moynihan, 1.16M) reports the investigation into the death of American journalist Bradley Roland Will last month in Mexico "seemed cut and dried" until Dec. 1 "when a judge freed two of the men photographed shooting at the protesters, citing a lack of evidence." In addition to "underscoring how infrequently killings of journalists and antigovernment protesters are solved in Mexico," the case has "drawn widespread attention because it reveals the sad clash of left-wing idealism…with the murky realities of Mexican politics." The protesters said he was killed by "government-backed paramilitary thugs who had already killed a dozen others since the conflict here began in May," and "charge that his death is still more proof that the state government remains repressive, its prosecutors willing to cover up crimes by government officials."

Darfur Crisis Threatens To Draw Neighboring Nations Into Regional Conflict. The Christian Science Monitor (12/11, Schapiro, 59K) reports the crisis in Darfur has "exploded in recent weeks, and now threatens to drag fragile neighboring countries into a regional war. Both Chad and the Central African Republic (CAR) have become engulfed in fighting that involves a toxic mix of rebel groups, government forces, armed militias, and civilians." In eastern Chad, "hundreds of aid workers have been evacuated due to increased hostilities between military forces and anti-government rebel groups, while Arab militiamen have ventured deeper into the country to conduct assaults, resulting in the displacement of nearly 100,000 Chadians. And atrocities committed by a variety of rebel groups and armed bandits over the past few months have forced tens of thousands of people from the CAR to cross the border into Chad."

Thirty Killed In Darfur Ambush; Investigators Taken Hostage. The Washington Post/AP (12/11, A16) reports militiamen "ambushed a refugee convoy in western Darfur, killing about 30 civilians, and African Union peacekeepers investigating the attack were taken hostage by rioters," the AU and the United Nations said Sunday. An international aid worker said that the assailants were janjaweed. Meanwhile, African Union spokesman Noureddine Mezni said "rioters angry over the deaths were holding captive a helicopter crew and eight peacekeepers sent to investigate."

Halliburton Employees Attacked In Algeria. The Houston Chronicle/AP (12/11) reports that two vehicles carrying employees of an affiliate of Houston-based Halliburton co. were attacked Sunday near Algiers, killing one Algerian driver, witnesses said. The "full extent of the casualties" in the attack was not immediately clear. Nine American employees of BRC, or Brown & Root-Condor, were returning to a Sheraton Hotel from their offices when they were attacked.

Indonesia's Aceh Province To Hold First Election Since Tsunami. The Christian Science Monitor (12/11, Montlake, 59K) reports that voters in the Indonesian province of Aceh go to the polls Monday, "nearly two years after a devastating tsunami scoured its coastline and released an outpouring of international aid for the stricken survivors." The ballot is the first since the signing in August 2005 of "a landmark peace accord between the Indonesian government and armed rebels, who agreed to lay down their weapons in return for political autonomy for Aceh." Former rebels are now "competing in electoral races for the governorship and 19 district mayors and regents."

The New York Times (12/11, A4, Mydans, 1.16M) reports the tsunami "seems to have taken the fire out of a 29-year conflict. A hard-won peace agreement that made the election possible appears to be holding. There are still obstacles ahead, but if the process continues to move forward, an armed insurgency group will perform the rare feat of transforming itself into a political party within the government it opposed." The Times notes that "even as post-tsunami reconstruction has bogged down in bureaucratic confusion and corruption, the dismantling of the war has proceeded quickly with what appears to be a genuine commitment from both sides."

Bangladesh Deploys Troops To Quell Pre-election Violence. The New York Times (12/11, Sengupta, 1.16M) reports briefly that the interim government in Bangladesh, "faced with mounting opposition party protests, has deployed the army in what appears to be an attempt to check pre-election violence." The order by President Iajuddin Ahmed was issued Saturday night, "on the eve of opposition party threats to surround the presidential palace." Although political violence has "become routine in Bangladesh," it "remains unclear to what extent the president enjoys the full backing of the interim government in his decision to pull out the army."

Economist Awarded Nobel Peace Prize For Fight Against Poverty. ABC World News (12/10, story 4, 0:15, Harris, 8.78M) reported, "Bangladeshi economist Mohammed Yunus, accepting this year's Noble Peace Prize for his work helping the poor with small loans, expressed hope that his award would inspire new thinking about fighting terrorism." USA Today/AP (12/11) notes that Yunus "shared the award with his Grameen Bank for helping people rise above poverty by giving them microcredit" loans.

NBC Nightly News (12/10, story 11, 0:35, Seigenthaler, 9.87M) reported, "At the Nobel Peace Prize ceremony in Sweden, awards were handed out to six Americans for physics, medicine, and economics and to a Turkish author for literature. The Peace Prize was presented in Norway to an economist from Bangladesh known as the banker to the poor. In his acceptance speech, Mohammed Unis said the world should get on with fighting poverty and stop wasting money fighting wars."

German Police Investigating Russian Businessman Who Met With Litvinenko. The New York Times (12/11, Myers, Landler, 1.16M) reports German authorities "announced Sunday that they had begun a criminal investigation of" Russian businessman Dmitri V. Kovtun "after finding traces of polonium 210 around Hamburg beginning on Oct. 28 — four days before he met in London with" Alexander Litvinenko. The Times notes the announcement "raised the possibility that the polonium was carried from Moscow to London by way of Germany."

The Wall Street Journal (12/11, A14, Crawford, Cullison, Mollenkamp, 2.04M) reports, "Scotland Yard, Russian police and about 300 German police and other officials are involved in the investigation of Mr. Litvinenko's death, raising diplomatic tensions between Russia and the West. Yesterday, investigators in Hamburg complained that Russian authorities aren't cooperating and haven't responded to their request for access to the Aeroflot plane that transported Mr. Kovtun to Hamburg from Moscow, said Thomas Menzel, head of Hamburg's special investigation squad for the case."

The Washington Post (12/11, A13, Smiley, Finn, 690K) reports Menzel "said Kovtun, a Soviet army veteran and business consultant who had lived in Germany for 12 years, flew to Hamburg from Moscow on an Aeroflot flight. 'Aeroflot is not available to us. It is probable that he was already contaminated when he flew on the plane,' Menzel said. 'We have not received any answers to our questions so far' from Russian authorities." USA Today/AP (12/11) reports, "German prosecutors did not say whether they suspect Kovtun might have been involved in Litvinenko's death. But they said they were investigating him on suspicion he may have improperly handled radioactive material."

Litvinenko Said To Have Converted To Islam. Time (12/18, McAllister, 4.03M) reports, "Several close friends said [Alexander] Litvinenko had converted to Islam a few days before he died, in a kind of atonement for atrocities Russia (and perhaps Litvinenko himself) had committed in Chechnya, although another doubted any conversion had taken place. Litvinenko's widow Marina had requested a nondenominational service at the graveside, but an imam interrupted the proceedings to perform Islamic rites."

EU Expected To Halt Membership Talks With Turkey. The Wall Street Journal (12/11, A12, Echikson, 2.04M) reports European foreign ministers will meet today in Brussels to consider "a last-ditch Turkish proposal to end a deadlock over Cyprus that threatens Turkey's membership talks with the European Union." EU ambassadors failed to reach a decision last week, and diplomats in Ankara "expect foreign ministers to fail, pushing the issue to EU heads of state who meet Dec. 15 and 16 in Brussels" who are expected "to suspend parts of Turkey's membership negotiations." The Times notes that "pessimists fear the partial pause will evolve into a more permanent freeze, turning Turkey toward nationalism and away from the West."

Similarly, the Christian Science Monitor (12/11, Schleifer, 59K) says EU leaders "appear likely to decide at a summit later this week to partially suspend talks on Turkey's membership." But as EU foreign ministers prepare to discuss the issue, "some observers -- particularly in Europe -- see Turkey's stance as self-defeating obstinancy. But others say it is in fact fueled by a greater sense of self-confidence, the result of a surging economy and an increased sense of its own growing strategic importance, which may dampen the effects of any rupture with the EU."

NATO Urged To Extend Membership To Balkan Nations. Former Croatian prime minister, Miomir Zuzul, writes in the Wall Street Journal (12/11, 2.04M) that although the "search for peace and democratic reform in the Middle East is NATO's most important challenge," this focus on security and reform "outside Europe threatens to sideline NATO's core responsibility to act within Europe." Zuzul notes that the Alliance "contributed to the economic growth and democratization of postwar Western Europe," which "makes it imperative that NATO's doors remain open to new European members hoping to make a similar journey from the days of dictatorship, discord and privation to democracy, peace and prosperity." He warns that while "a key portion of the European geopolitical space -- the Balkans -- remains unsettled," the "best, the only, way to stabilize what otherwise might become Europe's ghetto is the region's gradual integration into NATO."

TERRORISM NEWS:

The Threat From Within (USNEWS)

By Mortimer B. Zuckerman

U.S. News and World Report, December 11, 2006

It is chilling that the Baker-Hamilton report came on the eve of Pearl Harbor's anniversary. In 1941, clashes every day in the Atlantic Ocean made us more focused on the imminence of war with Germany than with Japan. Today all eyes are on Iraq. It's called the center of the war on terrorism, but it must not monopolize our attention. We need a third eye because we are now less likely to be attacked by international terrorists than by homegrown American citizens, self-radicalized individuals who are members of groups inspired by al Qaeda propaganda.

This is a profoundly demoralizing thought, given the long tradition of success our nation has enjoyed in infusing newcomers with the American ideal. Britain, taking a different course, was proud to have created a multicultural society. But apparently well-adapted young Muslims who were born in Britain exploded the subway bombs of July 2005. Now the head of Britain's domestic intelligence agency, Eliza Manningham-Buller, has come out with a grave warning. Not so long ago it was an offense for anyone even to mention the name of the head of MI-5. (The box office hit, Casino Royale, has it right: 007's boss, Judi Dench, is a distinctly anonymous figure). So the fact that the MI-5 director has stepped out of the shadows is significant in itself. And what she says is that there are many more British Muslims who back the terrorists. MI-5 has stopped five plots to date. We know of the one to blow up 10 planes over the Atlantic, but MI-5 is monitoring 1,600 other suspects, mostly homegrown Islamic terrorists who get their training in murder and mayhem on the Internet. In Germany, too, only an alert train conductor prevented the detonation of propane and gasoline bombs that would have horribly burned and killed hundreds of commuters.

A new training ground. Interviews with the heads of counterterrorism and local police officials in the United States yield similar assessments. The threat is from second- and third-generation children of immigrants, fluent in English and accustomed to American society but using the legal rights of U.S. citizenship to rebel from within. They have learned the Koran on the Internet; they lead small clusters of 20 to 25 mostly young men who share feelings of alienation, a longing for self-importance, a need to be a part of some larger group or cause. They have developed what is called "adversarial assimilation."

The Internet has replaced Afghanistan as a training ground. It is effectively the university of jihadist studies, where hundreds of Muslims from all corners of the world can study the rules of jihad, while they live in it anonymously. Here they learn to fire a shoulder-held antiaircraft missile; to prepare explosives and make bombs out of batteries and improvise hand-thrown charges to hit vehicles; to seek a position on a crowded bus to achieve maximum casualties; to plan kidnappings; and to concoct botulism toxin.

Marc Sageman, who collected the life histories of 400 would-be jihadists, found that most were well-to-do, with two thirds having some college education and only 27 percent characterized as lower class. Some 70 percent joined the ranks of the global jihadists while away from home. Separated from the traditional bonds of family and culture, they drifted to the mosques more for companionship than for religion, but there they found extremists who appeared to offer a compelling, all-encompassing explanation for their feelings of anomie and lack of self-worth.

HOMELAND RESPONSE:

Imams Seek To Settle With Airline (WT)

By Audrey Hudson

The Washington Times, December 11, 2006

DOJ_NMG_0104144

A group of Muslim imams is seeking an out-of-court settlement with US Airways, saying they should not have been removed from a Minnesota-to-Phoenix flight last month and were not behaving suspiciously.

Five of the six Islamic religious leaders have retained the Council on American-Islamic Relations for legal representation and are seeking a "mutually agreeable" resolution, said Nihad Awad, CAIR executive director.

US Airways scheduled a meeting with the imams on Dec. 4 to discuss the incident, but the men canceled it and hired the activist group to act as legal counsel.

"With the hopes of reaching an amicable resolution to this matter, we would like to take this opportunity to ask for a formal meeting with US Airways executives and legal counsel," said Arsalan Iftikhar, CAIR's national legal director, in a letter to the airline.

The imams represented by CAIR include Omar Shahin, Didmar Faja, Ahmad Shqeirat, Marwan Sadeddin and Mohamed Ibrahim.

Mahmoud Sulaiman of New Mexico is the only imam not included as a plaintiff.

Mr. Sulaiman is the passenger who asked another passenger to switch seats with him to accommodate a blind imam and was one of three imams who asked for a seat-belt extension even though the police report cites his weight at 170 pounds.

The Washington Times first reported on Nov. 28 that the imams were not in their assigned seats, but seated in a formation similar to the September 11 hijackers and controlled the exits to the plane. The men also requested seat-belt extensions but did not appear to need them, and engaged in conversations critical of the United States, according to police reports and eyewitness statements.

The imams and CAIR officials maintain that press reports as well as Internet sites and blogs have circulated charges they say misrepresent the facts of the Nov. 20 incident.

"Unfortunately, the false claims and smears used against these religious leaders only serve to cloud the real issue involved, that of how national security can be maintained while preserving constitutionally protected freedoms and respect for religious diversity," said Mr. Awad.

CAIR says the men were handcuffed for several hours and is also demanding hearings on religious and ethnic profiling at airports.

Mr. Shahin told The Washington Times he was only handcuffed for "10 or 15 minutes" and that the imams were not led off the plane in handcuffs.

Federal air marshals and pilots called the imams' actions a probe of airport security as well as a probe of the politically correct mentality of air passengers.

The Washington Times reported in 2004 that flight crews and passengers were experiencing a number of terrorist probes, most notably Northwest Airlines Flight 327 from Detroit to Los Angeles in June 2004, during which 14 Syrian men posing as musicians may have practiced a dry run.

Also in July 2004, a passenger from Syria was taken into custody at the Minneapolis-St. Paul International Airport while carrying anti-American materials and a note suggesting he intended to commit suicide.

A pilot reported that he watched a man of Middle Eastern descent at the Minneapolis airport using binoculars to get airplane tail numbers and writing the numbers in a notebook to correspond with flight numbers.

An airline spokeswoman says they have received the request from CAIR for a meeting, as well as a meeting request from Rep.-elect Keith Ellison, Minnesota Democrat, the first Muslim elected to Congress, but no date has been set.

"As far as we are concerned, we are done, and we will continue to back the crew, but we do want to reach out to the passengers," said spokeswoman Andrea Rader.

Muslims held a pray-in recently at the Minneapolis airport and called for a prayer room to accommodate their rigorous prayer schedule.

"Actually, the topic of a prayer room never came up in our meeting," said airport spokesman Patrick Hogan. "They mentioned it to the press before the meeting."

The airport already has two areas where anyone of any faith can pray -- a privately operated Community Counseling Center operated by a minister who encourages people of all faiths to pray in his facility and another area on the mezzanine level.

DOJ_NMG_0104145

"Our intent at present is simply to increase public awareness of those facilities through signage and other outreach activities," Mr. Hogan said.

"If over time we find we need more space to accommodate people's needs, we would consider looking at other alternatives. In any case, the space would be for people of all faiths -- or none, for that matter -- and not dedicated to the practice of a particular belief system," he said.

Will Real ID Cause Chaos At The DMV? (USNEWS)

By Angie C. Marek

U.S. News and World Report, December 11, 2006

Back in May 2005, few really considered the broad implications of the Real ID Act, a bill designed to improve the security of driver's licenses in every state. Attached to an emergency funding measure for the Iraq war, Real ID slipped through Congress and was signed by the president-with little scrutiny but big effects. "The amount of congressional attention paid to something so game changing," says one Washington lobbyist, "was ... microscopic."

These days Real ID is hard to miss, and the nation's governors are up in arms over it. In less than two years, it will require states to begin issuing upgraded driver's licenses to roughly 245 million Americans. Although most governors say they'd like to improve identification security, many say the Real ID Act creates a multibillion-dollar unfunded mandate and deadlines that are impossible to meet. It may also mean longer lines at Department of Motor Vehicles offices nationwide and new costs for consumers. Governors like Mike Huckabee of Arkansas hope the new Congress "will throw us a lifeline" and make changes to Real ID. Whether that's necessary is the subject of debate. But if changes aren't made, Washington is in for a bipartisan revolt in the states.

There's little question driver's licenses could use some securing. In the current system, easily forged birth certificates or utility bills are often taken as proof of identity or residency. Jonathan Frankel of the Department of Homeland Security says that means there's "no guarantee ... the person holding the document bears a relationship to the name and identity on the license." The 9/11 commission found that the 19 hijackers secured 13 driver's licenses, seven of them by falsely claiming that they lived in Virginia.

Real ID aimed to fix that. By May 11, 2008, all licenses must be machine readable, meaning any law enforcement officer will be able to, say, scan your license's bar code and make sure the digital information matches what's on the front; that will make tampering more difficult. DMVs will also have to verify identity documents like birth certificates or baptismal records. In most cases, images of those documents will be scanned into computers, where they must be held for up to 10 years. States must share, at minimum, the information printed on the license to prevent fraud. Residents of states that don't comply will no longer be able to use their license for federal purposes like boarding an airplane.

Obstacles. But states are questioning whether Real ID is feasible. Many DMVs haven't started needed upgrades because they're still waiting for detailed DHS guidance on how to proceed. Meanwhile, a report released in September by the National Governors Association and other groups estimated that Real ID, which would require more DMV employees and the purchase of new technology, could cost states over $11 billion in five years. The report also said the time it takes for a consumer to renew a license would more than double. In many cases, conveniences like renewing by mail will be abolished. DHS disputes claims about longer lines and is working on a new cost estimate. Still, "if this bill really goes forward," says Jim Harper of the Cato Institute, "I think you'll see many red-blooded Americans leaping over DMV counters in sheer rage."

Huckabee says governors are already "universal" in their rage. Places as varied as New Hampshire, Washington, and Kentucky have considered bills that would prohibit participation in the effort or at least urge Real ID's repeal. Also controversial: special Real ID licensing rules for certain legal immigrants. Illegal immigrants can't have a Real ID license at all.

All that anger falls to a new Congress, which must sort out what, if anything, to do. The September report called for extending the deadline and handing more dough to states. Speaker-to-be Nancy Pelosi opposed Real ID when it first came up in early 2005, but Democrats, eager to "get tough" on security, "haven't committed to much of anything yet," says David Quam of the governors association. In coming weeks, though, they may have to take a stand. Sitting on the fence on Real ID looks like a license for trouble.

Katrina Begets A Baby Boom By Immigrants (NYT)

By Eduardo Porter

The New York Times, December 11, 2006

NEW ORLEANS — First came the storm. Then came the workers. Now comes the baby boom.

In the latest twist to the demographic transformation of New Orleans since it was swamped by Hurricane Katrina last year, hundreds of babies are being born to Latino immigrant workers, both legal and illegal, who flocked to the city to toil on its reconstruction.

The throng of babies gurgling in the handful of operational maternity wards here has come as a big surprise — and a financial strain — to this historically black and white city, which before the hurricane had only a small Latino community and virtually no experience of illegal immigration.

"Of all the myriad things that have changed after Katrina, this wasn't high on anybody's priority list," said Dr. Mark Peters, chief executive of East Jefferson General Hospital in Metairie.

Because many immigrant mothers cannot afford to pay for prenatal care or delivery services, New Orleans's newest citizens are adding an unexpected load to the decimated health infrastructure in a city abandoned by many of its doctors. Much of the state-financed Charity Hospital system, which before Hurricane Katrina provided the bulk of care to New Orleans's uninsured and indigent population, remains closed.

Lacking health insurance and barred from most government assistance, expectant immigrant mothers can go to only the handful of charitable clinics that are still operating and that do not question a woman's immigration status when offering low-cost prenatal care.

"Prenatal care is our daily nightmare," said Shaula Lovera, the program coordinator for the Latino Health Access Network, an outreach service operated by Catholic Charities.

The two health units providing prenatal care run by the Louisiana Department of Health and Hospitals saw more than 1,200 pregnant women from January to mid-November. Virtually all were Latino immigrants.

"Before the storm, only 2 percent were Hispanic; now about 96 percent are Hispanic," said Beth Perriloux, the head nurse in the department's health unit in Metairie.

There are so many pregnant women that the clinics have reached capacity. Dr. Erin Brewer, the department's medical director, said, "We've gone from having a maternity clinic two to three days a week to five days a week."

Many immigrant women are forgoing prenatal care and showing up, ready to deliver, in hospital emergency rooms, where they are required to be seen even if they are in the country illegally.

"When I felt the pains I just went to the women's and children's hospital," said Noemi, an illegal immigrant from Oaxaca, Mexico, who arrived in New Orleans right after the storm as part of a cleaning crew from North Carolina. She left the city but then returned in October, a month after giving birth to her daughter Alejandra in Lake Charles, 200 miles west.

"If they hadn't received me, my girl would have been born in the hall," Noemi said. (She asked that her last name be withheld to protect her identity.)

There has been a small Latino population in New Orleans for several decades, mostly Hondurans who came after Hurricane Mitch battered Central America in 1998. But that population has started to grow.

According to the Louisiana Health and Population Survey, released in November, the number of Latinos living in households in Orleans and Jefferson Parishes has increased by about 10,000 since 2004, to 60,000, even as the total population has fallen by about a quarter, to roughly 625,000.

Last summer, researchers at Tulane University estimated that there were 5,000 to 7,000 illegal Latino workers in Orleans Parish alone, excluding nonworking relatives. But some community workers estimate that tens of thousands have arrived since the storm.

Immigrants can be seen working on roofs, installing Sheetrock and laying tile all over town, from the up-market Lakeview neighborhood in the west to East New Orleans. At the Lowe's home improvement store in the city's Bywater neighborhood, clusters of day laborers mill about in the parking lot every morning, waiting for jobs.

DOJ_NMG_0104147

Most are not new to the United States. They come from Texas, Florida or California, seeking construction work that can pay $150 a day. But there are some newcomers, including Sara Alvarado, a 26-year-old Honduran, who arrived in the United States in August after a monthlong odyssey through Mexico with her partner, Tony, 32.

When Ms. Alvarado finally got to New Orleans, brought into the country by coyotes, or smugglers, who charged $6,000, she was more than six months pregnant. The last time she had seen a doctor was four months before.

"The coyotes wanted to charge me more and bring me across in a car," Ms. Alvarado said, sitting in her cramped room in a shotgun shack in the Upper Ninth Ward that she and Tony share with four other people. "But I didn't take a single vitamin, and I came across that desert jumping fences and all that, and look, here is this boy."

She cradled a plump bundle: Jackson Antonio, an American citizen who came into the world at Tulane-Lakeside Hospital 12 days early on Oct. 17, the day the 300 millionth American was born.

At Tulane-Lakeside, doctors are delivering 215 to 240 babies a month, which is 60 percent to 70 percent more than before Hurricane Katrina, said André du Plessis, the hospital's chief operating officer.

Some of that increase is because of the lack of hospitals. But the numbers also reflect the new population. "Approximately 20 to 25 percent of the babies are Hispanic," Mr. du Plessis said. "Pre-Katrina, we largely didn't have a Hispanic population."

Dr. Kevin Work, an obstetrician who started a private practice a year before the hurricane, decided to focus almost exclusively on the Latino population when he saw the abundance of immigrant women at the maternity clinics run by the Department of Health and Hospitals, where he works two and a half days a week.

"The demographics of the health units used to be 85 percent African-American, who had Medicaid, and 15 percent other," Dr. Work said. "When the clinics reopened, I started seeing the faces changing. Now 85 to 90 percent are Hispanic undocumented, and only 10 to 15 percent have Medicaid."

Dr. Work has been offering a low-cost prenatal care package, charging about $800 for the full term of a pregnancy, a small fraction of the typical bill. He also runs advertisements on the two local Spanish-language radio stations.

The boomlet of Latino babies in New Orleans poses particular challenges. Nonemergency Medicaid is not available to illegal immigrants or even to legal immigrants who have been in the country less than five years. Virtually none of the immigrant mothers-to-be have private insurance. They are mostly poor. Many fear being deported.

Hospitals will deliver these women's babies only if they arrive in labor through the emergency room. There, emergency Medicaid pays for up to a 24-hour hospital stay for a vaginal delivery and a 48-hour stay for a Caesarean section, Dr. Work said.

Most of Dr. Work's patients do not speak English. At the Department of Health and Hospitals' unit in Metairie, where he sees patients Tuesday mornings, he relies on the "language line," a phone-based translation service. Sometimes women arrive with one of the Latina translators who prowl the clinics and charge the patients $60 per session.

Dr. Work said he delivered 50 to 70 babies a month, most born to Latino immigrants. He even delivered Jackson Antonio, though he could not remember doing so, the memory lost in a blur of births.

The new population is having a tough time in New Orleans. Jackson Antonio was required to stay 48 hours in the hospital. But Ms. Alvarado had to leave after 24. "If I stayed longer they would charge me," she said. She spent the next day looking for a car safety seat, which hospitals require to discharge new babies.

Health workers at Catholic Charities eventually found a car seat. They also gave her a crib, so her baby would not have to sleep on a mattress on the floor. Volunteers at Common Ground, a nonprofit assistance organization that opened a health clinic after the storm, have been trying to help Ms. Alvarado apply for assistance for her child.

Still, Ms. Alvarado's life is mostly an endless hustle at the limit of subsistence. She started Jackson Antonio straight off on baby formula because she expected to go to work as soon as she recovered from the delivery. But she cannot leave home, because there is nobody to care for the baby.

Her partner, Tony, who declined to provide his last name, spends most days waiting with the day laborers at a Shell gas station near their home. But with demand for workers slackening, he is having a hard time finding a job. Just before Thanksgiving he worked 10 hours on an apartment building, but the woman who hired him disappeared before paying him his promised $120.

Meanwhile, bills are piling up, starting with repayment of the $6,000 they borrowed to pay the coyotes' fee. They have repaid only about $1,300, Ms. Alvarado said. And they need $350 a month just for their share of rent and utilities.

Ms. Alvarado must also send money to Honduras for her two daughters, ages 7 and 9, who live with her mother. Tony has three daughters in Honduras, too, living with their mother.

Because Jackson Antonio is a United States citizen entitled to Medicaid, Ms. Alvarado gets a monthly ration of nine cans of baby formula, as well as powdered milk, canned juice, and eggs and cheese for her. But the staff at the food stamp office told her they were required to report any applicant who was an illegal immigrant to the authorities, so Ms. Alvarado did not apply.

She said she might return to Honduras because there was no point to staying if she could not work. “I came to make a future for my mother and my girls,” she said.

But if she can work, she will probably stay. And the baby boom may even provide an opportunity. She said she might go into business taking care of the babies of other Latino mothers.

WAR NEWS:

No Rift With Administration, Baker And Hamilton Say (WP)

By Michael Abramowitz

The Washington Post, December 11, 2006

Former secretary of state James A. Baker III said for the first time yesterday that the Iraq Study Group remains committed to democracy in Iraq, as he and Co-Chairman Lee H. Hamilton offered conciliatory words to a Bush administration that has reacted coolly to the panel's key recommendations.

The group's report makes no mention of President Bush's oft-stated goal of establishing democracy in Iraq; in the five days since its release, Baker and Hamilton have talked in more modest terms, referring to Bush's recent formulation of creating an Iraq that can govern and defend itself. But in an interview on "Fox News Sunday," Baker emphasized: "We don't negate the goal of democracy."

"The goal of democracy has always been a goal and foundation and basis for American foreign policy, and it will always remain that," Baker said.

The comments appeared part of an effort by Baker and Hamilton to use the Sunday talk shows to play down talk of rifts between the panel and the Bush administration, which is finishing its own review of strategy in Iraq. In televised interviews, Baker said he understands the administration's internal studies call for some of the things his panel urged, such as changing the focus of the U.S. military presence in Iraq from combat to training.

Baker also sought to portray the panel's proposal for a more aggressive Middle East diplomatic effort as less ambitious than its critics have suggested. At a news conference last week, Bush seemed to take issue with the panel's suggestion that his administration should engage in high-level dialogue with Syria and Iran without preconditions.

Baker said that he wanted to make sure "everyone understands . . . the limited nature of what we are proposing with respect to Iran and Syria." He said the administration should find out whether Iran is willing to do what it did several years ago to help stabilize Afghanistan. He also said Syria would be required to meet several key obligations, including cooperating in the investigation of political assassinations in Lebanon and persuading Hamas to recognize Israel's right to exist.

"We're not talking about sitting down with Iran and talking to them about everything under the sun," Baker said on NBC's "Meet the Press."

White House press secretary Tony Snow dismissed speculation that the White House is hostile to the Baker-Hamilton group's recommendations, saying there is a "moment of opportunity here" for the two parties to come together on a new policy for Iraq. But he stressed in an interview: "Obviously, the president is the one who is going to be offering the final call about the way forward."

The president plans to spend much of the coming week on the Iraq review with officials at the Pentagon and State Department, and will also consult with outside experts. Snow said he expects the results of the review to be announced before Christmas, but "at this point it isn't a nail-down promise."

DOJ_NMG_0104149

On the talk shows, Hamilton and Baker pushed back against some of the criticism their group has received in recent days, particularly from hawks such as Sen. John McCain (R-Ariz.), who want the administration to deploy more troops in Baghdad to quell the violence.

"We do not think we have" 50,000 to 100,000 troops "to put there on a sustained basis," Hamilton said on CBS's "Face the Nation." "Furthermore, if you do that, you are going to get the Iraqis to react by saying, 'Oh well, let the Americans take it.' That's exactly what we don't want. We want the Iraqis at the point of the spear, not the American forces."

Hamilton, a former Democratic representative from Indiana, also appeared to acknowledge, but reject, criticism from some in the administration that the panel's estimate of how quickly new Iraqi units can be trained is unrealistic. The panel stated that U.S. combat brigades can be withdrawn by the first quarter of 2008.

"In the last year or so, we have sharply improved that training, and it can be done if we put the priority on it that we're emphasizing. It's the best way forward with the options that we have," Hamilton said on "Meet the Press."

Baker said on "Face the Nation" that he is not surprised by some of the criticism for his panel's work from conservatives who have been ardent supporters of the war and the Bush administration.

"The situation is such that politics as usual is not going to come up with the answer," he said. "There has to be a unity of the American people and a unity of the country behind an approach if this is going to work."

The two men's comments came after Iraqi President Jalal Talabani harshly criticized the panel's report for "dangerous" recommendations that would "undermine the sovereignty of Iraq and the constitution."

Bush And Iraq Study Group: Competing Visions For Middle East (CSM)

By Howard Lafranchi

The Christian Science Monitor, December 11, 2006

WASHINGTON

With President Bush turning a cold shoulder to key recommendations of the Iraq Study Group, one explanation is the wide gulf between the group's prescription for addressing the Middle East and the president's vision for the region.

The study group, co-chaired by former Secretary of State James Baker III and former Democratic congressman Lee Hamilton, places a high priority on restarting the Israeli-Palestinian peace process and reenergizing America's role in it. Mr. Bush, who has never viewed that conflict as ripe for the kind of intense US diplomacy Mr. Baker had dedicated to it, continues to see success in Iraq as the demonstration project for peace and reform in the region.

"Bush had this idea that Baghdad was going to radically alter the Middle East," says Henri Barkey, a former State Department specialist on Iraq now at Lehigh University in Bethlehem, Pa. "For him, the road to Jerusalem goes through Baghdad. Baker is saying you get to Baghdad through Jerusalem," he adds, "but it's hard to see Bush embracing that thinking now."

As Bush considers an array of alternatives and prepares for a speech that the White House says he hopes to give before Christmas laying out his plan for a new direction in Iraq, the broader question of how best to reform the Middle East will be a determining factor.

Last month in Riga, Latvia, Bush extolled the transformational power of a democratic Iraq. He has not given up on the idea of a functioning democracy as the answer to Iraq's ills - indeed, Weekly Standard editor William Kristol has taken to calling him "the last neocon." In stark contrast, the study group's report emphasizes stability as the most pressing need, passing over goals of regional freedom and democracy. Iran and Syria

One of the report's central proposals - seen by the panel as a necessity for progress in Iraq - is a broad and intense regional dialogue that includes both Iran and Syria. But the Bush approach, one fine-tuned and doggedly pursued by Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice, has been to isolate those two countries as troublemaking cats that must first change their spots before being welcomed to the negotiating table.

Bush remains at heart a believer in regime change in the case of regimes deemed to be supporters of international terrorism, some analysts say. And some White House officials say the president sees much about the Baker-Hamilton report as better-suited to the Middle East of the former secretary of State's heyday in the late 1980s and early '90s, while not so much a response to the post-9/11 world.

For Bush, talks with the United States should be dangled as a reward: for Iran once it gives up its nuclear ambitions, and for Syria as a prize for disengaging from Lebanon and relinquishing support for Hizbullah. "The truth of the matter is these countries have now got the choice to make," Bush said last week in comments on the study group's recommendations.

The study group recommends decoupling Iran's nuclear programs from the Iraq issue and leaving it to the United Nations Security Council.

For Baker, diplomacy is not about talking to your friends, but is really about dealing with your enemies. As Mr. Hamilton says, "How do you solve problems without talking to people?"

Baker acknowledges that Iran might not even want to join talks on Iraq. But he adds that finding that out would be useful: If Iran rejects an outstretched hand, he says, it would be a clear demonstration to the world of Tehran's intransigence and rejectionist approach.

Still, the study group placed such emphasis on regional diplomacy and in particular on Iran and Syria because it concluded the stakes in Iraq are such that no country wants deeper chaos. "We do not think it's in the Iranian interest for the American policy to fail completely and lead to chaos," Hamilton said last week.

That position is supported by experts and former diplomats who have worked with the Iranians in the past. "The Iranians may feel no compulsion to rush to Washington's assistance," notes James Dobbins, director of international security and defense at the RAND Corp. in Arlington, Va.

Mr. Dobbins, who was the Bush administration's envoy on formation of a post- Taliban government in Afghanistan, says the Iranians were instrumental in that process.

Calling it a "Washington myth" that the US formed an international coalition in late 2001 to defeat the Taliban, he says the US actually joined a preexisting coalition of countries - which included Iran.

"Iranian diplomats were being killed, and refugees were pouring into their country," says Dobbins, a former emissary for several administrations. "Our interests were coincidental." Iran's post-Taliban input

But the Iranians went beyond mere cooperation, says Dobbins. "It was the Iranians who suggested the word 'democracy' be inserted in the Bonn agreement" that set out the guideposts for the new regime in Afghanistan, he says. "It was also their suggestion that the Afghans cooperate with the international community on terrorism."

In addition, the Iranians were ready to work with an American-run program to build an Afghan national army - which could have begun to melt the two-decades-thick ice between Iran and the US, he says - before the US nixed the idea. (When the US suggested to an Iranian military official that cooperation might be difficult because army training procedures would be so different, the officer said that, in fact, the Iranian military was still using manuals the US left behind in 1979, Dobbins says.)

Still, working with Iran now would be harder, he acknowledges: The reform government that helped out on Afghanistan was replaced by the more radical regime of President Mahmoud Ahmadinejad, and trends in the region, including American difficulties in Iraq, have left the regime "feeling confident," he says.

But the "coincidental interests" are still there, Dobbins says. Like the US, the Iranians want a "democracy" in Iraq, if only because it puts the majority Shiite population in power.

Some experts say the emphasis that the study group report places on Iran and Syria exaggerates the influence they have in Iraq. But they say there is little doubt both could help make things better: Syria, for example, through a better control of its border.

One option that a Pentagon study for a redirection in Iraq is considering is a redeployment of US troops - from fighting in Iraq's increasingly sectarian strife to concentrating on Al Qaeda forces in Iraq. Control of the Syrian border is considered a key part of addressing the international terrorist presence among the Iraqi population.

But how far Bush will go in embracing the regional approach - and accepting avenues he has rejected in the past - probably won't be known until he gives his speech. "All administrations deny they are changing policy," Dobbins says, "up to the moment they change it."

Sunni And Shiite Insurgents Remain Mystery To U.S., Iraq Report Charges (NYT)

DOJ_NMG_0104151

By James Risen

The New York Times, December 11, 2006

WASHINGTON, Dec. 10 — Nearly four years after the invasion of Iraq, the United States still does not understand the enemy that American troops are fighting, according to last week's report by the Iraq Study Group.

The commission's final report harshly criticized United States intelligence officials for failing to answer basic questions about the nature of the Sunni insurgency or the increasingly powerful Shiite militias, both of which pose grave threats to American forces.

The intelligence community has had some success hunting Al Qaeda in Iraq, the report found, but that terrorist organization is small and is not the main enemy confronting American troops. The far bigger Sunni insurgency and Shiite militias are still largely mysteries to American intelligence, according to the report.

"While the United States has been able to acquire good and sometimes superb tactical intelligence on Al Qaeda in Iraq, our government still does not understand very well either the insurgency in Iraq or the role of the militias," the report said. It said that American intelligence agencies were "not doing enough to map the insurgency, dissect it, and understand it on a national and provincial level" and that intelligence analysts' "knowledge of the organization, leadership, financing, and operations of militias, as well as their relationship to government security forces, also falls far short of what policy makers need to know."

A spokesman for John D. Negroponte, the director of national intelligence and the Bush administration's top intelligence official, issued a written statement that said Mr. Negroponte planned to review the study group's findings. The statement did not seek to argue with the report's assertions. Carl Kropf, the spokesman, said the "Iraq Study Group offered some concise, but important, assessments of our intelligence analysis and collection activities on Iraq."

"We want to study those assessments and how they were reached carefully before offering any judgments about them," he added.

The study group's findings echo complaints quietly voiced in recent months by a number of current and former American officials, who have warned of the failure by American intelligence officers in Iraq to adequately penetrate the Sunni insurgency. These officials say the level of violence in Baghdad makes it extremely difficult for American intelligence officers to move around the country to gather information, and as a result they rely far too heavily on Iraqis who come to them in the Green Zone or to other major American bases, and on information from the intelligence service of the new Iraqi government.

That leaves the Central Intelligence Agency and American military intelligence vulnerable to manipulation by Iraqis who feed the Americans disinformation because they have an ax to grind or simply as a way to make money by selling information to the United States.

The report quoted an unidentified United States intelligence analyst who told the Iraq Study Group that "we rely too much on others to bring information to us" and "do not understand the context of what we are told."

Bureaucratic obstacles in the American government and a failure by the Bush administration to make the issue a top priority have left the United States with gaping holes in its understanding of the insurgency, the report found.

For example, the report found that the Defense Intelligence Agency rotates its analysts from one posting to another so frequently that few develop any real depth of understanding of the insurgency. "We were told that there are fewer than 10 analysts on the job at the Defense Intelligence Agency who have more than two years' experience in analyzing the insurgency," the report said. "Capable analysts are rotated to new assignments, and on-the-job training begins anew. Agencies must have a better personnel system to keep analytic expertise focused on the insurgency."

An agency spokesman disputed the numbers used by the report and said that the agency had "hundreds of analysts focused on the Iraq situation," adding that a "considerable number of experienced analysts are forward deployed and are directly working the counterterrorism-insurgency issues."

Meanwhile, the Bush administration has not sought to significantly improve on-the-ground intelligence about the enemy, the report said. "The Defense Department and the intelligence community have not invested sufficient people and resources to understand the political and military threat to American men and women in the armed forces," the report said. "Congress has appropriated almost $2 billion this year for countermeasures to protect our troops in Iraq against improvised explosive devices, but the administration has not put forward a request to invest comparable resources in trying to understand the people who fabricate, plant and explode those devices."

The study group recommended that the director of national intelligence and the defense secretary "devote significantly greater analytic resources to the task of understanding the threats and sources of violence in Iraq."

At the same time, the study group found that United States officials had underreported the level of violence in Iraq, providing misleading information to American leaders and the public about the scale of the problem facing American troops.

The study group determined that on one day in July, American officials in Iraq reported 93 attacks or significant acts of violence, but the study group's review found that 1,100 violent acts actually occurred that day. "The standard for recording attacks acts as a filter to keep events out of reports and databases," the report said.

For example, the report said that a killing of an Iraqi might not be counted by American officials as an attack, and that sectarian violence was not included in American databases if the source of the attack could not be determined. In addition, it said, "a roadside bomb or a rocket or mortar attack that doesn't hurt U.S. personnel doesn't count."

The group did not charge that the widespread underreporting of attacks was politically motivated. Still, it raised questions about whether the underreporting was intended to conform with Bush administration policies. "Good policy is difficult to make when information is systematically collected in a way that minimizes its discrepancy with policy goals," the report stated.

Baker-Hamilton's Fine Print: Stay In Iraq (LAT)

By Niall Ferguson

The Los Angeles Times, December 11, 2006

The Iraq Study Group didn't pin Iraq's hope on Iran and Syria, nor did it call for complete troop withdrawal.

'PERSUASION involves both incentives and penalties," Henry Kissinger once remarked. "So there is an element of implied coercion." Last week saw the publication of a masterpiece of persuasion. But whom will it persuade? And with what sticks and carrots?

Most commentators have interpreted the report of the Iraq Study Group as a well-crafted admission of defeat. Predictably, that was exactly how President Bush himself reacted to it. "I … believe we're going to succeed," he told reporters Thursday. "One way to assure failure is just to quit." Addressing one of the report's key recommendations, he bluntly declared that Iran and Syria "shouldn't bother to show up" for negotiations about Iraq if they don't understand their "responsibilities to not fund terrorists" and if the Iranians don't "verifiably suspend their [uranium] enrichment program."

Yet anyone who bothers to read the report carefully — as opposed to skimming the executive summary — can see that it neither proposes "quitting" Iraq nor pins serious hope on Iranian or Syrian assistance. Quite the reverse.

Persuasion in the realm of grand strategy is more a matter of rhetorical art than science. The first essential step is to identify your target audience. Most readers of the report assume that it is directed at Bush. That is wrong. Its principal target audience is Congress, and particularly the new Democratic majorities in both houses. And the aim is not to persuade a stubborn president to admit defeat. Rather, the report's aim is to convince legislators that withdrawal from Iraq — no matter how much their constituents may yearn for it — is not an option. The report's other intended readership is Arab governments throughout the Middle East. The message for them is the same: A U.S. exit from the region is what you most have to fear.

The second step in the process of persuasion is to conjure up a nightmare vision of the future if the action you envisage is not taken. The worst-case scenario proposed by the Iraq Study Group is the one about which I have been writing since February: "Sectarian warfare, growing violence or a slide toward chaos," leading to "the collapse of Iraq's government and a humanitarian catastrophe." Here are the report's most important lines: "Neighboring countries could intervene. Sunni-Shia clashes could spread … across the Islamic world. [There could be] Shia insurrections — perhaps fomented by Iran — in Sunni-ruled states. Such a broader sectarian conflict could open a Pandora's box of problems."

The consequences would be much more than a propaganda victory for Al Qaeda and a humiliation for the United States, which is what they worry about on Capitol Hill. In such a conflagration, no Mideast government — with the exception of the fundamentalist Shiite regime in Tehran — could feel secure. And that is precisely why Arab rulers should dread an American exit.

Step 3 in the art of persuasion is to propose remedies that sound attractive to your target audience. These the Iraq Study Group has certainly produced — in profusion. But you need to read the small print of all 79 recommendations. Consider the long-anticipated "diplomatic offensive to build an international consensus for stability in Iraq and the region," involving Iran, a reviled member of Bush's "axis of evil," as well as Syria, no friend of the U.S.

"A nation can and should engage its adversaries and enemies," declares the report (in a sentence that Co-Chairman James A. Baker III must surely have written) and should offer them "incentives as well as disincentives." Note that word "disincentives." Baker's idea here is not to go cap in hand to Damascus and Tehran. Rather, as he explained to the media last week, it is to "flip the Syrians" by appealing to Sunni solidarity, and to isolate the Iranian regime by exposing its "rejectionist attitude." In other words: Get the leaders of all Iraq's neighbors into the same room and play "spot the Shiites."

Now let's read the small print on troop withdrawals. "By the first quarter of 2008," the report says, "all combat brigades not necessary for force protection could be out of Iraq." This has been widely interpreted as the first step toward the exit. It says "out of Iraq," right?

Wrong. Look more closely at some of the report's other recommendations:

• The number of U.S. military personnel "embedded" in Iraqi army battalions and brigades should be increased from 3,000 or 4,000 to between 10,000 to 20,000.

• The number of U.S. police trainers should be expanded.

• The U.S. Department of Justice should lead the work of organizational transformation in the Interior Ministry.

• A senior advisor for economic reconstruction in Iraq is required.

• The U.S. State Department should train personnel to carry out civilian tasks associated with a complex stability operation; it should establish a Foreign Service Reserve Corps.

Does that sound like "out of Iraq" to you? I'd say it sounds more like "stay in Iraq" — only this time, let's not screw it up.

The media have fixated on the possibility of a quantitative reduction in U.S. troops — which is in any case conditional on there being no "unexpected developments in the security situation on the ground" — while missing the underlying argument for qualitative improvement.

Hats off, then, to Baker and his team. This turns out to be a classic work of persuasion. Its target audiences have been well chosen. Its worst-case scenario is plausible. And its recommendations are so carefully phrased that they sound like disengagement while actually signifying better engagement.

It is certainly not the exit strategy Americans want. But it might just help avoid a Middle Eastern Armageddon.

The Time Is Now (NYT)

By Bob Herbert

The New York Times, December 11, 2006

On Wednesday, as if the release of the Iraq Study Group report needed some form of dramatic punctuation, 11 more American G.I.'s were killed in this misbegotten war that just about everyone, except perhaps the president, now sees as a complete and utter debacle.

Senator Gordon Smith, a Republican from Oregon who supported the war, delivered an emotional speech on the Senate floor Thursday evening in which he said:

"I, for one, am at the end of my rope when it comes to supporting a policy that has our soldiers patrolling the same streets in the same way, being blown up by the same bombs day after day. That is absurd. It may even be criminal. I cannot support that anymore."

If the U.S. is ultimately going to retreat in Iraq, he said, "I would rather do it sooner than later. I am looking for answers, but the current course is unacceptable to this senator."

The primary value of the Baker-Hamilton report is that it embodies, in clear and explicit language, the consensus that has emerged in the U.S. about the current state of the war. It's not so much a blueprint for action as a recognition of reality.

DOJ_NMG_0104154

"The level of violence is high and growing," the report says. "There is great suffering, and the daily lives of many Iraqis show little or no improvement. Pessimism is pervasive."

With the situation in Iraq deteriorating, and support for the war in the U.S. having all but collapsed, the only real question on the table is how long the U.S. is going to drag out its inevitable pullout of combat forces. And the inevitable moral question that is inextricably linked to that slowly evolving set of circumstances is how to justify the lives that will be lost between now and the final day of our departure.

There is something agonizingly tragic about soldiers dying in a war that has already been lost.

The scale of the debacle is breathtaking. According to the study group: "In some parts of Iraq — notably in Baghdad — sectarian cleansing is taking place. The United Nations estimates that 1.6 million are displaced within Iraq, and up to 1.8 million Iraqis have fled the country."

Americans, including the members of the study group, continue to insist that the key to an American withdrawal over the next couple of years is the improvement of Iraqi security forces to the point where they can successfully step into the breach. That is a complete fantasy, as a reading of the study group's own assessment of the Iraqi forces will attest.

The study group found that, among other things, the Iraqi Army units "lack leadership ... lack equipment ... lack personnel ... [and] lack logistics and support."

"Soldiers are given leave liberally and face no penalties for absence without leave," the report said. "Unit readiness rates are low, often at 50 percent or less."

The report went on: "They lack the ability to sustain their operations, the capability to transport supplies and troops, and the capacity to provide their own indirect fire support, close-air support, technical intelligence and medical evacuation."

Other than that, they're fine.

So what's next? The Bush administration has lost all of its credibility on the war. What is needed now are leaders with the courage to insist, perhaps at the risk of their reputations and careers, that it is wrong to continue sending fresh bodies after those already lost, to continue asking young, healthy American troops to head into the combat zone, perhaps for their third or fourth tour, to fight in a war the public no longer supports.

In a foreword to "The Best and the Brightest," David Halberstam's chronicle of the Vietnam fiasco, Senator John McCain wrote:

"It was a shameful thing to ask men to suffer and die, to persevere through god-awful afflictions and heartache, to endure the dehumanizing experiences that are unavoidable in combat, for a cause that the country wouldn't support over time and that our leaders so wrongly believed could be achieved at a smaller cost than our enemy was prepared to make us pay.

"No other national endeavor requires as much unshakable resolve as war. If the nation and the government lack that resolve, it is criminal to expect men in the field to carry it alone."

The United States lacks that resolve when it comes to Iraq. It is time to pull the troops out of harm's way.

How Quickly Bush Forgot (WP)

By Jackson Diehl

Washington Post, December 11, 2006

Some people suppose that President Bush's freedom agenda was buried last Wednesday by the report of the Iraq Study Group. In fact, history will show that the administration largely smothered its own baby, even before Iraq's descent into civil war propelled the resurrection of James Baker and other "realist" friends of Middle Eastern dictators.

Evidence of that conclusion could be found in Washington on the same day Baker delivered his report, as administration officials, members of Congress and business executives gathered for a glittering dinner in honor of Mehriban Aliyeva, the visiting first lady of Azerbaijan.

Aliyeva's husband, Ilham, rules a Muslim country wedged between Russia and Iran that is on the cusp of becoming a major exporter of oil and gas, with strategic pipelines that offer Europe an alternative to Russian suppliers. It also is at a tipping point politically. Aliyev, who inherited power from his father -- a satrap of the Soviet Union -- has teetered between installing his own dictatorship and promising to liberalize the political system along Western lines.

For a year after Bush's soaring second inaugural speech, in which he pledged "to seek and support the growth of democratic movements and institutions in every nation," the president seemed to be trying to act on his words in Azerbaijan. Through a letter and State Department envoys, he urged Aliyev to hold free and fair parliamentary elections and promised in return to "elevate our countries' relations to a new strategic level." Unfortunately, Aliyev called Bush's bluff. He staged a vote in October 2005 that even the sympathetic State Department said was marked by "major irregularities and fraud." Days before the election he arrested hundreds of political opponents or would-be rivals, including one of his most pro-Western ministers, Farhad Aliyev.

Last April Bush received President Aliyev at the White House anyway, praising his cooperation with Western energy interests but saying nothing, at least in public, about the rigged elections or political prisoners. U.S. officials argued at the time that it was necessary to ease American pressure on Aliyev because of the risk that he would be driven into the arms of Russian President Vladimir Putin. Putin has been aggressively courting the autocrats of Central Asia while trying to build a de facto Russian monopoly of the region's energy resources.

Aliyev drew a predictable conclusion: that he could be both a dictator and an American ally as long as he delivered energy and security cooperation. So Azerbaijan is pumping oil to Europe, and has promised gas this winter to pro-Western Georgia. It is allowing the U.S. military to use its airspace, and it reportedly hosts CIA monitoring operations of Iran. Meanwhile, Aliyev's government is systematically attacking the country's pro-democracy forces, while favoring Russia's Azerbaijani allies. The losers are the very "democratic reformers" to whom Bush said: "When you stand for your liberty we will stand with you."

Farhad Aliyev (no relation to the president) is one of them. In visits to Washington as minister for economic development, he was outspoken about the need for Azerbaijan to embrace Western democracy and ally itself with the United States. At home, he had famously declared that "Russia is Azerbaijan's past, the West is its future."

He's now been in prison for nearly 14 months, denied visits from his family or even from doctors seeking to treat his known health problems. Variously accused of coup plotting, corruption and the murder of an opposition journalist -- in each case without evidence -- he has never been tried or even formally charged. Inquiries on his behalf by the State Department (which recognized his "commitment to reform") and several members of Congress were ignored or spurned by the government. Meanwhile, his energy-related business interests and those of his brother Rafiq, who was also imprisoned, have been confiscated and sold to "pro-Russian business enterprises favored by the Azerbaijan authorities," according to a study of the case by Washington lawyer Charles R. Both.

On Nov. 24 Aliyev's administration closed down the country's only independent radio and television station, ANS. The network was charged with "unauthorized broadcasts of several foreign radio programs" -- i.e., the Voice of America, Radio Liberty, and the BBC. Two Russian television networks controlled by Putin's government continue their broadcasts into the country unhindered. U.S. officials who protested the shutdown were told, improbably, that it was the result of excessive zeal by licensing authorities.

Despite this provocation, the Bush administration offered its full cooperation for the visit of Aliyev's wife, a member of parliament who is building her own political career. The trip has received saturation coverage by Azerbaijan's remaining, state-controlled media, which portray it as proof of the close ties between Aliyev and Bush. And no wonder: The day after that gala dinner, Mehriban Aliyeva was received at the White House by First Lady Laura Bush. Did the subject of political prisoners such as Farhad Aliyev come up? Sadly, less than two years after the freedom agenda was born, the very idea of such principled pressure from the Bush White House has become ludicrous.

The Point Of No Return (NSWK)

By Weston Kosova

Newsweek, December 11, 2006

Dec. 18, 2006 issue - Gary Ackerman is the last man you'd expect George W. Bush to turn to for advice. Just elected to his 13th term in the House, the New York Democrat thinks the president's handling of the Iraq war has been "totally inept." So Ackerman was a bit surprised when Bush invited him and other members of Congress to the White House last Wednesday morning, just hours after the long-awaited Baker-Hamilton report was released. The president told them he wanted to hear their thoughts and concerns about the war. Ackerman was skeptical. "In my experience, you usually went in, and Bush would do most of the talking," Ackerman says. Instead, the president made a few brief remarks and then went around the table letting people speak their minds.

For more than an hour the lawmakers, Democrat and Republican, "ripped into" the administration's Iraq policy, Ackerman recalls. "It was like a group intervention. It was ... certainly the most pointed discussion I've ever had with any president." When they were finished, Bush thanked them for coming. "I take your comments very seriously," he said. Ackerman was puzzled, but impressed. "He really seemed to be listening," he says.

That was precisely the reaction Bush and his aides wanted. For months, the White House had been girding for the release of the Iraq Study Group report. They knew from press leaks that it would be critical in tone and that the president wouldn't like some of its ideas—especially a suggested pullback of U.S. troops and a proposal to reach out to Syria and Iran for help in quelling violence in the country.

The challenge for Bush's team was to make the president appear as though he were taking the release of the report seriously, without necessarily embracing its conclusions. In the days following the report's release, Bush the Decider transformed himself into Bush the Listener. Usually prickly with war critics—on the rare occasions he spoke to them at all—the president now invited them in from the cold and kept quiet.

The Baker-Hamilton report may not change Bush's military or diplomatic strategy in Iraq. But the report has had one noticeable effect: it marks a point of no return in the way Bush talks about the war and deals with his critics. He may not always be as accommodating as he seemed to be last week. But from here on in, the president can no longer plausibly dismiss Democrats as wanting to "cut and run" or blame the media for overplaying the violence and ignoring the "good news" from Baghdad. The change in Bush's approach had its beginnings well before the Baker group put pen to paper. It came about in part because of a slow, careful effort by Bush's closest aides—under the direction of chief of staff Josh Bolten—to convince the president that he had to listen to different voices on Iraq, and ultimately change direction. The results of that effort will be unveiled next week, when Bush is expected to announce what he calls "The New Way Forward," his latest plan to salvage the mission in Iraq.

When Bolten took charge of the West Wing last April, he was one of the few people in the White House who were willing to admit that Iraq was broken and that the president was stuck. He worried that Bush had been hearing the same bad advice from the same people for nearly three years. Over the summer, Bolten began the first of his efforts to puncture Bush's bubble by having the president sit down with some of the harshest critics of the war—conservatives who had turned against the effort. At one session last summer at Camp David, Bolten sat Bush, Vice President Cheney and Donald Rumsfeld across from a group of academics. "They were folks who had actually been to the region and spent the time talking to noncommissioned officers and generals," Bolten says. The academics were told not to hold back. A couple of weeks later, Bolten staged another session with Iraq experts, who met with the president at the Pentagon. Among them: Vali Nasr, an authority on the rise of the Shia. Bolten, who is known to obsess over the smallest details, makes careful seating charts for Oval Office briefings to put certain advisers directly in Bush's line of sight so the president will be more likely to listen carefully to their opinions.

That was just the start. In the weeks before the Republicans lost Congress, while Karl Rove was predicting victory, Bolten tasked a small group of trusted aides to plan for electoral defeat and its aftermath. The first step was to fire the abrasive, out-of-touch Rumsfeld and replace him with straight-talking Robert Gates. The second was to ready a respectful response to the pending Baker-Hamilton report but to downplay its importance by stressing it is just one of several government reports on the war effort that Bush is reviewing. The final phase was to move past the elder statesmen by introducing Bush's own strategy.

The White House won't say exactly what the president will propose in his New Way Forward plan, but aides say Bush still believes in standing behind the government of Prime Minister Nuri al-Maliki. He has yet to make critical decisions about repositioning U.S. forces inside Iraq and especially about embedding more American trainers within Iraqi units.

The Baker commission discovered just how hard it is to come up with new ideas on Iraq. The group was lauded for its bipartisan spirit. But the desire for agreement may have resulted in a report that is stronger on rhetoric than recommendations. For example, it calls for troop withdrawals but suggests no firm deadlines. One member, former Clinton Defense secretary William Perry, wanted to set dates. Baker was concerned, however, that Bush would write off the report as unrealistic.

Lawrence Eagleburger, George H.W. Bush's last secretary of State, also opposed a timetable; he said if the report set down specific withdrawal dates, it would be "an invitation to the Iranians to march right in after we go." At that point, Perry drafted a proposal for gradual withdrawal with the goal of getting combat brigades out of Iraq by early 2008. At least one Democratic member, Chuck Robb, argued for a short-term increase in troops. But even Republicans were reluctant to go along. The report's final language said only that the United States "could" support a short-term redeployment.

The White House has signaled that there is no way to "win" the war in the next year or two. The American people seem to agree. According to the new NEWSWEEK Poll, 68 percent now say the United States is losing ground in Iraq. And last week Bush suffered a surprise defection from within GOP ranks, when Oregon Sen. Gordon Smith called for a quick withdrawal of American troops. Bush's forthcoming plan will extend well beyond his time in office. Bolten told NEWSWEEK he can imagine his last day in the Bush White House. West Wing staffers will be cleaning out their desks on Jan. 20, 2009, when the cable news networks cut into their Inauguration coverage for a breaking story: a car bomb has gone off in Baghdad. Bolten knows he can't do much to stop that from happening. What he can do is try to limit the number of political explosions between now and then.

Advice And Grudging Consent (TIME)

By Michael Duffy, Mike Allen

Time, December 11, 2006

The motorcade flew down Pennsylvania Avenue just after 8 a.m. last Tuesday, sirens screaming and lights flashing--two white police cruisers, five black town cars and a gray staff van. Was it the President? Or the Vice President? Nah--it was just the Iraq Study Group, Washington's new shadow government, on another emergency run, this time from the White House, where its members told George W. Bush how to get out of Iraq, up to Capitol Hill, where they preached bipartisanship and renewed diplomacy--as well as the promise of withdrawal from Iraq by 2008. It's not often that 10 unelected people, all in their 60s and 70s, can supersede the elected government of the U.S., but last week the panel, led by ex--Secretary of State James Baker and former Congressman Lee Hamilton, pulled it off for a couple of days.

Most blue-ribbon studies start gathering dust the minute they are printed. This one, with 79 recommendations in just 99 pages, was unveiled on network TV and in the first few days shot up to No. 3 on the Amazon best-seller list. The panel members worked overtime on the launch, doing carefully choreographed rounds of interviews with reporters and anchors before Baker and Hamilton motored back to the Hill to start selling their plan to Congress. The core message: the Bush Administration has to work and think a lot harder to achieve even modest goals in Iraq--and should start by accepting the report in its entirety. "I hope," said Baker, "we don't treat this like a fruit salad and say, 'I like this, but I don't like that.'"

The big rollout was designed to exert maximum pressure on the White House because, despite all the fanfare, the report was aimed at an audience of one--Bush. For most of the week, he looked none too pleased about the round-the-clock talking-to he was getting. As he received the report, he told cameras it was "interesting." Later he said it has "some very good ideas." But within a day, he was putting some distance between himself and the best seller: "I don't think Jim Baker and Lee Hamilton expect us to accept every recommendation."

That comment reflected the West Wing's exceeding bitterness about the report. Some of the pushback was substantive. The suggestions on how to engage directly with Iran and Syria--the parts resisted most unambiguously by the President--were surprisingly specific and prescriptive, not the platitudes the Administration had expected. Bush aides chafed at the patronizing directive "The President and the leadership of his national-security team should remain in close and frequent contact with the Iraqi leadership." Even some Democrats thought that Bush might have a point. "If you want to help the President," said Paul Goldman, a Democratic strategist, "you give the President a chance to lead. You don't set it up to look like he got forced into doing something."

But some White House reaction was plain personal. This is the second time in six years that Bush has had to turn to Baker to save his skin (the first was Tallahassee in 2000). All the stories about the father's vaunted foreign-policy team riding in to save the son had become "an irritant," admitted a senior Administration official. A former Bush adviser who worked closely with the President speculated that Bush and Karl Rove "don't want Baker to get instant gratification" and won't make concessions at the outset. But that will change. "After the short-term ego fit, he will eventually come around. He is a political realist," said the former adviser.

So, apparently, is Senator Gordon Smith, a Republican from Oregon who voted for the war. He went to the Senate floor last week to say the Iraq adventure was "absurd ... it may even be criminal." A few more speeches like that by Republicans, and the debate about a course correction will be over.

Already, Bush and his aides have promised changes. He said he would give a pre- Christmas speech that would chart what he last week alternately called "a new course" and "a new way forward." A presidential adviser said the address would include "a new policy direction but no apology." A senior Administration official said some aides hope for a note of contrition ("Things haven't turned out the way I intended") similar to Ronald Reagan's 1987 mea culpa after the Tower Commission concluded that his inattention had contributed to the Iran-contra arms scandal.

"They know this is the time," the official said, of Bush's inner circle. "We're not going to have many of them left. This is the moment. We have to take these recommendations and show that we're listening. They know that."

A Grim Verdict, Some Tough Calls To Make (USNEWS)

By Kevin Whitelaw

U.S. News and World Report, December 11, 2006

The violence has been mounting at an alarming rate for months, but it was only last week that the debate over Iraq in Washington truly shifted. First, there was incoming Secretary of Defense Robert Gates, whose forthright admission that America is not "winning" in Iraq contrasted sharply with the dismissive doublespeak of Donald Rumsfeld. Then came the verdict of the bipartisan Iraq Study Group: "Current U.S. policy is not working."

While its specific recommendations might have been anticlimactic, the Iraq Study Group, led by former Secretary of State James Baker and former Congressman Lee Hamilton, has already succeeded in one of its main objectives-changing the tenor of the debate in Washington. As recently as early November, President Bush was still telling cheering crowds, "We got a strategy for victory that will work." Last week, following the panel's report, a more chastened Bush struck a different chord. "It's bad in Iraq," he said, standing next to his close ally, British Prime Minister Tony Blair. "I believe we need a new approach." (Not everything changed, however: The front page of the New York Post derided the Iraq Study Group as "Surrender Monkeys.")

"Not enough time." It is unclear how many of the group's 79 recommendations President Bush will embrace-or even whether any changes in U.S. policy can have much effect on the ground in Iraq. Broadly, the Iraq Study Group calls for U.S. troops to transition to support roles and for combat units to be withdrawn by the first quarter of 2008. This would be accompanied by ambitious milestones for the Iraqi government and a broad new U.S. diplomatic offensive that would include reaching out to Iran and Syria. Bush's initial reaction to the specific proposals was chilly, but panel members are pressing him to use the report as an opportunity to change course. "He doesn't want to have these last two years be the failure of some stubborn president who didn't listen-some cowboy president," panel member and former Republican Sen. Alan Simpson tells U.S. News.

The shortcomings of the U.S. effort in Iraq-which costs American taxpayers $2 billion a week-are clear enough in the report. For example, only 33 of the 1,000 staffers in the U.S. Embassy in Baghdad speak Arabic (and only six of them are fluent). The group also says that U.S. intelligence is lacking, adding that fewer than 10 of the analysts "on the job" at the Defense Intelligence Agency have been tracking the insurgency for more than two years (a point DIA disputes). And the option of sending more U.S. troops to quell the violence cannot even be considered because "we do not have the troops or equipment to make a substantial, sustained increase," the report says.

Perhaps most damning, the Iraq Study Group blasts the Bush administration for routinely undercounting the violence by, for instance, excluding sectarian attacks when the perpetrator cannot be determined. So while 93 attacks or violent incidents were recorded on one day last July, an Iraq Study Group review turned up 1,100 violent incidents that day. "Good policy is difficult to make when information is systematically collected in a way that minimizes its discrepancy with policy goals," the report concludes.

A Gift For The President (USNEWS)

By Gloria Borger

DOJ_NMG_0104159

U.S. News and World Report, December 11, 2006

The panel was about as blue-ribbon as a commission can get--with membership including a former Supreme Court justice, two former Republican secretaries of state, an ex-Democratic defense secretary and White House chief of staff, and assorted onetime members of Congress. Bipartisan. Old Washington hands. Steeped in the ways of government-- and compromise. One of its leaders, Jim Baker, had come as the emissary of the unhappy Bush 41 crowd--eager to help guide the son out of the Iraq mess. Even so, he wouldn't take on the job until he received the president's blessing, after sending a direct message: You may not end up liking what we have to tell you. Now that seems like an understatement given the report's grim assessment that the situation in Iraq is "grave and deteriorating."

It was a group journey that surprised even the members themselves. Bipartisan panels often come up with mush; this was a report girded in steel. It was the result, members say, of some eye-opening moments--including an interview with the president and his national security team. At one point, Vernon Jordan, a skilled Washington insider, put it pretty bluntly to the president, according to a panel member's paraphrase:

Jordan: What do you mean by victory? When my mama told me to clean the garage, I cleaned the garage because I knew what she meant. But I don't understand what you mean.

Bush: You have to speak to the American people with a simple message here. They understand what victory is, and if you come off of it, they'll think you're giving up.

Some members say they were stunned by the response. And when they left, they were puzzled by one more thing: During their entire session, Vice President Dick Cheney--a key architect of the war in Iraq--never said a word. Not one.

Tense days. The group had come a long way, conducting more than 170 interviews (during which ex-Justice Sandra Day O'Connor was the "most penetrating questioner," according to one panel member), traveling to Iraq, debating constantly. It was, one group member told me, "a civil process with serious people." But easy? "No," he says. "There was plenty of tension. Iraq breeds tension."

Baker--considered the "big picture diplomat"--focused largely on his plan to engage in talks with Syria and Iran. Baker apparently believed this proposal would "turn out to be the biggest and most controversial news" in their final product. As it turned out, he was wrong.

The hardest part to deliver--and probably for the president to swallow--was taking combat troops out of Iraq by early 2008. Baker was initially opposed to any target date. But a turning point came for many members during a trip last summer to Iraq, where they had to enter the Green Zone in Black Hawk helicopters. They spent four days there, and Leon Panetta, President Clinton's former chief of staff, tells me he came away believing "we were walking into the middle of chaos and observing a completely dysfunctional government." He brought his colleagues together and said, "I think we really have to worry this government is not going to get its act together." Indeed, he said, "we have to have a strategy that says this is what we will do--no matter what you [the Iraqis] do." He was convinced that some timetable--or benchmarks-- had to be a part of any plan.

How To Avoid Iraq Syndrome (TIME)

By Richard N. Haass

Time, December 11, 2006

Not much about Iraq can be predicted with confidence, but this much can: for the foreseeable future, it will be a messy country with a weak central government, a divided society and regular violence. At worst, as the Iraq Study Group report warns, Iraq will become a failed state racked by civil war that could spill over and engulf several of its neighbors.

Either way, the human, economic, political and military costs of the Iraq war will mount. Scenes of chaos and human misery in Iraq would fuel bitterness against the U.S., first for having initiated the war, then for leaving Iraqis to their terrible fate. The domestic American reaction would be one of relief at being out of a terrible situation, but anger at having been involved in the first place and having invested so much, only to have so little to show for it.

Almost as important as what actually happens in Iraq is how it is understood. One possibility is that people around the region and the world would come to judge Iraq's failure as largely the result of American policy, the product of an ill-advised war inadequately followed up. If this is the case, Iraq would cast a cloud over the U.S. reputation for competence and reliability, and it would last for years. This scenario would create doubts in the minds of America's friends--and, correspondingly, increase the assertiveness of its foes.

An alternative view is that the lion's share of responsibility for what has taken place in Iraq over the past few years belongs to the Iraqis themselves. Under this narrative, the U.S. would be seen as having failed there less for any lack of effort or resolve than for the absence of an effective national partner. This narrative is more likely to take hold if the U.S. publicly sets clear benchmarks for what Iraqis must accomplish regarding political reform and security performance and what they should expect if they come up short.

Whichever story line prevails, the intensity of today's anti-Americanism would fade as Iraq recedes from center stage. The domestic American reaction may persist somewhat longer, however. There is the possibility of an Iraq syndrome, akin to the reaction that followed the U.S. involvement in Vietnam a generation ago. That defeat led Americans and their representatives to be wary of new overseas undertakings.

But it is important not to exaggerate the likely consequences of Iraq's endgame for the U.S. America will remain the world's most powerful country regardless of how Iraq turns out and how much U.S. foreign policy is blamed for it. The U.S. will continue to enjoy a benign international context in which it faces no great power rival, as it did throughout the cold war and as great powers have traditionally done throughout history. And ironically, the winding down of the U.S. involvement in Iraq will have a salutary effect--namely, it will slow the draw on American economic, diplomatic and military resources, all of which are in dire need of replenishment.

In fact, U.S. diplomacy will in some ways be liberated as American involvement in Iraq recedes. The U.S. could, if it so chose, be an effective proponent for Arab-Israeli peace. If the U.S. and Iran prove able to cooperate over Iraq, they might manage broader talks on other issues that divide them, including Iran's nuclear program. Outside the region, more must be done to lessen the odds that Afghanistan will go the way of Iraq. The Bush Administration could table a comprehensive package of requirements and assurances regarding North Korea and directly negotiate them with its leaders. New ideas could also be put forward about how best to resurrect international-trade talks, tackle global climate change, stop genocide in Darfur and reduce American dependence on imported oil.

Here again, the Vietnam parallel may be relevant. Defeat in Vietnam did not prevent the U.S. from maintaining close cooperative relationships with other regional countries, including Japan, South Korea and the Philippines. Nor did it stop the U.S. from forging sometimes productive ties with Vietnam's backers (including China and what was then the Soviet Union) or, with the passage of time, with Vietnam itself. Today Asia is the most dynamic part of the world, and the U.S. is a central participant in that dynamism.

Even more than Vietnam 30 years ago, Iraq constitutes a major strategic setback. There is no getting around this. But Iraq is just that--a setback. What is essential is that the U.S. cut its losses there, contain the consequences and look for new opportunities to advance its interests around the world. The sooner the post-Iraq era of U.S. foreign policy dawns, the better.

Trouble From The Top Down (NSWK)

By Jonathan Alter

Newsweek, December 11, 2006

Dec. 18, 2006 issue - In government, the tone set at the top can be as powerful as the mightiest army. It reverberates through everything. The history of the American presidency is the story of the character and temperament of the man in the Oval Office coursing through thousands of smaller decisions, often thousands of miles away. If the president is supple and open-minded, those decisions made many layers below him are more likely to be agile and empirical. If he's stubborn and too sure that he has all the answers, the modeling of his behavior is likely to result in decisions you would ground your teenager for.

This process is uncanny and usually unconscious, the product less of explicit orders or egregious boot-licking than of bureaucratic osmosis. The temperament of the chief leaches into the performance of functionaries he has never met.

Fortuitously, presidential personality traits have often led to major accomplishment. FDR was a great believer in experimentation, so the legions below him launched hundreds of experimental programs to fight the Depression. Ike was a champion of logistics during World War II, so it figured that the Interstate Highway System got built on his watch. LBJ was a master legislator, so it was no coincidence that his presidency featured scads of legislation. (His insecurities, in turn, contributed to the Vietnam debacle.) In recent years, George H.W. Bush's habit of writing endless thank-you notes bore indirect fruit in the gracious and face-saving way he managed the demise of the Soviet Union. Bill Clinton's messy but thorough policy analysis led to dozens of small, well-built initiatives that worked with surprising consistency.

The United States in the Second Bush Era has not been as fortunate. Beyond the headlines and major policy recommendations, the Iraq Study Group's mercifully readable report shows how President Bush's personal shortcomings manifest themselves in appalling miscues on the ground.

Consider this largely overlooked portion of the report: "Our embassy of 1,000 has 33 Arabic speakers, just six of whom are at the level of fluency. In a conflict that demands effective and efficient communications with Iraqis, we are often at a disadvantage."

Disadvantage? Nah. Who could imagine that having only .6 percent of our personnel who speak the native language might cause us some problems over there? If the damn Iraqis would just learn English we wouldn't be in this mess! Bush did not set out to miss the mark, of course, but his inattention to the execution of his grand ideas has had fatal consequences. At $8 billion per month in Iraq, you would think we'd have a few more people there who could find their way to the bathroom.

After 9/11, the absence of Arabic speakers was a big story. Analysts all agreed that we could not stop terrorism without addressing the problem. A different kind of president would have ordered a Manhattan Project-style crash program to teach the difficult-to-learn language in schools. Such a "National Security Language Initiative" was finally launched—with little notice, money or presidential attention—this year, five years late.

In the meantime, several reports highlighting the shortage have "gathered dust," the president's words for what usually happens to Washington studies. They show that as of 2006 only 33 FBI agents—1 percent—have even limited proficiency in Arabic. (The bureau claims its outside contractors can do the job.) One of the tiny handful who is actually fluent, Special Agent Bassem Youssef, is currently engaged in a lawsuit over his rough treatment inside the FBI. (The fact that he is of Arab descent apparently made him suspicious.) Among other terrifying revelations, the suit has shown in eye popping videotaped depositions that the men who run FBI counterterrorism efforts don't know the difference between Sunnis and Shiites.

This is what happens when you have a president who is incurious and impatient with inconvenient facts he doesn't "need to know": hundreds of thousands of dead Iraqis, nearly 3,000 dead Americans and what the Baker-Hamilton Commission estimates as a $2 trillion tab for our children.

Another part of their report touches on an even darker example of presidential tone-setting. In identifying a "significant underreporting of the violence in Iraq," the commission explains how the administration cooks the books on Iraqi casualties: "If we [the U.S. government] cannot determine the source of a sectarian attack, the assault does not make it into the data base. A roadside bomb or a rocket or a mortar attack that doesn't hurt U.S. personnel doesn't count."

Ponder that. For more than three years, those whining, negative journalists who reported "too much bad news" out of Iraq were actually soft-pedaling the problem, thanks to the bogus statistics on which they still depend. A war that was launched by twisting intelligence is being lost while twisting body counts. Shakespeare's "tangled web" of deceit was woven at the top, but its threads extend everywhere.

Looking The Other Way (TIME)

By Mark Kukis

Time, December 11, 2006

Captain Adam Grim readies his men for a nighttime raid in Mekanik, a gritty neighborhood in southern Baghdad. The target: a suspected militia safe house. Grim's platoon won't be leading the raid, however. Instead, the Americans will be supporting Iraqi forces led by a wiry police commander named Colonel Salih Hashim. Hashim knows the neighborhood well and chose the target himself. Together the two men discuss the plan one last time. Hashim and his men will storm the house while Grim's platoon secures the street outside and provides cover.

DOJ_NMG_0104162

The raid should be a model of U.S.-Iraqi cooperation, capturing bad guys while building the confidence and skills of the Iraqi police. But there's a problem. Grim has reason to believe that in the daily struggle between U.S. forces and the armed Shi'ite groups suspected of carrying out most of the executions in the area, Hashim "plays both sides." Grim certainly doesn't trust Hashim and suspects him, at the very least, of giving ammunition to Shi'ite gunmen and sometimes even letting them sleep in the same Iraqi police compound where U.S. troops meet with Hashim during the day.

There are now more than 4,000 U.S. soldiers serving as advisers to Iraqi security forces. If the recommendations made by the Iraq Study Group are put into practice, that number will grow substantially. The Baker commission's report calls for the number of U.S. troops embedded with Iraqi units to increase to as many as 20,000 over the next year. The report argues that boosting the number of advisers will lead to improvements in the quality of Iraqi forces and pave the way for a pullback of all U.S. troops from the front lines by 2008.

But based on where Iraq's forces stand today, such a timetable is wildly optimistic. Iraq's 300,000-strong security forces--in particular the national police, which is overseen by the Interior Ministry--have been so thoroughly infiltrated by militias that some U.S. trainers will have to bring in new recruits and retrain much of the current batch before they can turn combat responsibilities over to the Iraqis. There are already concerns that by rushing to strengthen the Iraqis, U.S. forces may be ignoring abuses committed by the very people they're training. "I am greatly concerned that U.S. aid--including weapons--has gone to Iraqi security forces who have violated human rights," says Senator Patrick Leahy, a senior Democrat from Vermont who sits on the Senate Appropriations Committee. "We want to build up the Iraqi forces, but that does not mean we should support people who commit atrocities."

The experience of the troops assigned to Mekanik, a mixed neighborhood that is home to both the powerful Shi'ite Mahdi Army and a Sunni militant group called the Omar Brigade, illustrates the U.S.'s dilemmas. The neighborhood had suffered months of killing between Sunnis and Shi'ites before U.S. forces found a solution: to make the murders stop, keep the cops, who were overwhelmingly Shi'ite, out. Lieut. Colonel Jeffrey Peterson, the U.S. troop commander for Mekanik, says, "Whenever we would talk to locals about [the violence], they always implicated the national police as starting it. I could never prove it. But the bottom line was--whether it was true or false--the people did not trust the national police." In early October the Americans created what they called an isolation zone, ordering all police out of Mekanik. Before the U.S. cordon went into effect, there had been up to eight murders a day in the district of 50,000 inhabitants, and Sunni mosques were frequently attacked by Shi'ite gunmen. The Army says that as soon as the police left, Mekanik's murder rate dropped about 60%, and the mosque attacks stopped altogether.

The question now is whether the U.S. can rebuild a force that is trusted enough to take back responsibility for the neighborhood. U.S. troops who work with Iraqi security forces sometimes investigate and even arrest Iraqi police. The Pentagon points out that Iraq's Interior Ministry has fired or suspended roughly 3,000 officers for offenses ranging from corruption to "breaking the law." But a senior official at the ministry who spoke to TIME on the condition of anonymity says the dismissals were little more than a charade. Police officers who quit for their own reasons accounted for about 500 of the supposed dismissals, he says. Most of the others the ministry let go were employees with medical problems or nearing retirement. Virtually nothing had been done to remove ministry officials implicated in abuses ranging from mistreatment of detainees to working with death squads.

That leaves the job of cajoling good behavior from Iraqi police largely in the hands of junior officers like Grim, 28. The square-jawed West Point grad from Orange Park, Fla., is on his second tour in Iraq. He says his job is something equivalent to "armed social work." He feels responsible not just for making arrests and advising Iraqi soldiers but also for protecting the civilians of Mekanik. So while he says he trusts most of the officers, it's clear that he lives uneasily with the possibility that at least some of the Iraqis may be accomplices to murder when he's not around.

The raid with Hashim--the first such joint operation since Iraqi police were allowed back into the district--was typically disquieting. The house, it turns out, was empty. Grim and the other U.S. soldiers walked away uncertain about what had happened. It could have been an honest mistake, but the Americans couldn't help wondering whether Hashim was really looking for "terrorists," as he claimed. Maybe he was looking for a Sunni family to rough up, Grim says. Or perhaps the raid was just a diversion to keep U.S. troops busy while crimes were committed elsewhere in the neighborhood.

DOJ_NMG_0104163

Still, the level of mistrust between U.S. and Iraqi forces runs so high that some U.S. soldiers speak openly about the possibility that they could be led into an ambush or attacked directly by the same police officers they have armed and trained. Grim says he doesn't share that concern because Hashim and his men know that Grim's platoon is ready for any situation. "It goes back to trusting your fellow American soldier to watch your back and keep you out of trouble," says Grim. "If the police did turn on us during a patrol, it would be the last thing they ever had the misfortune of doing." In today's Iraq, that may be as close as U.S. and Iraqi troops come to a mutual understanding.

The Perils Of Partnership (NSWK)

By Michael Hirsh, Kevin Peraino And Sarah Childress

Newsweek, December 11, 2006

Dec. 18, 2006 issue - You don't usually see sergeants chewing out captains in the U.S. Army. But the unusual happens every day at Fort Riley, Kans. Out here at its training center on the prairie, not far from the Oz Museum (as in "Wizard of"), the Army has created a small, simulated Iraq intended to make soldiers think they're not in Kansas anymore.

Modular trailers have been set up to look like a FOB, or forward operating base, in Iraq. Four "urban clusters"—fake villages with names like Al Amir and Al Hawaej—have been erected. And since July, 11-man squads of U.S. advisers have been going through a crash 60-day training program that is the core of America's effort to draw down its presence in Iraq. The idea: replace the 140,000-strong U.S. combat force there now with smaller, far less visible advisory teams. Embedding as many as 20,000 of these U.S. advisers with Iraqi Army and national police—a fourfold increase over current plans—is the key military recommendation of the Iraq Study Group report just released to thunderous attention. But the U.S. Army doesn't need any prodding. "I'm not waiting with bated breath on the Baker report. We have a feeling for what has worked and what hasn't," says Brig. Gen. Dana Pittard, commander of the Iraq Assistance Group, which operates the base north of Baghdad where the Fort Riley trainees go for one week of "finishing school" before joining their units.

As the Army ramps up the program, however, its many perils are becoming clearer. Most of the trainees are career U.S. military officers, many of them thirty- to forty something desk jockeys who are logistical wizards, intelligence specialists and administrators. They have all the expertise the Iraqi Army needs and more, but many have barely used their weapons since basic. That's why Sgt. 1st Class Curtis Fuller, an Iraq combat vet with a face that looks hewed out of granite, treats his superior officers almost like raw recruits. "All right, let's talk about what didn't go right," Fuller barks to a group of sheepish-looking captains who have just returned from a disastrous training run. The team's three-Humvee convoy—the basic unit of travel they'll use in Iraq—was torn apart by fake IED blasts and sniper ambushes. One rattled captain couldn't get his .50-caliber machine gun to work and kept aiming it at the Humvee to his rear. "They're learning," says Fuller's commander, Lt. Col. John Nagl, forcing a smile. "Fuller won't let them leave until they do."

Then there are the risks involved in leaving small groups of U.S. advisers in the hands of under equipped Iraqi Army units of dubious skill and loyalty. Over in Iraq, Lt. Col. Rodrick Arrington, an adviser attached to the First Marine Expeditionary Force in Ramadi, notes that the Iraqi troops he works with answer their cell phones while on patrol. Because of absenteeism and lack of pay, the Iraqi units are usually about 50 percent under strength, and Iraqi officers often prove unwilling to conduct risky raids. Some units are infiltrated by militias or insurgents, though not to the degree the Iraqi police are. "We're setting ourselves up for a potential national disaster in which some Iraqi divisions could flip and take 5,000 Americans hostage, or multiple advisory teams go missing in action," says retired Gen. Barry McCaffrey.

Pittard says no U.S. advisers have been killed by their Iraqi counterparts thus far, although there have been some "incidents." Even so, to a degree little understood by the U.S. public, the "transition team" program could put the elite of the Army's professional corps in harm's way for years. And that's even if most combat forces are pulled out in early 2008, as recommended by the Baker-Hamilton panel. Currently, the 11-man teams are assigned to Iraqi battalions of some 500 men made up of four companies. Most U.S. commanders say that, to be truly effective, each Iraqi company needs its own U.S. team. And there is increasing support inside the Army for fleshing out the advisory teams to about 30 U.S. soldiers each to improve security. In all, that could require as many as 20,000 to 30,000 new advisers, up from the 5,000 now budgeted.

This in turn means that a large U.S. supporting force must remain in Iraq. ISG member Leon Panetta told NEWSWEEK that the group agreed, in a private discussion not included in its report, that about 60,000 to 70,000 U.S. troops would have to stay on after 2008. That includes advisers and the quick-reaction forces needed to protect them, as well as logistical support and Special Operations troops. "So if a team finds themselves at risk," says Maj. Gen. Carter Ham, the commander at Fort Riley, "they can pick up a radio and the cavalry can come to the rescue."

Another question is whether the Fort Riley program is too little, too late. Until six months ago, the training of the Iraqi Army was still fairly slapdash, with U.S. brigade commanders offering up their least-valued soldiers to be detached as advisers. "Some would send us guys they could afford [to lose]," Pittard says. Now the training program has top priority, with a standardized curriculum at Riley, including Arabic-language training—the Army calls it "tactical Iraqi"—and lessons in cultural awareness. "Army resource command is saying, 'OK, who are the best people across the Army to do this?'" says Ham. But he and other top commanders acknowledge that the U.S. Army is so institutionally biased toward fighting its own battles—the "kill-capture mission," as Ham says—that it resisted training advisers for far too long. "Should we have started this sooner? I think all of us would say that," Ham says.

The program could easily go for 10 years before the Iraqi Army is considered competent. "Historically, defeating insurgencies has taken about a decade on average," says Nagl. "And key to that has been training host-nation forces." Some U.S. trainers suggest the Iraqi Army may never be able to operate completely on its own. There are no plans to give the Iraqi Army the kind of superior firepower—helicopters, planes and artillery—that U.S. advisers can call upon. "Our teams will be like reinforcing steel rods in concrete," says Nagl.

On the ground, says Pittard, the basic security strategy is to have what he calls "a FOB within a FOB"—a secure forward operating base for the American advisers within an Iraqi FOB. In practice, this generally means some kind of sealed-off living area. At Combat Outpost Falcon in Ramadi, U.S. and Iraqi units live in sandbagged forts a few paces from one another. All transition-team members are also issued a "personal locator beacon" to stick in the cargo pocket of their pants; this lets their commanders keep track of them in the field. Even so, "if they're not out on the streets with the Iraqi units, it's really hard to advise them," says Lt. Col. Kevin West, a training officer. "You've got to make yourself a little vulnerable to make things work." Pittard says he has no illusions. "I've told our guys: 'Don't be fooled'," he says. "The fact is, we invaded this nation. Under the surface, you're not loved." It remains to be seen whether President Bush will expand the teams as quickly as the ISG wants. The reason? It requires rotating out U.S. combat brigades in Iraq so their officer corps can be trained as advisers. And military trainers say nothing will work without more money for reconstruction, which the administration has slashed. But with many of the other ISG recommendations likely to be discarded—like a new Mideast diplomatic offensive—Fort Riley may well be the last, best hope for America to extricate itself from a quagmire.

Men In Black (USNEWS)

By Anna Mulrine

U.S. News and World Report, December 11, 2006

BAGHDAD-When U.S. Army Maj. Mark Brady drives through a once well-heeled section of western Baghdad, he is often greeted by flocks of doves, released in advance of his patrol's arrival. Symbols of peace and welcome? Not here, not now. What they are is a warning signal by militia lookouts that U.S. and Iraqi government forces are in the area.

The doves are the least of Brady's worries. As an adviser to the 5th Brigade of the 6th Iraqi Army Division, he is most concerned about the brigade's own soldiers, who use their cellphones to tip off allies in the militia. It's information that's particularly helpful to members of the Mahdi Army, followers of radical Shiite cleric Moqtada al-Sadr, who have set up checkpoints and lately stepped up attacks on Sunni enclaves, reprisals for the recent bombings that killed more than 200 in the the capital's Sadr City neighborhood. So now, for operational security, brigade commanders collect soldiers' cellphones before presenting the day's plans. "The cellphones," Brady says, "were killing us."

Tit for tat. As the violence in Baghdad grows worse, the militias are gaining strength, in part by promising safety and services for Iraqis in desperate need of both-and by delivering retribution in the tit-for-tat cycle of sectarian attacks by Sunni insurgents and Shiite militias. In its report last week, the bipartisan Iraq Study Group stressed the corrosive effect of Shiite militia activities that "undermine the authority of the Iraqi government and security forces, as well as the ability of Sunnis to join a peaceful political process." Reining in the militias is just one of the hurdles to implementing the panel's prescriptions for national reconciliation (Page 38). The committee's report raises doubts about the willingness and ability of Prime Minister Nouri al-Maliki even to confront the militia problem: "He owes his office in large part to Sadr and has shown little willingness to take on him or his Mahdi Army."

Taking on the militias will be no easy task, as they are now woven into the fabric of so many communities. "Militias exist when, in the eyes of the people, the standing government isn't providing something-and in this case that something would be security," Lt. Gen. Martin Dempsey, the senior American commander in Iraq responsible for training and equipping Iraqi security forces, tells U.S. News. "It seems to me that the issue we're all concerned about is the degree of militia influence on serving members of the Army and police."

To complicate matters, the greatest fear among some U.S. military officials here is that some of the militia directives may be coming from within Iraqi government ministries. Col. Steven Duke, a brigade military transition teams commander and adviser to the 6th Iraqi Army Division in Baghdad, cites a raid last month in which company commanders captured two members of the Mahdi Army. Upon hearing of the Mahdi Army connection, Iraqi Army officials turned their new prisoners over to U.S. forces. "They thought they would get pressured by the MOD [Ministry of Defense] to let these guys go," says Duke.

Shaping Up The Iraqi Forces (USNEWS)

By Anna Mulrine

U.S. News and World Report, December 11, 2006

U.S. News Pentagon Correspondent Anna Mulrine recently spoke with Lt. Gen. Martin Dempsey, the senior American commander in Iraq responsible for training and equipping Iraqi security forces. Excerpts from their discussion:

On dealing with militia infiltration in the Ministry of Interior:

Obedience is extraordinarily important in their value system, far more important than [in] ours. So we've got to get at the leaders. Secondly, militias exist when in the eyes of the people the standing government isn't providing something-and in this case that something would be security. So we've got to continue to demonstrate to the people by accelerated transition to legitimate Iraqi security force control-because the more the Iraqi government can be seen as being in charge, the more the people will gain confidence in them, and the better off we'll be in terms of dealing with the militias.

On more U.S. forces for Baghdad:

It seems to me that we have to watch the balance point there. If we get too many in here and we're perceived as completely owning the problem, then it will retard the development of the legitimate security forces, No. 1. And No. 2, what Iraqi security forces are probably most in need of in their developmental evolution is logistics capability. And to the extent that we bring more U.S. forces in here that draw on our logistics expertise to help ourselves, the less that logistics expertise can be used to help the Iraqi security forces. So I tend to be of the school that what we really need is more Iraqi forces and an increasing capability on their part.

On the precariousness of Prime Minister Nouri al-Maliki:

The contacts I've had with the prime minister indicate that he's very much in control of his government. But let me sharpen my language a bit there. There's no question in the way this government was formed-where cabinet ministries were negotiated as part of the outcome of the popular vote-that Prime Minister Maliki has had some challenges pulling together a government that could follow a single agenda. And I think those problems persist, but I think he's prevailing, and I think we owe him our support.

On whether Iraq is in a civil war:

As long as the legit security forces remain intact and act in a coherent, responsible way for the betterment of all Iraqis, then I'm not prepared to declare that we've got a civil war on our hands. If the legitimate security forces fragment, polarize, and take sides, then I think we have a problem.

On a phased withdrawal:

DOJ_NMG_0104166

They're not going to handle their external security for some time. But we should not abandon them until they're ready to handle their internal security. And then if you want to call that a conditions-based withdrawal, phased, find your own adjectives-but it should be when we've done what we've promised them we're going to do.

Retaking Ramadi: All The Sheik's Men (NSWK)

By Sarah Childress

Newsweek, December 11, 2006

Dec. 18, 2006 issue - Ramadi's chief of police gazed at his latest graduating class of officers. Three months ago they had been recruited for the force by the leaders of their desert tribes—and now, the chief declared, the newly minted cops were no longer tribal members: they were his men. The cadets nodded solemnly. Their sheiks, watching from the audience, were outraged. Maybe they had finally agreed to lend some of their gunmen to the provincial government, but they never intended to give up actual power. The U.S. forces' liaison, Lt. Col. Jim Lechner, had to spend the next two hours calming them down. "I used a metaphor," he says. "I told them, 'You can't tear the house down and build a new one. But you can help fix this one'."

No part of Iraq needs fixing more desperately than insurgency-ravaged Anbar province and its capital, Ramadi. And U.S. forces are increasingly sure it can't be fixed without the help of tribes who have always been more loyal to their sheiks than to the government. Before the 2003 invasion, Saddam Hussein had to buy the sheiks' support with wealth and special privileges, and Anbar's tribes fought fiercely long after he was gone. Then Al Qaeda muscled in, claiming the Sunni-dominated region and killing sheiks who dared to challenge the jihadists' aims. After one well-known tribal leader was assassinated this summer, a group of 15 Ramadi sheiks banded together for survival's sake. They called themselves Sawa—Arabic for "the awakening"—and cut a deal with the Americans: in exchange for protection against Al Qaeda, they would bring local police ranks up to strength.

They've lived up to that end of the bargain at least. Monthly police enlistments in Ramadi have soared from the low double digits before the deal to the full Coalition quota of 400 a month. Recruits keep pouring in: the Americans had to set up a special 3,000-member Emergency Response Unit to accommodate the flood of volunteers. Elders of the Abu Soda tribe recently helped U.S. forces find IEDs that had been planted by their own tribesmen, and they have identified kidnappers and other local bad guys for the Americans to arrest. Their effectiveness against Al Qaeda is another question: while the Americans say attacks by local resistance fighters in Anbar have dropped by 40 percent, U.S. deaths there have continued at a rate of more than two dozen a month.

Still, Sawa's membership has risen to some 60 tribal leaders. Its founder, Sheik Abdel Sittar, does TV spots to encourage more police recruits. "All the honest people follow me," he says. "The good people. Even some tribes that were with the insurgency follow us." The sheik, who wears alligator shoes beneath his traditional robes, is building a marble-lined council meeting hall (funded by Sawa) inside his compound.

Some lawmakers in Baghdad fear that Sawa could become one more sectarian militia, but Lechner scoffs at such worries. "We would turn that off in a heartbeat," he says. All it would take is a threat to withdraw police protection from the offending sheik's neighborhood. Can Sawa restore law and order in Anbar? The Americans can only hope so. No one seems to have a better plan.

Iraqi President Calls U.S. Report Dangerous And 'An Insult To The People Of Iraq' (USAT/AP)

USA Today/AP, December 11, 2006

BAGHDAD (AP) — The Iraqi president on Sunday sharply criticized the bipartisan U.S. report calling for a new approach to the war, saying it contained dangerous recommendations that would undermine his country's sovereignty and were "an insult to the people of Iraq."

President Jalal Talabani, a Kurd and one of the staunchest U.S. supporters within the Iraqi leadership, also said U.S. training of Iraq's army and police had gone "from failure to failure."

He criticized the recommendation by the Iraq Study Group calling for increasing the number of U.S. troops embedded with Iraqi units to train Iraq's forces from 3,000 to 4,000 currently to 10,000 to 20,000.

"It is not respecting the desire of the Iraqi people to control its army and to be able to rearm and train Iraqi forces under the leadership of the Iraqi government," he said during an interview with several reporters in his office in Baghdad.

DOJ_NMG_0104167

Talabani was the most senior government official to take a stand against the report, which has also come under sharp criticism from American conservatives who claim it amounts to a veiled surrender in the war against terror.

Outgoing Secretary of Defense Donald Rumsfeld, in a surprise farewell visit to U.S. troops in Iraq this weekend, said the consequences of the war's failure would be "unacceptable."

"We feel great urgency to protect the American people from another 9/11 or a 9/11 times two or three. At the same time, we need to have the patience to see this task through to success. The consequences of failure are unacceptable," Rumsfeld said at Asad air base in western Iraq. "The enemy must be defeated."

Talabani said the Iraqi government planned to send a letter to President Bush "expressing our views about the main issues" in the report. He would not elaborate.

"I believe that President George Bush is a brave and committed man and he is adamant to support the Iraqi government until they've reached success," Talabani said. He said setting conditions was "an insult to the people of Iraq."

Talabani's criticism of U.S. training was directed at a key part of the study group's recommendation, which called for accelerated training of Iraqi forces and the withdrawal of most U.S. combat troops by the first quarter of 2008.

Some U.S. military experts have expressed concern that Iraqi forces will not be ready to assume full responsibility for the fighting by then. However, opposition to the war is rising within the United States, increasing pressure on Bush to shift strategy.

A roadside bomb killed one U.S. soldier and wounded another Sunday west of Baghdad, the military said. The death raised to 43 the number of troops who have died this month and pushed the total U.S. military death toll to 2,931 since the war started nearly four years ago.

Talabani said the 2008 date was realistic if the Iraqi government is given more responsibility for security.

"If we can agree with the U.S. government to give us the right of organizing, training, arming our armed forces, it will be possible in 2008 (for U.S.-led forces) to start to leave Iraq and to go back home," he said.

"If you read this report, one would think that it is written for a young, small colony that they are imposing these conditions on," Talabani said. "We are a sovereign country."

He also pointed to the report's call for the approval of a law that would allow thousands of officials from Saddam Hussein's ousted Baath party to return to their jobs.

Meanwhile, sectarian violence raged on the streets of Baghdad on Sunday, with a fresh outburst of retaliatory attacks and clashes between Shiites and Sunnis. At least 83 people were killed or found dead throughout the country, including 59 bullet-riddled bodies that turned up in Baghdad.

Late Saturday, gunmen attacked two Shiite homes in western Baghdad, killing nine men and seriously wounding another, police said. Nobody claimed responsibility for the attack, which police said occurred in the mostly Sunni Arab al-Jihad neighborhood, but it apparently was in retaliation for a bold assault earlier in the day against Sunnis.

Witnesses said Shiite militiamen entered a Sunni enclave in Hurriyah — a predominantly Shiite neighborhood — after Sunnis warned the few Shiites living there to leave or be killed. Heavy machine gun fire was heard on Saturday and three columns of black smoke rose into the sky, the witnesses said on condition of anonymity, also out of concern for their own safety.

Baghdad has been suffering from a series of attacks aimed at driving Sunnis or Shiites out of neighborhoods of the capital where they form a minority. Omar Abdul-Sattar, a member of the Sunni Arab Iraqi Islamic Party, said Sunday that an organized effort was underway in Hurriyah to force Sunnis out, and he accused Iraq's Shiite-led government of doing little to stop the violence.

Abdul-Sattar claimed that during the past five months, more than 300 Sunni families have been displaced from Hurriyah, more than 100 Sunnis killed and 200 wounded, and at least five Sunni mosques burned, along with houses and shops.

Clashes also erupted between Sunni and Shiite militants in Baghdad's mixed western Amil district, a policeman said. One Shiite militiaman was killed and six people — five Sunnis and one Shiite — were wounded, the officer said on condition of anonymity because he is not authorized to talk to the media.

The fighting ended with U.S. and Iraqi forces rushing to the area to contain it, he said.

Rumsfeld, casually dressed in a gray jacket and an open-collar shirt, traveled to several different U.S. bases in the country on Sunday, shaking hands and joking with troops.

DOJ_NMG_0104168

"For the past six years, I have had the opportunity and, I would say, the privilege, to serve with the greatest military on the face of the Earth," Rumsfeld said to more than 1,200 soldiers and Marines at al-Asad, a sprawling air base in western Anbar province, an insurgent stronghold.

Rumsfeld did not meet with Iraqi Prime Minister Nouri al-Maliki during his visit. He kept the trip low-profile, with his office declining to discuss his itinerary or schedule in detail for security reasons.

U.S. Report Rejected By Iraqi President (WP)

By Nancy Trejos

The Washington Post, December 11, 2006

BAGHDAD, Dec. 10 -- Iraqi President Jalal Talabani on Sunday strongly rejected a bipartisan U.S. panel's report on U.S. war strategy in Iraq, calling some of its recommendations "dangerous" and a threat to his country's sovereignty.

"The report does not respect the will of the Iraqis in dealing with their problems," he said in a statement released by his office.

The report by the Iraq Study Group, which was released Wednesday, has drawn criticism from several Iraqi political leaders across sectarian lines. Talabani, a Kurd, is the highest-ranking political leader to oppose the study.

Talabani was particularly critical of recommendations to embed thousands of U.S. troops with Iraqi security forces to train and advise them, to centralize control of the country's oil revenue and to allow former loyalists of deposed president Saddam Hussein back into their old government jobs.

"I think that the report is unjust and unfair and contains some dangerous articles which reduce the sovereignty of Iraq and its constitution," he said, according to a Washington Post translation of his comments.

The Iraq Study Group said most U.S. troops should be withdrawn by early 2008. Talabani demanded that Prime Minister Nouri al-Maliki be given full control over Iraqi security forces before then.

"The report does not respect the will of the Iraqi people in controlling its army and its capability to arm and train the army," he said.

Maliki's political adviser said Sunday that the prime minister had not yet formed an opinion on Talabani's statements. "It's too early to speak for the prime minister to say he's concerned about this point or that point," said Sadiq al-Rikabi, the adviser.

Talabani criticized the report's recommendation that the government reconcile with former enemies, including members of Hussein's Baath Party.

When asked about Talabani's comments on NBC's "Meet the Press" on Sunday, former secretary of state James A. Baker III, who co-chaired the study group, said the war would be won politically, not militarily. "And a part of that is national reconciliation, and amnesty is a big part of national reconciliation," he said.

Talabani embraced the group's recommendation that the United States and Iraq engage in talks with Iraq's neighbors, especially Iran and Syria. The Bush administration has been reluctant to do so.

Iraq has already opened the lines of communication with both countries. Last month, Talabani met with Iranian President Mahmoud Ahmadinejad in Tehran. On Sunday, he said he planned to make an official visit to Syria but did not specify when.

As Talabani criticized the report, Saudi Arabia's foreign minister, Prince Saud al-Faisal, praised it for emphasizing the need to focus more attention on the Israeli-Palestinian conflict and reexamine the Iraqi constitution, which he said has divided the sects vying for power, according to wire reports of comments he made in Riyadh.

Over the weekend, outgoing Defense Secretary Donald H. Rumsfeld visited American troops in Iraq to thank them for their service.

Speaking to about 1,200 soldiers and Marines at an air base in the volatile western province of Anbar on Saturday, Rumsfeld acknowledged that the United States had become polarized over the war but said the country must finish its work.

"These public debates may be heated or even nasty. But that's not new . . . I can say that it has always been so, and particularly so during wartime," he said, according to the Department of Defense's Web site. "But we ought not confuse the political debate that takes place at home with a wavering of support or appreciation for your service or your achievements."

On Sunday, a soldier was killed and another wounded when a roadside bomb detonated near their patrol as it was finishing an early-morning security mission west of Baghdad, the U.S. military said.

Iraqi President Denounces U.S. Strategy On Security (NYT)

By Kirk Semple

The New York Times, December 11, 2006

BAGHDAD, Dec. 10 — President Jalal Talabani said Sunday that the American program to train Iraq's security forces had been a repeated failure and he denounced a plan to increase the number of American advisers working with the Iraqi Army, saying it would subvert the country's sovereignty.

Mr. Talabani's remarks, in an interview with Western news service reporters that was summarized and distributed by his office, amounted to an extraordinarily harsh denunciation of a central American strategy in Iraq and challenged a major recommendation by the Iraq Study Group in Washington. He is the highest-ranking Iraqi official to criticize the report, adding to anger among Iraqi leaders who have disagreed with some of its recommendations.

American commanders have poured more than $12 billion into training and equipping Iraq's security forces and have tied a withdrawal of American troops to success in these efforts. But Mr. Talabani ridiculed them. "What have they done so far in training the army and the police?" he said. "What they have done is move from failure to failure."

Mr. Talabani, who is Kurdish, said the Iraq Study Group report offered some "very dangerous" recommendations that undermined the country's ability to control its own army and police force and threatened Iraq's sovereignty.

He did not offer specific criticisms of the American training program, except to say that the Americans had inadequately screened recruits to the Shiite-dominated police force to ensure their loyalties to the state rather than to a sect.

American and some Iraqi officials say some Iraqi police and army units are more beholden to Shiite militias than to the government and have helped to drive the cycles of retributive violence by attacking Sunni Arabs. Some Iraqi officials have also said that Sunni Arab officers have abetted the Sunni-led insurgency.

The Americans, Mr. Talabani said, "gathered them from the street regardless of their loyalty to the new Iraq, their capacity, their ability. These mistakes would be repeated if the Iraqi Army would be under the control of foreign officers, and we would never accept it."

His remarks were likely to dismay the American leadership, which has regarded him as one of its more reliable and like-minded partners here.

The Iraq Study Group called for increasing the number of American trainers to as many as 20,000 from the current level of more than 4,000, in the hope that it would help Iraqi units move more quickly to assume full control of the nation's security.

Gen. John P. Abizaid, the top American commander in the Middle East, told Congress last month that he envisioned doubling the number of American trainers, but senior military officers now say they are planning to at least triple the number.

The shift has been endorsed in general terms by President Bush, and in recent weeks, commanders in Iraq have started moving hundreds of combat troops to training teams.

American commanders have argued that expanding the training teams would allow trainers to work more closely with Iraqi soldiers and police officers. In addition, trainers would be able to watch more closely for sectarian biases and abuses.

But Mr. Talabani said the proliferation of American advisers threatened Iraq's control of the security forces and violated its sovereignty.

"What would it mean for Iraqi sovereignty if the army became a tool in the hands of officers coming from outside the country?" he said. "We want our hands to be free, not paralyzed, in fighting terror."

Mr. Talabani's attack on the Iraq Study Group report was wide-ranging and vociferous.

He criticized a recommendation for a law that would allow some former members of the outlawed Baath Party to return to government. The measure would reverse a "de-Baathification" process that has marginalized thousands of Sunni Arabs who worked in the Baathist government of Saddam Hussein.

DOJ_NMG_0104170

He also said he supported a statement issued Thursday by Massoud Barzani, the president of the Kurdistan region, who objected to elements of the report that could weaken Kurdish autonomy by delaying an opportunity for the Kurds to govern the contested oil city of Kirkuk, and by giving the central government control over all oil revenue.

Mr. Talabani bristled at the report's recommendation that a continuation of American military and financial assistance to Iraq be contingent on Iraqi performance. Setting conditions, he said, "was an insult to the people of Iraq."

The leaders of the Iraq Study Group, James A. Baker III and Lee H. Hamilton, defended their report on Sunday against Mr. Talabani's attack. "Up until this point, we've given a blank check to the Iraqis," Mr. Hamilton said on CNN. "And I'm not surprised that the president would like that sort of a deal. But we believe that the American people want our aid to be conditional. We want that aid to be given only if there is a response from the Iraqi government that shows performance."

Mr. Baker called Mr. Talabani's comments "disappointing" but said that unless Iraq's leaders could unite under a national reconciliation plan, the world could expect "not just a broad-based civil war but a wider regional war."

Sectarian violence continued on Sunday. Gun battles broke out between Sunni and Shiite militias in a predominantly Shiite enclave of Al Amil, a neighborhood in southwestern Baghdad. The police said at least five people were killed. Gunmen stormed a home in Jihad, a mostly Sunni Arab neighborhood in southwestern Baghdad, killing nine people, an Interior Ministry official said.

The attacks came a day after gangs of armed Shiite militiamen rampaged through Hurriya, a mixed neighborhood in north-central Baghdad, driving scores of Sunni Arabs from their homes in what a Sunni colonel in the Iraqi Army described as one of the most flagrant episodes of sectarian warfare in the capital.

The police reported Sunday that they had found five bodies near a mosque in the neighborhood, all presumably victims of the Shiite attack on Saturday. At least 46 other corpses were found by the authorities elsewhere in the capital.

Agence France-Presse reported that Iraqi authorities had detained the chief of the prison in Badush, near Mosul, in connection with the escape of Ayman Sabawi, Mr. Hussein's nephew, on Saturday.

The American military command said Sunday that an American soldier was killed and another wounded when a bomb exploded next to their patrol west of the capital.

The departing defense secretary, Donald H. Rumsfeld, said during a two-day visit to Iraq that American troops should remain there until "the enemy" was defeated.

"We feel great urgency to protect the American people from another 9/11 or a 9/11 times two or three," Mr. Rumsfeld said Saturday, in remarks that were posted Sunday on the Defense Department's Web site.

Iraqi Leader Denounces Report (LAT)

By Solomon Moore

The Los Angeles Times, December 11, 2006

BAGHDAD — Iraq's president lashed out at the Iraq Study Group report Sunday, saying it undermines his nation's sovereignty and constitution and "works against Iraq's long struggle against dictatorship."

President Jalal Talabani, head of state for two consecutive Iraqi governments and a longtime U.S. ally, accused the bipartisan U.S. commission of condescension and ignorance.

"They are dealing with us as if we are an emerging colony, doing whatever they like," Talabani said.

The report, on ways to end the war, is "not fair, not just," he said. "I think it contains some very dangerous articles."

The president balked at such key proposals as the commission's suggestion that Iraq further strengthen and centralize government authority in Baghdad and that it strip provincial governments of authority over Iraqi security forces.

He also criticized recommendations to postpone a Kurdish bid for control over the northern oil hub of Kirkuk, to double or triple the number of U.S. trainers traveling with Iraqi army and police units, and to weaken a law that bans members of Iraq's former Baath Party from holding government jobs.

"No for the return of Saddam's Baath Party," Talabani said. "This is against the constitution, and those who are negotiating to bring them back are violating the constitution."

Talabani's criticisms could lend support to Bush administration critics of the commission findings and to some conservatives who have called the study a plan for capitulation.

Talabani also took a swipe at former Secretary of State James A. Baker III, a Republican who, along with former Rep. Lee H. Hamilton (D-Ind.), led the commission.

Under President George H.W. Bush, Baker argued against toppling Saddam Hussein during the 1991 Persian Gulf War, and against supporting uprisings in the Kurdish north and the Shiite south, which Hussein then crushed.

"We detect from this report the same stance Baker took before the war when they decided to liberate Kuwait and left Saddam in Baghdad," said Talabani, whose Kurdish militia fought against Hussein's rule for decades. "Generally, I reject this report."

Some of the Iraqi president's complaints echoed those of Massoud Barzani, the president of the semiautonomous Kurdistan region in northern Iraq, who last week rejected the report's proposal to centralize oil revenue. Oil-rich Kurdistan is in the process of negotiating several deals with international petroleum exploration firms.

Talabani plays a unique role in Iraqi politics, bridging the divide between the Kurdish regional government and the national government.

The president also has a long relationship with the United States that began during his days as a member of the peshmerga, a Kurdish paramilitary force that opposed Hussein's government and received protection from the no-fly zone established by U.S. forces after the Gulf War.

But Iraqi politicians say Talabani's anger over the Iraq Study Group report represented something larger than a factional point of view.

Talabani's disagreements with the commission findings are partly shared by Iraqi Shiite leaders such as Prime Minister Nouri Maliki and Abdelaziz Hakim, who leads the powerful Shiite political party the Supreme Council for Islamic Revolution in Iraq.

During a Sunday interview on CNN's "Late Edition With Wolf Blitzer," Hakim voiced opposition to the commission's recommendation to avoid regionalizing governmental control and instead to centralize authority in Baghdad.

Hakim has advocated voting on whether to create a Shiite regional authority in oil-rich southern Iraq, a move Sunni Arabs oppose.

Hakim and other Shiite leaders, including Maliki, have argued against the report's contention that Iraq should allow more Baathists to rejoin the government.

Talabani and Maliki are also wary of increasing the number of U.S. military trainers and assigning them to Iraqi units as a way to root out death squads and corruption and to accelerate the development of Iraqi troops.

"These so-called trainers with various Iraqi army units would undermine the sovereignty of the Iraqi state," said Hiwa Osman, Talabani's spokesman. "If every small unit has an Iraqi commander and an American 'trainer,' who do you think will be in charge?"

Mahmoud Othman, an Iraqi legislator and a Kurdish ally of Talabani, said that the Iraq Study Group findings could derail painstaking efforts to find consensus among Iraq's fractious ethnic and sectarian groups.

Othman said he feared that the report would endanger talks between Kurds and central government officials over oil profit-sharing, and cease-fire talks between Iraq's government and Sunni Arab insurgents.

"The top leaders inside and outside of the government have become less flexible because of this report," he said. "The Sunni Arabs think that they are supported by this report, and this will make it harder to reach consensus. They have not attended reconciliation meetings since this report came out."

Othman also objected to the report's recommendation to negotiate with Muqtada Sadr, leader of the Al Mahdi militia.

"Sadr is leading a militia that is the most dangerous group on the street," he said. "They didn't try to be practical."

Talabani vowed to send the White House a letter formally expressing his reservations about the panel's findings.

Meanwhile, Iraqi police in Baghdad reported the discovery of 60 bodies. Three of the victims had been beheaded, and their bodies were found in the Hurriya neighborhood, where Shiite militiamen and Sunni Arab gunmen had clashed Saturday.

A bomb blast killed a U.S. soldier and wounded another soldier in west Baghdad.

DOJ_NMG_0104172

In Saqlawiya, west of Baghdad, U.S. Marines killed three suspected insurgents attempting to plant a bomb beneath a tractor-trailer.

And in eastern Diyala province, north of Baghdad, gunmen opened fire on a wedding party, killing a man and his 3-year-old grandson.

On Saturday night, U.S. forces in Ramadi staged an airstrike on two suspected insurgents who were detonating a bomb.

Talks Under Way To Replace Iraq PM (AP)

By Hamza Hendawi And Qassim Abdul-zahra

AP, December 11, 2006

Major partners in Iraq's governing coalition are in behind-the-scenes talks to oust Prime Minister Nouri al-Maliki amid discontent over his failure to quell raging violence, according to lawmakers involved.

The talks are aimed at forming a new parliamentary bloc that would seek to replace the current government and that would likely exclude supporters of the radical Shiite cleric Muqtada al-Sadr, who is a vehement opponent of the U.S. military presence.

The new alliance would be led by senior Shiite politician Abdul-Aziz al-Hakim, who met with President Bush last week. Al-Hakim, however, was not expected to be the next prime minister because he prefers the role of powerbroker, staying above the grinding day-to-day running of the country.

A key figure in the proposed alliance, Vice President Tariq al-Hashemi, a Sunni Arab, left for Washington on Sunday for a meeting with Bush at least three weeks ahead of schedule.

"The failure of the government has forced us into this in the hope that it can provide a solution," said Omar Abdul-Sattar, a lawmaker from al-Hashemi's Iraqi Islamic Party. "The new alliance will form the new government."

The groups engaged in talks have yet to agree on a leader, said lawmaker Hameed Maalah, a senior official of al-Hakim's Supreme Council for the Islamic Revolution in Iraq, or SCIRI.

One likely candidate for prime minister, however, was said to be Iraq's other vice president, Adil Abdul-Mahdi, a Shiite who was al-Hakim's choice for the prime minister's job before al-Maliki emerged as a compromise candidate and won.

News of the bid to oust al-Maliki, in office since May, came amid growing dissent over his government's performance among his Sunni and Shiite partners and the damaging fallout from a leaked White House memo questioning the prime minister's abilities.

Washington also has been unhappy with al-Maliki's reluctance to comply with its repeated demands to disband Shiite militias blamed for much of Iraq's sectarian bloodletting.

Bush publicly expressed his confidence in al-Maliki after talks in Jordan on Nov. 30. But the president told White House reporters four days later that he was not satisfied with the pace of efforts to stop Iraq's violence.

It was not immediately clear how much progress had been made in the effort to cobble together a new parliamentary alliance. But lawmakers loyal to al-Sadr who support al-Maliki were almost certainly not going to be a part of it. They had no word on al-Maliki's Dawa party.

They said al-Maliki was livid at the attempt to unseat him.

"We know what's going on and we will sabotage it," said a close al-Maliki aide who spoke on condition of anonymity because of the sensitivities involved. He did not elaborate.

A senior aide to al-Sadr, who insisted on anonymity for the same reason, said the proposed alliance was primarily designed to exclude the cleric's backers and they would resist.

Al-Sadr's Mahdi Army militiamen fought U.S. troops for much of 2004 in Baghdad and across central and southern Iraq. It is blamed for most of the sectarian violence raging in Iraq.

The cleric's supporters have been among al-Maliki's strongest backers, ensuring his election as prime minister. Relations have recently frayed, however, with the 30 Sadrist lawmakers and five Cabinet ministers boycotting the government and parliament to protest al-Maliki's meeting with Bush in Jordan.

DOJ_NMG_0104173

The al-Sadr aide said recent contacts with the office of Grand Ayatollah Ali al-Sistani, spiritual leader of most Iraqi Shiites, indicated the Iranian-born al-Sistani was not averse to replacing al-Maliki. Al-Sistani issued an unusually harsh criticism of the government in July.

Al-Hakim's SCIRI, along with parliament's Kurdish bloc and al-Hashemi's Islamic party, are likely to be the major powers of the new alliance. Independent lawmakers are also expected to join, legislators said.

Al-Hashemi's Islamic party said Sunday it would not join any future government unless it had a real voice.

Mahmoud Othman, a prominent Kurdish lawmaker and a sharp government critic, said talks on a new parliamentary alliance were initiated early this year, abandoned and recently resumed.

"This government must offer a remedy for all the problems we have in Iraq or publicly announce that it's unable to do so," said Othman, who is close to the negotiations.

Al-Maliki's government, under the Iraqi constitution, could be ousted if a simple majority of parliament's 275 members opposed it in a vote of confidence. Parties in the talks expressed confidence they had enough votes.

"The question of confidence in this government must be reconsidered," Parliament Speaker Mahmoud al-Mashhadani, a Sunni Arab, told legislators Sunday. "Why should we continue to support it? For its failure?"

For Iraq's Sunnis, Conflict Closes In (WP)

By Sudarsan Raghavan

The Washington Post, December 11, 2006

BAGHDAD, Dec. 10 -- A few blocks from Ali Farouk's three-story home, an empty house provides a glimpse of what he fears will be the future. Once owned by a Sunni Muslim, the paint is peeling, the windows are blown out. Two scarlet X's mark the pale blue front door.

To the door's right are the words: "Not for Sale. Wanted."

According to neighbors, "Wanted" refers to the former owner, who fled after crossing paths with the Mahdi Army, the Shiite militia of firebrand cleric Moqtada al-Sadr. The gunmen accused the owner of killing four of their own at a checkpoint. Then they took over his house.

To the door's left, the words: "This is vengeance for the other day."

Farouk, a Sunni Muslim, fears his home might be targeted next. In the past two months, Shiite militiamen have tightened their grip on his central Baghdad neighborhood of Tobji, purging dozens of Sunni families, by fear and by threats. His world has become even more precarious since a barrage of car bombs, mortar shells and missiles killed more than 200 on Nov. 23 in Sadr City, the Baghdad slum that is home to many of Sadr's loyalists.

So Farouk began preparing to do what neither his father nor his grandfather could have imagined in their Iraq: flee Tobji, an enclave where Shiites and Sunnis have coexisted for more than half a century. Farouk plans to join the more than 400,000 Iraqis who have fled their homes, an exodus that is reshaping the face of Baghdad into neighborhoods polarized along sectarian lines.

On Saturday, Farouk's mission grew more urgent. In the latest spasm of revenge attacks, gangs of Shiite gunmen stormed Hurriyah, a mixed neighborhood adjacent to Tobji, torching houses, killing at least two Sunni Arabs and driving out dozens of Sunni families. On Sunday, in interviews across Tobji, Sunni Arabs worried that their fate could soon mirror their brethren's.

"It is coming like a wave," said Khudir Mahmoud, 32, after his midday prayers. "If the government doesn't intervene, the wave will reach here. We are only one street away."

The unraveling of Tobji and Hurriyah is the latest setback for the nation's Sunni minority, which is still seeking a political foothold in Iraq in the fourth year of war. Sunnis were once part of the country's privileged class, with government jobs, but their days and nights are now filled with fear and dread unlike anything they felt since the toppling of President Saddam Hussein.

"We are stuck in a big hole waiting for Lucifer to take our souls," said Farouk, 46, a father of seven. "At any moment we can die."Worry Despite Precautions

DOJ_NMG_0104174

Rabiaa Street, a dusty, congested thoroughfare, flows through central Baghdad west of the Tigris River. Along one stretch, near a patch of machinery shops, Hurriyah and Tobji face each other across the street. In Arabic, Hurriyah means freedom. Tobji's official name is Salaam. It means peace.

On one side, the road streams into Hurriyah's core, past a Sunni mosque that was destroyed, past a satellite office of Sadr, where clusters of young men lingered, past signs that read "Long Live Shia."

On the other side of Rabiaa Street is a set of railroad tracks nestled on the edge of Tobji, a working-class community of Shiites, Sunni Arabs and Kurds. In recent months, bodies of both Shiites and Sunnis have been dumped along the tracks, residents said Sunday. The killings are evidence of how the war to control the capital is spreading and how Shiite militiamen are increasingly pushing into western Baghdad, where Sunnis dominate.

Farouk's house sits in the heart of Tobji, around the corner from walls with black markings that read "Long Live Sadr." He is burly, with a long, oval face and a thin gray mustache, one of three Sunnis who live on the block.

He met a journalist first on Nov. 30, a week after the Sadr City attacks, on the condition that his father's, grandfather's and tribe's names not be used. Farouk is his great-grandfather's name. He told his Shiite neighbors that he was receiving a visit from co-workers at the government ministry where he is employed.

Even with those precautions, he was worried. Fearful of attracting attention, he rushed his visitor to the second-floor living room of his house. At the top of the narrow staircase, a large poster of Imam Ali, the most revered Shiite saint, along with several other important Shiite figures, stared from a wall. Farouk said he put up the posters the day of the Sadr City attacks -- in case Shiite militiamen came that night. He has no plans to take them down, he said.

"I am scared. I am Sunni," he said that day.A Showcase of Dangers

In the 1950s, Farouk's Sunni father moved to Tobji. Farouk's mother was a Shiite, and his first name, Ali, is given to both Shiites and Sunnis. He went to school with Shiites and had Shiite friends. Neither sect nor ethnicity defined his identity, even when Hussein, a Sunni, brutally oppressed the Shiite community after he took power.

The war didn't reach Tobji in full force until this year. In January, gunmen wearing police uniforms and driving police vehicles abducted 53 Sunnis. Most were never seen again. The next month, a Shiite shrine in the town of Samarra was bombed, triggering cycles of revenge killings.

Mixed neighborhoods across Baghdad, including this one, started to rip apart. Still, after each attack, Tobji managed to heal momentarily, because of a tribal leadership of Sunnis and Shiites that is struggling to preserve the bonds between their communities.

Today, the last mile to Farouk's house is a showcase of the danger that threatens to overtake their efforts. Around the corner from an Iraqi army checkpoint, young men wearing dark clothes and clutching AK-47 assault rifles stand guard, a testament to the fact that they, not the Iraqi soldiers, are in charge. Some clutch black two-way radios; others stare fixedly into cars. On Sunday, one man stood in the middle of the street with a small piece of white paper, checking the license plates of cars.

The affiliation of the men with guns can be discerned by looking at a nearby concrete barrier. Scrawled in red paint are words boldly expressed in Arabic: "Yes for the Mahdi Army."

Women in black, head-to-toe abayas float like shadows in the sun here. A few blocks away, residents walk past the empty, disfigured house of the Sunni Arab without casting a glance. On a visit four weeks ago, Mahdi Army militiamen, including one who sat in a yellow plastic chair in the middle of the road, stopped cars and demanded:

"Why are you here? What is your tribe?"A Shiite, Killed in Error

His tribal name didn't help Khelan Jassim Muhammed, 46, a grocer and father of six girls, from becoming a victim of the killing in Hurriyah.

Two weeks ago, he moved from Tobji to Hurriyah to occupy a house left empty by relatives who had moved to the United Arab Emirates. Muhammed, his relatives said, felt safe. He was a Shiite from the Ajaeli tribe.

Last Wednesday, he left his home in the morning and never returned. After a frantic search, his brothers found his body the next morning in the morgue. His corpse had been discovered in a trash dump in a Shiite neighborhood.

"He was handcuffed from the back and had two bullets holes in the back of his head," Khatan Jassim, 41, one of his brothers, said Sunday. As he finished the sentence, silence fell upon his family's spare, white-lit living room, where seven relatives were seated in a semicircle. Before they sat down on a large red carpet, they said a prayer, their palms facing upward in the Shiite tradition. They had lived all their lives in Tobji, just down the road from the empty Sunni Arab house.

Khatan Jassim, a taxi driver with a wide nose, thick neck and sun-leathered skin, said his brother's death bore the trademark of the Mahdi Army.

There are Sunnis and Shiites in the Ajaeli tribe, he explained. His brother, he added, was also carrying an identification card issued in Abu Ghraib, a Sunni area.

"There was a misunderstanding from the Sadr office," Jassim said. "They didn't know he was a Shia."

At the funeral, Sadr's representatives came to offer their condolences. Jassim confronted them. They denied any involvement.

"They gave us an excuse," Jassim recalled. "They said, 'Why would we kidnap him and dump his body in a dumpster? We control the neighborhood. We could have gone inside his house and killed him.' "A Feeling of Siege

Across the street from the concrete barrier with the Mahdi Army proclamation, 25 Sunnis gathered Sunday at the Suhail Mosque for midday prayers. Young and old, they prayed solemnly, their hands at their side. Their small numbers spoke of their fears.

"This is half of what it used to be," said Khalid Mahmoud, 45, a mosque official and Khudir Mahmoud's brother. "People are staying home. They are worried about their security. Even if they come, their minds will be preoccupied."

"Most of the Sunnis here feel like they are under siege," he added.

As Mahmoud spoke, Abdul Wahad, 26, nodded in agreement. Dressed in a blue and orange Puma tracksuit jacket, he said he no longer hangs out on the streets. He has stopped pursuing his degree in economics because he's worried about getting killed.

"We don't trust the checkpoints," he said.

Added Khalid Mahmoud, "After the Sadr City bombings, none of us have left Tobji."

Ten days ago, three Sunnis were kidnapped, including the brother of the mosque's custodian. He still hasn't been found. On Sunday, Khudir Mahmoud sent a woman to the morgue to inquire whether his body had turned up. He was too afraid to go by himself because the Health Ministry is controlled by Shiites loyal to Sadr. The custodian now plans to quit and move his family to Samarra.'I Am Like a Prisoner'

On the day Sadr City was attacked, a Shiite friend a few blocks away phoned Farouk to warn that Shiite militiamen were rumored to be roaming Tobji in search of Sunni men. He invited Farouk to stay at his house. Farouk and his two grown sons gratefully accepted. His wife and five smaller children stayed behind. The next day, Farouk and his sons returned. He loaded his AK-47 and kept it in his bedroom.

The day after a three-day curfew was lifted, Farouk went to work, switching taxis in case he was being followed. He was stopped at a checkpoint, he said. A Shiite policeman asked whether he was a Sunni or Shiite. Farouk replied that he was Iraqi, then flashed his government identification card. "You son of dogs," the policeman said but waved him through.

For the next three days, Farouk stayed inside his house. "I can't even walk to the main street," he said Nov. 30. "At 6 p.m., I lock my door and stay inside."

At night, the family slept together in the living room while Farouk kept watch for a possible attack. One night, a sound on the roof sent him rushing up with his gun. It was water dropping into a tank. "I am like a prisoner," he said.

In the living room that day, Farouk was expressing anger at the United States for invading Iraq, for disenfranchising the Sunnis. Listening in was his nephew, Ihab Bashir, 30. Farouk framed his plight in political terms, blaming the Shiite-led government for settling scores from the past. "There is no democracy," Farouk said, shaking his head in dismay.

Farouk's 10-year-old son, Omar, entered the living room. Thin with an angular face, he wore jeans and a yellow shirt. When asked his name, he replied in a voice not much louder than a whisper: "Amar."

Amar is a common Shiite name. Farouk had instructed him to lie about his name to strangers. Why didn't he use his real name?

"Because of those people, the Mahdi Army," Omar said.

Why is his father still staying at home?

DOJ_NMG_0104176

Omar paused. "Perhaps the Mahdi Army will come and raid the Sunni homes and kill him."

Seven video compact disc recordings of Sadr's sermons, his stern, bearded visage splashed on every cover, sat on the brown sofa. Farouk's 15-year-old son had bought them the day after the curfew. When he came home, he slipped one of the discs into the VCD player and turned up the volume so all the family's Shiite neighbors could hear.

Omar pointed at them and said, "We have those VCDs for the Mahdi Army not to hurt us."Inviting the Neighbors Over Farouk's plan is to flee to Baqubah, the capital of Diyala province, one of the most violent places in Iraq. He said he does not care about the danger. His sect is the majority there. Just as the Shiites turn to the militias for protection, he now views the Sunni Arab insurgents as his family's guardians.

"The mujaheddin will protect us," Farouk said. "We heard they are helping Sunnis who move there with cooking oil, rice, sugar and fuel."

In the interim, he's decided that the best protection is to rekindle his ties to his Shiite neighbors. In recent days, he has invited some of them to have soda or tea inside his house. He hopes they will notice the poster of Imam Ali. He hopes they will vouch for him if the Mahdi Army attacks.

"I tell everyone that my mother is a Shiite," Farouk said. "I am trying to get closer to them. It's about saving my life."

On Sunday, Farouk was still bracing for a Shiite attack. Two days ago, he bought another poster of Imam Ali and other revered Shiite saints for the living room.

Iraq Is Failing To Spend Billions In Oil Revenues (NYT)

By James Glanz

The New York Times, December 11, 2006

BAGHDAD, Dec. 10 — Iraq is failing to spend billions of dollars of oil revenues that have been set aside to rebuild its damaged roads, schools and power stations and to repair refineries and pipelines.

Iraqi ministries are spending as little as 15 percent of the 2006 capital budgets they received for the rebuilding — with some of the weakest spending taking place at the Oil Ministry, which relies on damaged and frequently sabotaged pipelines and pumping stations to move the oil that provides nearly all of the country's revenues. In essence, the money is available — despite extensive sabotage, the oil money is flowing — but the Iraqi system has not been able to put it to work.

The country is facing this national failure to spend even as American financial support dwindles. Among reasons for the problems — like a large turnover in government personnel — is a strange new one: bureaucrats are so fearful and confused by anticorruption measures put in place by the American and Iraqi governments that they are afraid to sign off on contracts.

The inability to spend the money raises serious questions for the government, which has to demonstrate to citizens who are skeptical and suspicious of government corruption that it can improve basic services, and that at a time when American funds for reconstruction are being reduced, it can prove to other foreign donors that it can quickly put to use the money they may be willing to commit.

After the expenditure of roughly $22 billion in American taxpayer dollars on Iraq reconstruction, the increase of the Iraqi capital budget was seen by many as a sign that oil revenues could finally begin paying for the rebuilding, four years after Bush administration predictions that the country could afford the program on its own.

Iraq's overall capital budget in 2006 was nine trillion Iraqi dinars, or about $6 billion, said Abdulbasit Turki Saeed, president of the Iraqi Board of Supreme Audit and a member of the Iraqi cabinet's economic committee.

But Mr. Saeed said that across the entire government, only about 20 percent of the capital budget had been spent, according to the committee's recent figures. A senior Western official agreed with that estimate.

"It's slow. It's disappointing," the Western official said, speaking on the condition of anonymity because he was not authorized to discuss the subject publicly. "In general, they have had trouble getting projects started."

The problem was briefly acknowledged in the report last week by the bipartisan Iraq Study Group, which gave similar figures for capital expenditures and said that "many ministries can do little more than pay salaries."

DOJ_NMG_0104177

In interviews, alarmed Western and Iraqi officials sought to put the best face on the problem, saying they thought that the pace of spending had picked up in the last two to three months as the government began taking steps to improve its performance.

Those officials said that in a nation with reconstruction needs around every corner, the puzzling phenomenon of unspent money was partly explained by the rapid turnover in governments, security woes, endemic corruption and a lack of technocrats skilled at jobs like writing contracts and managing complex projects. In short, nearly all the ills that have undermined the American rebuilding program seem to be plaguing the Iraqi one.

Hussain al-Shahristani, the Iraqi oil minister, said he thought that he could spend substantially more of this year's budget if he could resolve administrative bottlenecks, like Finance Ministry delays in authorizing payments.

"It's the bureaucracy," Mr. Shahristani said. "Particularly financial people take too long to change their old habits."

But some American and Iraqi officials here are also saying that the stringent measures they had favored to slow the rampant corruption may be especially daunting for bureaucrats who have little experience with Western-style regulations and oversight. Those officials say that Iraqis who have seen their colleagues arrested and jailed in anticorruption sweeps are reluctant to put their own name on a contract.

"As it's applied right now, this new thing scares the hell out of everybody," one Western official here said.

The colliding priorities of oversight and spending have left American and Iraqi officials in a quandary as they work behind the scenes on the so-called "Compact with Iraq" — the centerpiece of the American Embassy's effort to create economic and political milestones that this nation promises to meet in exchange for pledges of foreign investment and support.

Anticorruption officials themselves are facing a loss of support, with the most serious impact felt by Rathi al-Rathi, the head of Iraq's Commission on Public Integrity, who has been privately accused by Western and Iraqi officials of zealotry, political bias and other failings.

A previously undisclosed letter to Mr. Rathi from prime minister Nuri Kamal al-Maliki, dated Sept. 6, is close to an accusation that Mr. Rathi himself is guilty of corruption. The letter, a copy of which was provided to The New York Times, directs him to account for what the prime minister asserts are hundreds of thousands of dollars of undocumented expenses by the commission.

Ali al-Shabot, a spokesman for Mr. Rathi, who was traveling last week, at first insisted that the letter was secret and that he could not discuss it. But finally he dismissed its charges as based on bad information. Mr. Shabot indicated there was at least one good reason that, despite the pressure, the commission would remain in business. He confidently pointed out that international donors who provide financing to Iraq do so "with the guarantee that there are institutions to oversee the money."

While it is clear that new financial support is unlikely without a strong anticorruption campaign in place, Iraq's inability to spend its own money undermines the message that the country will actually be able to use the support if provided.

"People we are trying to deal with and obtain additional funds for Iraq will come back and say, 'Iraq is not spending its own resources,' " said Yahia Said, a research fellow at the London School of Economics who is working as a consultant to the United Nations on the compact.

Mr. Shahristani, the oil minister, who has put new anticorruption measures in place on top of those imposed from the outside, said the solution was to teach the bureaucrats how to cope with the new rules.

"Obviously I've heard of these complaints," he said of the criticisms of the anticorruption organizations. "I don't think that they have gone too far. I think this is necessary given the level of corruption that we have inherited."

Iraq's total budget is about $32 billion in 2006 and is projected to be more than $40 billion in 2007, said Bayan Jabr, the Iraqi finance minister, in an interview. Most of the budget, which comes almost entirely from oil revenues, is consumed in operating expenses, including roughly $8 billion for ministry salaries and pensions and $6 billion for Iraq's socialist-style food and fuel subsidies.

The nation has spent those funds much more easily than it has spent the $6 billion for capital improvements — a number that by some projections could roughly double next year in view of Iraq's vast infrastructure needs.

DOJ_NMG_0104178

According to a report by the Oil Ministry, about half of the money was to go for repair of pipelines, building refineries, improving oil fields, repairs on export terminals, and other improvements to the oil industry. The remainder was to be spent on projects ranging from improving the electrical system to irrigation systems to roads and government buildings of various types.

The same report says that, for example, Iraq is in need of major new oil storage tanks, a 42-inch-diameter pipeline in the south and better electrical generation to run the oil pumps.

Officials are still sorting out what went wrong in the early months of the 2006 program, but some of the problems were similar in kind if not in detail to the ones that derailed major portions of the American effort.

First, after the December 2005 elections, politicians jockeyed for ministerial posts for months, creating uncertainty about whether priorities would change, and then the newly seated officials were unfamiliar with their jobs. At the same time, deepening security problems not only made purchasing and construction difficult, but also continued to drive skilled midlevel ministry employees out of the country.

Final numbers across the ministries will not be available until year's end, but Mr. Jabr, the finance minister, said that a few trends had emerged. Expenditures at the Housing and Construction Ministry and the Oil Ministry were low, while at the other end of the spectrum, the Electricity and Water Resources Ministries were spending as much as three-quarters of their allocations.

But the overall picture is clear, said Lt. Gen. Martin E. Dempsey, who as commander of the Multi-National Security Transition Command-Iraq works extensively with the Interior and Defense Ministries, which he expects to spend about half of their capital budgets this year.

"I think the government of Iraq has got a challenge writ large," General Dempsey said. "The 27 ministries will not execute their 2006 budgets."

American and Iraqi officials are already taking steps to improve the situation, streamlining the contracting process, giving training sessions on the process to ministry employees and, Mr. Jabr said, putting in place measures to penalize ministries that do not spend money fast enough.

General Dempsey said the unspent money in the security ministries in 2006 would not be lost, because Iraq had agreed to allow the funds to be held in the same foreign accounts that are used to coordinate the Pentagon's military purchases until the agencies were ready to use it.

As the financial and political stakes rise within the Iraqi-financed rebuilding program, few officials have escaped blame.

The public integrity commission is cited most often as intimidating. But those who deal with investigations of questionable deals and officials on the take in a historically corrupt country are not surprised by those complaints. "This is normal," said Mr. Shabot, the integrity commission spokesman. "They hate us because we are monitoring them."

Mr. Jabr expressed deep impatience with ministry officials who, he said, told him that part of the reason they were moving so slowing was to avoid running afoul of the integrity commission.

"I said, 'Why are you afraid? If you are not a thief, don't be afraid,' " Mr. Jabr recalled.

Ex-hostages In Iraq Opt For Forgiveness (CSM)

By Mark Rice-oxley And Dan Murphy

The Christian Science Monitor, December 11, 2006

LONDON AND CAIRO

Three pacifists who were held hostage for 118 days in Iraq and were released only after a fourth colleague was murdered, publicly forgave their captors Friday.

At a press conference in London, the members of the Christian Peacemaker Teams (CPT) said they were reluctant to testify against four alleged captors in Iraqi custody because of the possibility that they will face harsh punishment, especially the death penalty.

Canadian James Loney, Briton Norman Kember, and Canadian Harmeet Singh Sooden, who now lives in New Zealand, said they did not want "punitive" justice for their suspected captors, scheduled to stand trial early next year.

"Justice is about restoring relationships that have been broken," says Mr. Loney. "We are very, very concerned about the death penalty. It would be the worst possible outcome for us if they were to be sentenced to death."

DOJ_NMG_0104179

"To lock then up and throw way the key," he says, "that is not justice. Punishment comes from the same mind-set that is behind the escalating spiral of violence that we see in Iraq that is being fueled by the governments in Washington and London. If they are punishing them on my behalf, that doesn't do anything for me."

Loney was a member of the four-man CPT unit seized outside a mosque in Baghdad on Nov. 26 last year. The lone American member, Tom Fox, was killed by their captors. The kidnappers, a group of Sunni Arab insurgents, appeared to have ties to the kidnappers of Jill Carroll, a Christian Science Monitor reporter who was held for 82 days earlier this year following the murder of her translator Allan Enwiya.

After Ms. Carroll was freed from captivity, she revealed that one of her captors said they had killed an American because the US had failed to meet a demand to release Sheikh Omar Abdel-Rahman, a blind cleric convicted of involvement in the 1993 World Trade Center bombing and currently serving a life sentence in a US penitentiary.

In an earlier interview with the Monitor, Mr. Loney said the captors had spoken of demanding Abdel Rahman's release in exchange for their safety; this demand was never made publicly.

The three surviving members of the team say they would be hypocrites if they gave in to the anger created by their ordeal, and participated in the traditional avenues of justice. Loney, a committed Christian, said he would even return to Iraq to meet with his captors. "It would be wonderful to sit down and talk to them and talk about what [prompted] this thing that they did ... what did it mean to them, what does it mean to them now."

Mr. Sooden added that the men have doubts about the fairness of the Iraqi court system, particularly giving the raging war there. "I don't know if the Central Criminal Court of Iraq can act as per its mandate because of the security situation."

Despite the country's ongoing war, the wheels of justice have haltingly moved forward in Iraq, where the death penalty is enforced. And not all hostage advocates share the CPT members' forgiving view.

In June, Mustafa Salman al-Jibouri was sentenced to life imprisonment for aiding the men who kidnapped and later murdered Margaret Hassan, the British national who had run the charity CARE's Baghdad offices and had made aiding Iraq's poor her life's work.

Mrs. Hassan's family charged afterward that "inept" handling of the case allowed Mr. Jibouri to escape the death penalty, and also led to the acquittal of two other men on trial in her murder. They said the acquittals would encourage more kidnapping in Iraq.

In November, Hussein Fahmi, whom authorities described as a member of Al Qaeda in Iraq, was sentenced to death for his role in the kidnapping and beheading of Shosei Koda, a young Japanese man who was abducted while traveling in Iraq in 2004. Mr. Fahmi was of mixed Egyptian and Palestinian descent.

Also, the Iraqi justice system has come under criticism from human rights organizations for frequent torture of captives.

If the three don't testify, either by identifying suspects in a photo lineup or by giving video evidence (there is no suggestion that they should actually travel to the Iraqi court) the case could unravel. "We were told there would be a possibility that they could walk away from this if we don't testify," said Loney. "Not to excuse what they were doing but there was a rationale for it. They saw themselves being part of a fight to defend their country."

The three CPT survivors said a lot of forensic evidence was collected after they were released in a raid following a tip. "There was a fair bit of forensic evidence in the house that we left," says Mr. Kember. "When I got to the hospital, they stripped me ... they said we could get fingerprints off clothes."

Some of the alleged kidnappers of Carroll have been arrested, and Iraqi officials say they are building a strong case against them, but no court dates have yet been set.

Taliban And Allies Tighten Grip In North Of Pakistan (NYT)

By Carlotta Gall And Ismail Khan

The New York Times, December 11, 2006

PESHAWAR, Pakistan — Islamic militants are using a recent peace deal with the government to consolidate their hold in northern Pakistan, vastly expanding their training of suicide bombers and other recruits and fortifying alliances with Al Qaeda and foreign fighters, diplomats and intelligence officials from several nations say. The result, they say, is virtually a Taliban mini-state.

DOJ_NMG_0104180

The militants, the officials say, are openly flouting the terms of the September accord in North Waziristan, under which they agreed to end cross-border help for the Taliban insurgency that revived in Afghanistan with new force this year.

The area is becoming a magnet for an influx of foreign fighters, who not only challenge government authority in the area, but are even wresting control from local tribes and spreading their influence to neighboring areas, according to several American and NATO officials and Pakistani and Afghan intelligence officials.

This year more than 100 local leaders and government sympathizers or accused "American spies" have been killed, several of them in beheadings, as the militants have used a reign of terror to impose what President Pervez Musharraf of Pakistan calls a creeping "Talibanization." Last year, at least 100 others were also killed.

While the tribes once offered refuge to the militants when they retreated to the area in 2002 after the American invasion of Afghanistan, that welcome is waning as the killings have generated new tensions and added to the region's volatility.

"They are taking territory," said one western ambassador in Pakistan. "They are becoming much more aggressive in Pakistan."

"It is the lesson from Afghanistan in the '90s," he added. "Ungoverned spaces are a problem. The whole tribal area is a problem."

The links among the various groups date to the 1980s, when Arabs, Pakistanis and other Muslims joined Afghans in their fight to drive out the Soviet invasion of Afghanistan, using a network of training camps and religious schools set up by the Pakistani intelligence agency and financed by the C.I.A. and Saudi Arabia.

The training continued with Pakistani and Qaeda support through the 1990s, and then moved into Afghanistan under the Taliban. It was during this time that Pakistanis became drawn into militancy in big numbers, fighting alongside the Taliban and hundreds of foreign fighters against the northern tribes of Afghanistan. Today the history of the region has come full circle.

Since retreating from Afghanistan in 2002 under American military attacks, the Taliban and foreign fighters have again been using the tribal areas to organize themselves — now training their sights on the 40,000 American and NATO troops in Afghanistan.

After failing to gain control of the areas in military campaigns, the government cut peace deals in South Waziristan in 2004 and 2005, and then in North Waziristan on Sept. 5. Since the September accord, NATO officials say cross-border attacks by Pakistani and Afghan Taliban and their foreign allies have increased.

In recent weeks, Pakistani intelligence officials said the number of foreign fighters in the tribal areas was far higher than the official estimate of 500, perhaps as high as 1,500 to 2,000 today.

These fighters include Afghans and seasoned Taliban leaders, Uzbek and other Central Asian militants, and what intelligence officials estimate to be 80 to 90 Arab terrorist operatives and fugitives, possibly including the Qaeda leaders Osama bin Laden and his second in command, Ayman al-Zawahri.

The tightening web of alliances among these groups in a remote, mountainous area increasingly beyond state authority is potentially disastrous for efforts to combat terrorism as far away as Europe and the United States, intelligence officials warn.

They and western diplomats say it also portends an even bloodier year for Afghanistan in 2007, with the winter expected to serve as what one official described as a "breeding season" to multiply ranks.

"I expect next year to be quite bloody," the United States ambassador in Afghanistan, Ronald Neumann, said in an interview last week. "My sense is the Taliban wants to come back and fight. I don't expect the Taliban to win, but everyone needs to understand that we are in for a fight."

Foreign Influence

One of the clearest measures of the dangers of this local cross-fertilization is the suicide bombings. Diplomats with knowledge of the area's Pashtun tribes say they have little doubt the tactic emerged from the influence of Al Qaeda, since such attacks were unknown in Pakistan or Afghanistan before 2001.

This year suicide attacks have become a regular feature of the Afghan war and have also appeared for the first time even in Pakistan, including two in this frontier province in recent weeks, indicating a growing threat to Pakistan's security.

In recent weeks, Afghan officials say they have uncovered alarming signs of large-scale indoctrination and preparation of suicide bombers in the tribal areas, and the Pakistani minister of the interior, Aftab Khan Sherpao, publicly acknowledged for the first time that training of suicide bombers was occurring in the tribal areas.

The Afghan intelligence service said last week in a statement that it had captured an Afghan suicide bomber wearing a vest filled with explosives. The man reportedly said he had been given the task by the head of a religious school in the Pakistani tribal region of Bajaur, and that 500 to 600 students there were being prepared to fight jihad and be suicide bombers.

The bomber said that the former head of Pakistani intelligence, Gen. Hamid Gul, was financing and supporting the project, according to the statement, though the claim is impossible to verify. Pakistan intelligence agencies have long nurtured militants in the tribal areas to pressure the rival government in Afghanistan, though the government claims to have ceased its support.

So numerous are the recruits that a tribal leader in southern Afghanistan, who did not want to be named because of the threat of suicide bombers, relayed an account of how one would-be suicide bomber was sent home and told to wait his turn because there were many in line ahead of him.

American military officials say they believe much of the training in Waziristan is taking place under the aegis of men like Jalaluddin Haqqani, once one of the most formidable commanders of the anti-Soviet mujahedeen forces who joined the Taliban in the 1990s.

He has had a close relationship with Arab fighters since the 1980s, when Waziristan was his rear base for fighting the Soviet occupation. Arab fighters had joined him there in the struggle, among them Osama bin Laden.

He later became the Taliban's minister of tribal affairs and was the main protector for the foreign fighters on their exodus from Afghanistan in 2001 and 2002. He and his son, Sirajuddin Haqqani, remain the most important local partners for Al Qaeda in Waziristan.

Mr. Haqqani bases himself in North Waziristan and has a host of other Taliban and foreign commanders, in particular Uzbeks, who are loyal to him, United States military officials say.

Money continues to flow in from religious supporters at home and in the Persian Gulf, as well as from a range of illicit activities like a lucrative opium trade, smuggling and even kidnapping, diplomats, United Nations analysts and local journalists say.

"There are clearly very substantial training facilities that are still operating in Waziristan, both north and south, and other parts of FATA and Baluchistan," a diplomat in Kabul said, referring to the region by the acronym for its formal name, the Federally Administered Tribal Areas.

"Even more worrying is the continued presence of the Taliban and Haqqani leadership networks," the diplomat said, dismayed at what he characterized as Pakistani passivity in breaking up the networks.

"They haven't been addressed at all on the Pakistani side," he added. "They haven't been pursued."

The diplomat also singled out Saddique Noor, in his mid-40s, a Pakistani militant commander who he said was training suicide bombers in Waziristan and sending them into Afghanistan. Mr. Noor fought in Afghanistan alongside the Taliban in the 1990s and is a determined opponent of the American and NATO presence in Afghanistan.

Another commander, Beitullah Mehsud, about age 40 and also from the region, is now probably the strongest Pakistani Taliban commander and may also be dispatching suicide bombers. He also fought in Afghanistan under the Taliban and claims to have 15,000 fighters under him now.

Both men are loyal to Mr. Haqqani, whom Western diplomats consider one of the most dangerous Taliban commanders because of his links to Al Qaeda and his strong local standing.

The other, for the same reason, is Mullah Dadullah, a ruthless Taliban commander from southern Afghanistan, who has emerged as the main figure in the resurgence of the Afghan Taliban.

The one-legged Dadullah — he lost a leg in fighting — has a flamboyant if cruel reputation. He narrowly escaped capture in northern Afghanistan in 2001, often gives boastful interviews to news agencies, and is known to have personally ordered the killings of aid workers. His latest announcement, made in a phone call to [a news agency], was that the Taliban had infiltrated suicide bombers into every Afghan city.

DOJ_NMG_0104182

He is widely thought to be based in or around the southern Pakistani town of Quetta but is reported to be constantly on the move. He visited various areas of southern Afghanistan this year and has traveled to Waziristan repeatedly, in particular as the tribes of North Waziristan negotiated their Sept. 5 peace deal with the government, which he sanctioned, according to local reporters and intelligence officials.

Push for Order

The increasingly urgent question for Pakistani, Afghan, American and NATO officials is what can be done to bring the region under control. The Pakistani government's latest attempt was the Sept. 5 peace accord in North Waziristan.

Under the deal, both the government and militants agreed to cease attacks, and the militants agreed to end cross-border help for the Afghan insurgency, the killings of tribal leaders and accused government sympathizers, and "Talibanization" of the area.

Taliban commanders sanctioned the deals, arguing that the militants should concentrate their efforts on the foreign armies in Afghanistan and not waste their energies on clashing with the Pakistani military, journalists working in Waziristan say.

Critics say the agreement is fatally flawed since it lacks any means of enforcement and that it has actually empowered the militants. An international policy analysis group, the International Crisis Group, brands it as a policy of appeasement, in a report to be released on Dec. 11.

The government has taken down checkpoints, released detainees, and returned confiscated weapons and vehicles, and issued an amnesty. But the militants have increased their activities, benefiting from the truce with the Pakistani military, the groups said.

"From the start the agreement was not good because there are too many concessions and no clauses that are binding," said Brig. Mahmood Shah, who served as secretary of the Federally Administered Tribal Areas until 2005. "This agreement is not going to work, and if it is working, it is working against the government interest."

A local politician and human rights advocate, Afrasiab Khattak, spokesman for the Awami National Party in Peshawar, also criticized the agreement. The militants rather than the traditional tribal leaders have the power now, he said.

"They have imposed a new elite in Waziristan," he said. "More than 200 tribal chiefs have been killed, and not a single culprit brought to justice."

Still, Javed Iqbal, the newly appointed Pakistani secretary of the tribal areas, defended the North Waziristan accord as an effort to return to the traditional way of running the tribal areas, through the tribal chiefs. That system, employed by the British and Pakistani rulers alike, was eroded during the military campaigns of the last few years.

"We have tried the coercive tactic, we did not achieve much," he said in an interview in Peshawar. "So what do you do? Engage."

He said the government had let down the tribal elders in Waziristan who had wanted dialogue with the government, but were murdered one after another by the militants. But the big turnout of some 500 to 600 tribal elders at a meeting in Miramshah in North Waziristan in November was encouraging, he said, and showed that the tribes wanted to engage. "We are back in business," he said.

Loss of Control

Some Pakistani officials admit they have made a serious mistake in allowing the militants so much leeway, but only if they will not be quoted publicly.

Afghan and Pakistani Taliban leadership networks run training camps in various parts of the 500-mile length of the tribal areas, from Baluchistan in the south to the hub of North and South Waziristan, and farther north to Bajaur, said a Western diplomat in Kabul.

A diplomat who visited Wana, the capital of South Waziristan, said the government had almost no control over either of the Waziristans.

"They are absolutely not running the show in North Waziristan, and it runs the risk of becoming like South Waziristan," he said. "In South Waziristan the government does not even pretend to have a remit that runs outside of its compounds."

The fundamentalists' influence is seeping outward, with propaganda being spread on private radio stations, and through a widening network of religious schools and the distribution of CDs and DVDs. It can now be felt in neighboring tribal departments and the settled areas of the North-West Frontier Province. In recent months, Pakistani newspapers have reported incidents of music and barber shops being closed, television sets burnt, and threats to girls' schools.

The militants are more powerful than the military and the local tribal police, kill with impunity and shield criminals and fugitives. Local journalists say people blame the militants for a rising tide of kidnappings, killings, robberies and even rapes.

The brutality of some foreign militants has begun causing rising discontent among the Pakistani hosts, many of whom are also armed and militant, making the region increasingly volatile and uncontrollable.

"Initially, it was sympathy," one Pakistani intelligence official said. "Then came the money, but it was soon followed by fear. Now, fear is overriding the other two factors, sympathy and money."

For now, however, the Taliban commanders and the Pakistani militants under them remain unswervingly loyal to jihad in Afghanistan and, despite the tensions, still enjoy local support for the cause, officials and local journalists say.

The failed government military campaigns of recent years, which are seen as dictated by the United States, have further radicalized the local population, many in the region say.

As a potential indicator of local support, the families of two suicide bombers sent to Afghanistan from Waziristan gained renown in the community, according to a local journalist.

"The people support the militants because they are from their own tribe, they are family," said the journalist, who asked not to be named out of fear of the militants.

Morale is high among the resurgent Taliban after their revival in Afghanistan this year, one Pakistani security official said. That will lead to still more recruitment and better organization and planning in the year ahead.

Fighting traditionally dies down in winter because of the inhospitable conditions in the mountains.

But the new fighting season in the spring would be even bloodier, a Western diplomat in Kabul said. "We have to assume that things will be bad again," he said, "because none of the underlying causes are being addressed."

Iraq Lessons In Afghanistan? (WSJ)

By Jay Solomon

The Wall Street Journal, December 11, 2006

As pressure mounts on the White House to engage Tehran over Iraq, Afghanistan offers an example of how U.S. and Iranian interests can constructively align in the Islamic world.

Senior American and Afghan officials say that in contrast with the situation in Iraq, where Iran is allegedly funding and arming Shiite militias, Tehran today is playing an important role in seeking to stabilize post-Taliban Afghanistan.

The Iranian government has pledged $560 million in development aid to President Hamid Karzai's government since 2002, these officials say, roughly half of which has been disbursed. It is developing road and power projects, largely in the western part of the country near the two countries' shared border. And Iranian companies have provided goods and services -- including cement and banking -- to Afghanistan's war-ravaged population.

Iran also has been among the most active nations seeking to combat Afghanistan's largest ill, opium production, say American and Afghan officials. Tehran seized more Afghan opium than any other country last year, with hundreds of its security forces killed while policing its 600-mile border with Afghanistan in recent years, according to the United Nations.

Critics say Iran has largely acted out of self-interest in Afghanistan. They say Tehran's support for Mr. Karzai's government is in part aimed at ridding the country of Tehran's enemy, the Taliban Sunni militia, while seeking to usher in stable conditions that could hasten a U.S. withdrawal from Central Asia. Its counternarcotics operations, meanwhile, are driven by a desire to cut off supply to its country's estimated two million heroin addicts. Iran is also using Afghanistan as a base to expand its influence and economic interests across the region.

And Iran's intelligence services maintain a "destructive capability" inside Afghanistan that could target American and North Atlantic Treaty Organization forces should tensions between Washington and Tehran escalate, Afghan and U.S. officials say.

"Iran's role has been constructive" in helping to rebuild Afghanistan and fight narcotics, said Said Jawad, Afghanistan's ambassador to Washington. He added that cordial Afghan-Iranian relations are crucial, due to Tehran's economic and political influence inside his country.

Former Secretary of State James Baker III, in unveiling the Iraq Study Group's recommendations on how to improve the situation in Iraq last week, pointed to Afghanistan as a possible model for U.S.-Iran cooperation in Iraq.

"All we're suggesting is doing with [Iraq] what we did in Afghanistan, when we talked to [the Iranians] and they helped us stabilize the situation," said Mr. Baker, co-chairman of the panel.

Outside Afghanistan, the U.S. and Iran have hostile relations, with the two sides at odds over Tehran's efforts to develop a nuclear program and its backing of extremist forces across the Middle East. But that hasn't stopped the two countries from accepting each other's roles in Afghanistan.

In Iraq, Mr. Baker and others say, Iran's Shiite theocracy government could only help -- indeed, may be essential -- to stem the flow of arms and funds to Shiite militias across its border, while providing critical development aid.

Even if the White House were to reach out to Iran -- President Bush so far has made working with Tehran conditional upon its stopping its nuclear program -- it has offered little indication that it would be willing, or even able, to play the same type of stabilizing role in Iraq that it has in Afghanistan. President Mahmoud Ahmadinejad has rejected repeated White House calls for meetings to coordinate a response to Iraq's turmoil. Still, current and former U.S. diplomats say, Iran may be cooperative in Iraq if Washington offers it a more direct role. In Afghanistan, Iran emerged as an unlikely supporter of U.S. policy, as the Bush administration moved to overthrow the Taliban after the Sept. 11, 2001, al Qaeda attacks, current and former U.S. diplomats say.

Iran's leadership had developed an intense hatred for the Taliban during its five-year rule of Afghanistan. The radical Sunni regime nearly sparked a war with Iran in 1998, after its forces killed nine Iranian diplomats in the central Afghan city of Mazar-i-Sharif, on charges they were spies. The Taliban also persecuted Afghanistan's minority Shiite peoples, known as the Hazara, who share a common language and religion with Iran.

In January 2002, Mr. Bush branded Iran a member of his "Axis of Evil," angering Iran's then-moderate government of President Mohammad Khatami, which had believed its relations with Washington were improving in light of the Afghanistan war. The White House also charged Iran with sheltering and providing safe passage to al Qaeda and Taliban militants who had fled the fighting in Afghanistan. One of them, U.S. intelligence officials say, was Abu Musab al-Zarqawi, the Jordanian terrorist who went on to head al Qaeda's operations in Iraq before his death in June. (Iran has denied that it supports al Qaeda.)

Regardless of the breakdown in U.S.-Iran ties, Tehran has continued to push ahead with development projects in Afghanistan, albeit amid little interaction with the American presence there. Its investments have helped make the country's western and central regions among the most stable there, in contrast with Afghanistan's south and east, where Taliban insurgents have heightened attacks on NATO, U.S. and Afghan forces in recent months, say Afghan officials and businessmen. Perhaps no place is the impact of Iran's assistance as apparent as the western Afghan city of Herat.

Tehran is seeking to help refashion the city as a trading hub linking Asia and the Central Asian states to the Persian Gulf. Iran's cultural and financial influence has traditionally been strong in Herat, though it had eroded under the Taliban.

Central to this effort has been the development of a roads project, costing hundreds of millions of dollars, that connects Herat to Iran's east and then on to the Persian Gulf port of Chabahar. Landlocked Afghanistan has relied on the Pakistani port of Karachi both to ship out products and import many raw materials. But many Afghan businessmen have complained in recent years that shipping through the overloaded Karachi port is expensive and time-consuming.

Tehran's development of Chabahar and its financing of roads linking it to Afghanistan have stimulated competition between Pakistan and Iran for a leading role in Afghanistan's transit business, say Afghan and development officials.

Herat also has some of the best power supply in Afghanistan, thanks to Iran. Much of the rest of Afghanistan is waiting for the government to connect power lines to energy supplies in Tajikistan, a process that is taking years as workers first move to clear the Hindu Kush mountain range. Tehran, however, has directly tied Herat to Iran's power grid.

"Iran has chosen projects that are a high priority and necessary" for Afghanistan, says Alastair McKechnie, the World Bank's country director for Afghanistan. "In that sense, they've played a very positive role."

A number of Afghan and American officials say Iran's increasing presence in Afghanistan may not be all positive. Iranian intelligence agencies are believed to be assuming a larger presence inside the country, mixing in with the Hazara and the more than one million Afghan refugees who have returned from Iran since the Taliban's fall. Tehran continues to maintain strategic ties with many of the former Northern Alliance warlords with whom they were aligned against the Taliban, say U.S. and Afghan officials. In addition, while Sunni-controlled states, such as Saudi Arabia, are reluctantly accepting Iran's influence in western Afghanistan, they are wary of it expanding beyond there through the Middle East. Should tensions between Iran and the U.S. escalate over Tehran's nuclear program, many in Afghanistan say, Tehran could seek to use its own intelligence agents and their Afghan allies to target American and NATO forces inside Afghanistan.

"Iran is very active ... and could play in several ways that is detrimental to Afghanistan," says retired Gen. David Barno, who commanded U.S. forces in Afghanistan up until last year. Tehran still sees Afghanistan "as part of the broader conflict with the U.S."

Escalating Tab Despite Its $168 Billion Budget, The Army Faces A Cash Crunch (WSJ)

By Greg Jaffe

The Wall Street Journal, December 11, 2006

After Years of Gearing Up For High-Tech Warfare, Service Is Short on Basics Humvees Rise to $225,000

FORT STEWART, Ga. -- With just six weeks before they leave for Iraq, the 3,500 soldiers from the Third Infantry Division's First Brigade should be learning about Ramadi, the insurgent stronghold where they will spend a year.

Many of the troops don't even know the basic ethnic makeup of the largely Sunni city. "We haven't spent as much time as I would like on learning the local culture, language, and politics -- all the stuff that takes a while to really get good at," says Lt. Col. Clifford Wheeler, who commands one of the brigade's 800-soldier units.

Instead, the troops are learning to use equipment that commanders say they should ideally have been training with since the spring. Many soldiers only recently received their new M-4 rifles and rifle sights, which are in short supply because of an Army-wide cash crunch. Some still lack their machine guns or long-range surveillance systems, which are used to spot insurgents laying down roadside bombs. They've been told they'll pick up most of that when they get to Iraq.

The strains here at Fort Stewart -- one of the busiest posts in the U.S. military -- are apparent throughout the Army. They spotlight a historic predicament: The Iraq war has exposed more than a decade's worth of mistakes and miscalculations that are now seriously undermining the world's mightiest military force.

In the 15 years after the Cold War, senior military planners and civilian-defense officials didn't build a force geared to fighting long, grinding guerrilla wars, like Iraq and Afghanistan. Instead they banked on fighting quick wars, dominated by high-tech weapons systems.

The result: At a time when the war in Iraq is deepening, and debate over pulling out the troops is intensifying, the rising cost of waging the fight is outpacing even the Army's huge budget. The financial squeeze is leaving the Army short of equipment and key personnel.

The situation has the Army seeking billions more for next year, even as younger officers, frustrated with the pace of change, say that any improvements depend more on how the money is spent than on how much is spent.

From 1990 to 2005, the military lavished money on billion-dollar destroyers, fighter jets and missile-defense systems. Defenders of such programs say the U.S. faces a broad array of threats and must be prepared for all of them. High-tech weaponry contributed to the swift toppling of the regimes in Iraq and Afghanistan, but has been of little help in the more difficult task of stabilizing the two countries.

Of the $1.9 trillion the U.S. spent on weaponry in that period, adjusted for inflation, the Air Force received 36% and the Navy got 33%. The Army took in 16%, it says. Despite the wars in Iraq and Afghanistan, both dominated by ground forces, the ratio hasn't changed significantly.

Overly optimistic predictions by the Bush administration -- and the Army -- have made the Army's budget crunch worse. Both assumed troop numbers in Iraq would drop significantly by 2006 and the Army wouldn't need as much money as it initially requested. Instead, costs have soared, forcing front-line commanders and Pentagon generals to try to meet an ever-growing list of demands with insufficient resources.

"Our ground forces have been stretched nearly to the breaking point," warned the bipartisan Iraq Study Group in its recent report. "The defense budget as a whole is in danger of disarray."

It may seem hard to believe that a country which allocated $168 billion to the Army this year -- more than twice the 2000 budget -- can't cover the costs of the wars in Iraq and Afghanistan. But the two pillars of the Army, personnel and equipment -- both built to wage high-tech, firepower-intensive wars -- are under enormous stress:

The cost of basic equipment that soldiers carry into battle -- helmets, rifles, body armor -- has more than tripled to $25,000 from $7,000 in 1999.

The cost of a Humvee, with all the added armor, guns, electronic jammers and satellite-navigational systems, has grown seven-fold to about $225,000 a vehicle from $32,000 in 2001.

The cost of paying and training troops has grown 60% to about $120,000 per soldier, up from $75,000 in 2001. On the reserve side, such costs have doubled since 2001, to about $34,000 per soldier.

At Fort Knox, Ky., the cash crunch got so bad this summer that the Army ran out of money to pay janitors who clean the classrooms where captains are taught to be commanders. So the officers, who will soon be leading 100-soldier units, clean the office toilets themselves.

"The cost of the Army is being driven up by [Iraq and Afghanistan]. That's the fundamental story here," says Brig. Gen. Andrew Twomey, a senior official on the Army staff in the Pentagon. The increased costs are "not from some wild weapons system that is off in the future. These are costs associated with current demands."

Senior Army officials concede they mistakenly assumed prior to the Iraq war that if they built a force capable of winning big conventional battles, everything else -- from counterinsurgency to peacekeeping -- would be relatively easy. "We argued in those days that if we could do the top-end skills, we could do all of the other ones," says Lt. Gen. Thomas Metz, the deputy commander of the Army's Training and Doctrine Command. Iraq has proven that guerrilla fights demand different equipment and skills. "I have had to eat a little crow," says Gen. Metz.

Army officials say they are doing their best to ensure that Iraq and Afghanistan-bound brigades have all the equipment they need when they arrive in the war zone. But to do this, they have had to take equipment from units training back home, which are now short of even the most basic gear, such as body armor and rifles.

The equipment shortages explain why Gen. John Abizaid, the top commander in the Middle East, recently told lawmakers that the U.S. couldn't maintain even a relatively small increase of 20,000 soldiers in Iraq for more than a few months. "The ability to sustain that commitment is simply not something that we have right now," he testified in November.

The other big strain on the Army is a shortage of people. The Army has made much of the fact that it met its recruiting goals for 2006, bringing in 80,000 soldiers. But meeting those goals has come at a heavy cost. The Army spent about $735 million on retention bonuses in 2006 to keep battle-weary troops in the service, up from about $85 million in 2003. And it had to pay about $300 million more on recruiting this year compared to the year before.

The extra cash didn't stop the Army from having to lower standards. Although the quality of the force is still considered good, 8,500 recruits in 2006 required "moral waivers" for criminal misconduct or past drug use -- more than triple the 2,260 waivers the Army issued 10 years ago. The Army also took in more troops who scored in the bottom third on its aptitude test.

As it has brought in more borderline recruits, the Army has found itself short of officers and sergeants. Today, it is down about 3,000 active-duty officers, a deficiency that it says will grow to about 3,700 in 2008. It is short more than 7,500 reserve and National Guard officers, according to internal Army documents.

One of the most pressing personnel problems is the lack of sergeants, the enlisted leaders who do most of the day-to-day supervising of the rank-and-file soldiers.

DOJ_NMG_0104187

At Fort Hood, Texas, the Third Armored Cavalry Regiment, which returned from Iraq in March, has about 75% of the soldiers it needs to fill its ranks, but only about half of its sergeants. The 5,000-soldier unit likely will go back to Iraq in the fall of next year, and leaders in the regiment say they will get more sergeants before they deploy, but not as many as they would like.

"The sergeant is the one that the soldiers take after," says First Sgt. James Adcock, who oversees about 130 of the unit's soldiers. "He can make or break how effective the privates are."

The large number of young soldiers in the unit combined with the shortage of sergeants has led to problems, say the regiment's leaders. Some also blame the Army's decision to scale back recruiting standards and push more troops through basic training. In May 2005, about 18% of Army's recruits were asked to leave before completing initial training. Today, only about 6% of recruits fail to make it through.

The troops who a year ago might have flunked out of basic training seem to stick with their units, according to Army statistics. But some sergeants say they also seem to cause more problems. Sgt. First Class Rajesh Harripersad, who oversees a 30-soldier platoon, says two of his soldiers were caught using marijuana and methamphetamines. Other leaders have seen an increase in accidents on and off the base. "Discipline has been worse for me this time," says Sgt. Harripersad.

Once units deploy to Iraq and Afghanistan, the Army-wide shortage of officers and sergeants is felt even more acutely. Teams focused on key jobs, such as reconstruction and Iraq governance, are "woefully undermanned," Col. Bill Hix, a senior Pentagon strategist, recently wrote in the Hoover Digest, a Stanford University policy journal. Multiple internal Army studies have concluded that the military advisory teams, charged with developing Iraqi Army forces so U.S. troops can go home, need to be doubled or tripled in size.

Often, the soldiers who serve on these undermanned teams finish their year-long deployments wondering what they have accomplished. "I would say we're an effective force for good, but we're struggling in a sea of meaningless slaughter -- along with everyone else with a job to do here," says Sgt. Mastin Greene, who serves on a reconstruction team in Baghdad.

Some of the Army's problems are a product of its failure to prepare for a guerrilla fight in which there are no front lines. Just prior to the Iraq war, the Army was buying body armor at such a slow rate that it would have taken 48 years to outfit the entire force. It invested huge sums in the years leading up to Iraq in Humvees with canvas doors that are useless for war today.

"The fact that we had certain grim realities that were inescapable for anyone who wore a uniform in a combat zone just wasn't something that was driving our weapons programming," says Maj. Gen. Stephen Speakes, who oversees equipping Army units. Army officials now say that they entered the war short of about $56 billion of essential equipment.

The Humvee stands as a metaphor for the problems the Army faces. First fielded in the early 1980s, it was designed to ferry soldiers around behind the front lines of a conventional war. In recent years, the vehicle, which troops drive on the streets of Iraq, has been modified countless times. The Army has bolted layers of armor onto it to protect troops from roadside bombs. It has added sophisticated electronic jammers, rotating turrets, bigger machine guns, satellite navigational systems and better radios.

The result is a Humvee that is much better than the version the Army took to Iraq in 2003. But the add-ons have driven up its cost. The modified vehicle is top heavy and tends to tip over at high speeds. Army officials say they can't add more weight without overwhelming the engine or breaking the axle.

"The Army recognizes that the Humvee has reached a limit of our ability to improve it for the current fight," Gen. Speakes says.

What the Army says it really needs is an all-new vehicle, designed to better withstand roadside bombs that have become part of life in Iraq. But such a vehicle likely won't be ready until 2010 or 2012, Army officials say. In the interim, the Army wants to buy something on the commercial market -- South Africa, Turkey and Australia all make alternatives. Yet it's not clear whether the Army, which is struggling to equip the current force, has the money.

The Army has told the Bush administration it needs about $24 billion more to pay its bills in 2007. Some key lawmakers, such as Democratic Sen. Jack Reed of Rhode Island and Republican Sen. John McCain of Arizona, have called for a bigger Army. But there are also pressures to restrain spending.

Covering Shortfalls

To cover cash shortfalls, Army posts around the country this summer laid off janitorial crews, closed swimming pools and didn't cut the grass.

DOJ_NMG_0104188

In the Pentagon, Army generals cut $3 billion in 2005 and 2006 from programs for weapons that are in heavy use in Iraq, such as armored patrol vehicles, trucks, radios and unmanned surveillance planes, according to Army documents. In June, for example, the Army set aside about $50 million to buy more long-range radios, which are used heavily in Iraq. One month later, Army officials, who were short about $1.5 billion to make end-of-year payroll, took the money back. Army brigades are supposed to have about 1,300 radios. Today, the average brigade makes do with about 1,100.

The shortages have been especially hard on the National Guard, which in some states has only about 40% of the authorized equipment for homeland defense missions, says Gen. Speakes.

Active-duty troops preparing to go off to war at bases such as Fort Stewart, Ga., feel the crunch as well. First Sgt. Bradley Feltman, who will leave in January for his second year-long tour in three years, says his troop was short of Humvees to train on and had only 25% of the mounts it needed for its machine guns. The lack of equipment hindered the unit's ability to train as an entire 130-man unit. Instead, they trained one 30-soldier platoon at a time.

"We got training, but not graduate-level training. In a couple of months, my guys are going to be busting down doors, and it will be the first time they see some of their equipment for real," he says.

At Fort Hood, the Third Armored Cavalry Regiment, which returned from Iraq in March and will go back in fall 2007, is already worried about time to prepare. The regiment will spend most of the winter receiving new soldiers, fielding new equipment and learning to use it. The regiment left most of its tanks and Humvees in Iraq for follow-on units.

That means troops won't have much time to train for other critical tasks. Junior leaders need to know everything from how to assess a water plant to the tribal politics of the area where they are deploying, says Lt. Col. Paul Yingling, the unit's deputy commander. They must know enough Arabic to interact with locals.

'Incredibly Frustrating'

"It is incredibly frustrating for combat veterans to return to Iraq for the third time with only minimal training on the skills we know are essential, like language, culture, intelligence and local security force development" Col. Yingling says. "Army units don't fail to train on these tasks because we're stupid or lazy; we fail because we don't have the time to do it right."

What kind of Army emerges from its searing experience in Iraq will depend, in part, on how long the U.S. stays there and the foreign-policy goals that civilian leaders set in its aftermath. President Bush has said that the best way to protect the nation is to spread democracy. The experience in Iraq demonstrates that such a strategy requires a bigger Army that is more skilled in tasks such as building indigenous forces, fostering local government and economic development. "Revolutionary approaches require a lot of resources," says Conrad Crane, the lead author of the Army's new counterinsurgency doctrine.

A less-ambitious foreign policy that seeks to promote stability and preserve the status quo could reduce the pressure to build a bigger Army with a broader array of skills.

The other big variable is how the Army -- particularly officers now in their 20s and 30s -- reacts to the traumatic experience in Iraq. "We as an Army tend to learn generationally," says Col. Michael Meese, who heads the department of social sciences at the U.S. Military Academy at West Point.

Today's four-star generals, who joined the service in the early 1970s, spent most of their careers rebuilding an Army that had been badly damaged by Vietnam. Officers who came of age in the 1980s and are now colonels and generals were shaped by the Cold War. Their focus was on how to defeat a Soviet-style army.

Today's younger officers, whose defining experiences have been in Iraq and Afghanistan, see the world differently. The gulf was clear last month in their reaction to the dismissal of Defense Secretary Donald Rumsfeld. Many senior officers quietly celebrated his departure. Like the retired generals who earlier this year called for Mr. Rumsfeld to be fired, they placed the blame for the Army's failures in Iraq largely on his shoulders.

Junior officers were more indifferent. They tended to view Mr. Rumsfeld as "part of a larger problem that hasn't been solved yet," says Kalev Sepp, a former Special Forces officer who worked extensively in Iraq. Among many of these officers, there is great frustration not just with the defense secretary but also with the generals who serve above them.

"Junior officers know that success in these wars is about a lot more than killing the enemy. It depends on providing security for the people, finding friends and fixing infrastructure," says Maj. John Prior, who served as a company commander in Baghdad. "A lot of senior officers just don't get it."

While the Army's new draft counterinsurgency doctrine sounds these same themes, senior commanders in Iraq have been slow to embrace them. The doctrine says troops must live among the Iraqi people, on small bases run by junior leaders. But since 2004, commanders have consolidated U.S. troops on 55 large fortified bases, down from about 110 a year ago.

The new doctrine says that when battling an insurgency, reconstruction dollars are as important as ammunition. In recent months, though, more restrictions have been placed on how junior leaders can spend money in their sectors. "What's funny is that all politics and services are local, so the [junior] commanders need the greatest flexibility" said Brig. Gen. Ed Cardon, who returned from Iraq this year, in an interview compiled by the Army for its oral-history archives. "Why don't we just trust the commander who said he spent $100?"

Some question how quickly the Army will be able to shift its thinking. "All our organizations are designed around the least important line of operations in these fights -- combat operations," says Col. Yingling. "If you spend your whole career in tanks, you tend to see the solution to every problem as a tank."

CORPORATE SCANDALS:

Former Aides To Congress Switch Sides For Upcoming Probes (WP)

By Jeffrey H. Birnbaum

The Washington Post, December 11, 2006

Deee-fense, Deee-fense Deee-fense.

You can almost hear the chant rising from corporate offices all over town. As soon as Democrats take over Congress next month, all sorts of businesses will no doubt face sharp-elbowed congressional hearings called O & I -- oversight and investigations. And they'll need a strong defense.

Luckily for corporate America, many of the people who formerly conducted those nasty and frequently televised inquiries have switched sides and are available for hire to the highest bidders. For the right fee, a company can retain a former chief counsel to almost any of the most marauding committees on Capitol Hill.

Think of it as a cottage industry, and a very large cottage at that.

So many inquisitions are about to be begun by the Democrats newly in charge that dozens of law and PR firms are bulking up with former insiders to cash in on all the trouble those hearings will create. Companies that were harassed in the past by smart young government lawyers have lately been buying the services of those same young lawyers, now in the private sector, for protection from their successors.

"A lot of companies are reaching out to law firms and lobbying shops because they're nervous about what's ahead," said Mark R. Paoletta, chief counsel for oversight and investigations at the House Energy and Commerce Committee. The business of cushioning the blow from congressional inquiries is expected to grow enormously because "Democrats are going to be very, very active," he said.

Certainly he hopes so. Paoletta, 44, is reversing allegiances in January. He has been hired by the law firm Dickstein Shapiro to specialize in guiding clients through congressional investigations -- the same kinds of investigations he's directed for the past nine years. Andrew L. Snowdon, an oversight and investigations counsel for the same committee, is also headed to Dickstein Shapiro.

Why the big turnabout? "I have four kids," Paoletta said. His oldest, he said, attends a private high school that costs $26,000 a year. Of his current post, he said, "I don't think there's a better job in the world." But corporations on the griddle need representation too, and they pay better.

So much better, in fact, that just about every company on K Street is vying for a piece of the soon-to-thrive "crisis management" business. The law firm Holland & Knight is flogging its newly formed Congressional Investigations Response Team. Promotional literature highlights the many former insiders now eager to assist their former nemeses: "Our ranks include two former Members of Congress, a former Minority Chief Counsel to the Senate Government Affairs Committee, a former Rules Committee Counsel, a former Chief of Staff for the House Republican Conference, and a former Chief of Staff to the Attorney General, among others."

Two former aides to the House's Government Reform Committee are also forming a partnership partly in hopes of attracting clients who want to know how to defeat the kinds of investigations they once managed. Barbara J. Comstock and Mark Corallo are setting out on their new venture because, Comstock said, "it helps to know the history of the committee, its subpoena power."

The Carmen Group, a lobbying firm, is building a government investigations division and has allied itself with one of the top names in congressional oversight: Franklin Silbey. He led the Senate Judiciary Committee's oversight subcommittee and was chief of investigations for the Senate Labor Committee. "The group will start as four people and we expect it will get larger," said David M. Carmen, president of the firm.

Public relations companies are also getting into the act. Dittus Communications and Public Strategies are hunting for clients who think they are about to be pounced upon. There ought to be a lot of clients around. "It doesn't take a decoder ring to figure out what the broad focus of the investigations will be," said Jeff Eller, Public Strategies' president. Among the many corporations that should expect a congressional onslaught, he said, are oil and drug companies, contractors to the Pentagon and the Homeland Security Department, hedge funds and any firm that produces anything that contributes to global warming, including electric utilities and auto manufacturers.

Not surprisingly -- but probably with good reason -- Eller recommends that companies that even suspect they're in jeopardy should take precautions. "If you have exposure today and you're likely going to get scrutiny by one or more committees, the best thing a company can do is prepare for that now," he said.

Advice varies widely among consultants about how best to approach an impending congressional investigation. Some say it's wise to hand over as much information as possible. Others say that would be the worst decision of all. Everyone agrees that oversight hearings are a very peculiar beast that require legal smarts, legislative insight and a keen attention to public perception.

"I've seen over and over again clients making the mistake of failing to appreciate the unique nature of this process," said Steven R. Ross, a partner at Akin Gump Strauss Hauer Feld and a former general counsel for the House. "People try to treat it as a pure litigation battle or as a lobbying exercise. In fact, it is a blend of the two."

Humility is also a good idea. When testifying before Congress, said former representative Gerry Sikorski (D-Minn.), now with Holland & Knight, "you are not a big-time, hot-shot CEO of a multibillion-dollar corporation. You are an American citizen, under oath and with limited rights, providing information to the U.S. Congress under their roof, rules and procedures."

Some targets also take the proceedings too lightly, which is a serious error, experts agree. "I've become more and more conservative with these things over the years," said Stanley M. Brand, head of the Brand Law Group and a veteran of such encounters. "My advice is to batten down the hatches, assert your rights if you have them, and don't go in and disgorge documents. These investigations are stalking horses for the Justice Department."

Comstock disagrees somewhat, preferring wide disclosure over secrecy. "If you do have some bad news or bad information, get it out yourself, on your own terms and explain it," she said.

Eller thinks flexibility is a key. For example, he prefers that his clients under congressional scrutiny say that they are "working with" the committee; he advises against using the word "cooperate." The former allows the client to withhold some information when necessary and not run afoul of the truth.

Boring is also better when it comes to O & I. Indeed, in a proceeding that's so public, targets would rather go unnoticed. That was certainly the case when a lawmaker-turned-lobbyist physically restrained a chief executive from standing in front of a picture of a crumpled car when news photographers were nearby during a hearing about roadway accidents.

Sometimes a good defense is a vigorous offense.Lobbyists' Holiday Cheer

Again, it's that time of year. Please e-mail examples of pro bono lobbying that you've done or that you know about for a special holiday column. Send examples early and often, and no later than this week, please. Thanks and cheers!

CRIMINAL LAW:

Death Penalty Cases Bunch Up In Brooklyn (NEWSDAY)

By ANTHONY M. DESTEFANO, NEWSDAY STAFF WRITER

Newsday, December 11, 2006

This is the season for the death penalty in Brooklyn federal court.

There have been no capital punishment trials in the federal court on Cadman Plaza East since 2003. But now three such cases are under way, and a fourth is expected to commence late next year.

"It looks like death is rampant in Brooklyn," said Ephraim Savitt, who is defending one of the cases involving Ronell Wilson, 24, who is charged with murdering two police officers.

Monday, jurors will continue to hear testimony in Wilson's trial for the March 2003 murders of undercover detectives Rodney Andrews, 34, and James Nemorin, 36.

In another courtroom, the jury selection process is expected to finish in the case of accused drug racketeer and murderer Kenneth McGriff, 46, whose trial is slated for January.

Next week, another jury begins grappling with whether to execute Martin Aguilar, after convicting him last week of murder for hire. Aguilar, 33, was convicted of killing Jose Fernandez in 2002 and dumping his body in a storm drain at historic Green-Wood Cemetery in Brooklyn. If the jury decides not to execute Aguilar, he will get life in prison.

Also, pretrial hearings are scheduled for Monday in the case of Guyanese immigrants Richard James and Ronald Malley, who face the death penalty in a trial slated for next year . They are accused of killing people in an insurance scam.

Savitt said he believes the spate of capital cases in Brooklyn is a logical result of aggressive decisions by the Department of Justice in recent years to seek the death penalty.

"The overall picture is the maturation of death penalty cases that have increased in the current administration," said Savitt, of Manhattan.

Before he left office in late 2004, former U.S. Attorney General John Ashcroft overruled his prosecutors on at least 42 of 128 capital defendants and recommended seeking the death penalty, according to published reports.

After the U.S. Supreme Court declared the federal death penalty law unconstitutional in 1972, Congress made changes and in 1994 passed a newer capital punishment law. The statute allows executions for certain federal crimes such as murder for hire and the killing of a witness. (New York's state death penalty law was nullified by the Court of Appeals in 2004).

Only three federal death penalty defendants have been executed since the 1994, including Oklahoma City bomber Timothy McVeigh in 2001. The last death case in Brooklyn federal court occurred in December 2003 when Emile Dixon was convicted of murder and drug dealing. But three days before Christmas, the jury gave him life in prison.

The judge in that case was Judge Raymond Dearie, a former federal prosecutor who is presiding over the Aguilar case. Dearie's courtroom demeanor and statements have telegraphed an apparent dislike for capital punishment to some courtroom observers and attorneys.

Claire Hogenauer, an attorney and anti-death penalty advocate, said when Dearie charged the jury in the Dixon case, he stressed that the decision to execute somebody had to be an individual one for each juror.

"I will never forget the charge," said Hogenauer, who has attended vigils for five executions around the country.

The Aguilar case jurors will begin hearing death penalty evidence -- both for and against -- next Monday. They will break for Christmas week and resume after New Year's.

In Wilson's case, the trial has about two more weeks to go until the jury decides whether he is guilty of killing Nemorin and Andrews. If Wilson is convicted, the jury will then begin deciding whether he faces execution.

McGriff's actual trial is slated to get under way in early January. Convicted once before for drug offenses, McGriff is now being tried for killing two people in murder-for-hire schemes.

More cases are in the works. U.S. Attorney General Alberto Gonzales is now considering whether reputed Bonanno crime family captain Vincent Basciano should face the death penalty for a 1999 mob murder.

Lawmakers Want Probe Of Legal Billings At Amtrak (WSJ)

By Nathan Koppel

DOJ_NMG_0104192

Wall Street Journal, December 11, 2006

Two congressmen have asked the Justice Department to look into Amtrak's use of outside legal counsel.

In a Dec. 4 letter to Attorney General Alberto Gonzales, Rep. Don Young (R., Alaska) and Rep. John Mica (R., Fla.) complain that the federally subsidized railroad hasn't received fair and reasonable value for fees it has paid to law firms.

"We urge you to conduct an investigation...and take appropriate action," they wrote. Mr. Young is chairman of the House Committee on Transportation & Infrastructure; Mr. Mica recently was chosen to serve as the top-ranking Republican member of the committee when the 110th Congress convenes.

The letter follows two recent public reports that concluded some of Amtrak's outside law firms engaged in sloppy billing practices, in violation of the railroad's internal billing guidelines.

Amtrak spokesman Cliff Black said: "We don't believe the allegations related to Amtrak's use of outside counsel have merit or that they warrant review by the Justice Department, but we stand ready to cooperate and provide information as it is requested." Earlier this year, Amtrak indicated that it had worked to improve its oversight of legal fees.

An October report, issued jointly by Amtrak's Office of Inspector General and the Department of Transportation's inspector general, concluded that law firms had, among other things, engaged in "block billing" in which they lumped tasks under one entry of an invoice, rather than itemizing the cost of each task. Block billing is prohibited by Amtrak, according to the report. According to the October report, from 2002 to 2005, Amtrak spent more than $100 million on outside lawyers.

Separately, in a Nov. 17 letter to Amtrak's inspector general, Messrs. Young and Mica raised concern about Amtrak bills submitted by the law firm Manatt, Phelps & Phillips LLP.

A Manatt spokesman said: "The billing was entirely proper. The client understands that some time entries were subdivided to facilitate accuracy and review."

Amtrak's Mr. Black declined to comment on the Nov. 17 letter. A Justice Department spokeswoman declined to comment.

Airport's Contracts Still Under Federal Scrutiny (PHI)

By John Shiffman

The Philadelphia Inquirer, December 11, 2006

Retail at Philadelphia International Airport may have entered a gilded age, but federal agents continue to investigate suspected pay-to-play corruption there.

The current FBI and IRS investigation is related to minority business contracts held by airport shops, people familiar with the matter said.

Since 2004, there have been three rounds of indictments related to airport contracts - about concessions, advertising and maintenance.

The latest charges came last month when Mayor Street's brother, Milton, was indicted on fraud and corruption charges for an allegedly sham consulting contract for airport maintenance.

"The investigation at the airport continues," U.S. Attorney Patrick L. Meehan said during the news conference announcing the indictment. He did not elaborate.

During its wide-ranging City Hall corruption probe, the FBI placed wiretaps on the phones of power broker Ronald A. White and senior airport official James Tyrrell. White was charged with corruption, some of it related to airport concessions, but he died before trial. Tyrrell has not been charged with any wrongdoing.

The focus of the investigation is the federal program designed to help disadvantaged business owners - minorities, women and the disabled - get a fair share of airport contracts. Rich minorities with political connections have abused the program here and at other airports.

In some cases, the minorities have lent little more than their name, ethnic status and political sway - and have done little work. As examples, authorities cite the Milton Street situation and a soda contract won by White's mistress, Janice Knight. According to court testimony, Knight did little more than serve as the middle man for an airport vendor, simply faxing invoices back and forth.

Some Made Men Struggle To Make Ends Meet (NYT)

By William K. Rashbaum

The New York Times, December 10, 2006

Richard Martino, a slender 47-year-old, favors Prada shoes and until recently drove a sleek black Mercedes-Benz. He has owned multimillion-dollar homes in Harrison and Southampton, N.Y. He spent much of the last decade running a telecommunications and Internet business to which his expertise helped bring in hundreds of millions of dollars. By one accounting, he made tens of millions for himself.

John Setaro, 57, did not finish high school, and has worked recently managing a fast-food restaurant in Seaford on Long Island. He generally wears neat but casual clothes, and lives in a modest, vinyl-sided, colonial-style house in Franklin Square. During a difficult period several years ago, according to his lawyer, he was making $2,400 a month.

But the two men nonetheless share an extraordinary bond, according to federal authorities: Both swore an oath to the Gambino crime family in a secret induction ceremony.

The striking disparities underscore a simple truth not always understood outside the ranks of the city's five crime families: Some mobsters reap millions from rackets, and in some cases from legitimate enterprises, but many struggle to maintain a middle-class existence, and some are routinely broke. The impoverished gangster barely eking out a living is so commonplace that mobsters have a word for these poorer men of honor: brokesters.

The archetypal Hollywood image of a wiseguy with prodigious appetites, swaggering in a finely tailored suit with a diamond pinkie ring and a fat roll of 50s, conceals the more nuanced reality of mob economics, according to some prosecutors, federal agents, organized-crime experts and a few mobsters. Crime figures are not immune to ordinary financial burdens and woes, like struggling to make car payments and finding money for groceries.

No self-respecting mobster wants to be seen as a brokester — nor would he want his peers to think he struggles to keep up with his middle-class suburban neighbors. But the pressure is great as well to keep up appearances as a successful criminal. Mobsters have even been known to borrow money from loan sharks to throw it around on the street — and to pass it up as tribute to superiors — while at the same time scrimping in the privacy of their home.

"The hours are long, there is no benefits package, there is a high risk of prosecution, and very little job security," said Gerald L. Shargel, a lawyer who has represented a number of mobsters, rich and poor, including several members of the Gotti clan.

By most accounts, mobsters fall into two types, earners and shooters, a division in some measure between the rich and those who wish they were. An earner is a man who can scheme and develop strategies, quickly deciphering the complexities of industry and commerce and labor. He is also someone who can sit down and blend in effortlessly with legitimate businessmen — often big businessmen — and union leaders.

Mr. Martino is an earner, according to federal prosecutors in Brooklyn. His work in an Internet pornography and a phone-cramming scheme was a boon to the Gambinos, netting hundreds of millions by billing people for "free tours" on pornographic Web sites and adding small charges to hundreds of thousands of telephone bills nationwide.

In September, he started serving a nine-year prison term after pleading guilty to wire fraud conspiracy and extortion in the scheme.

Pete Savino, a Genovese family associate, is also said to be an earner. He had a window installation business and was the mastermind of a scheme in the late 1980s and early '90s to earn millions for four mob families by billing the New York City Housing Authority for a few extra dollars on every one of the millions of thermal-pane windows being installed in the authority's buildings.

A shooter is, well, a shooter. A leg-breaker. A killer. Someone who can readily and rapidly use violence as a business practice.

Mr. Setaro's role in the mob division of labor seems clear. He is firmly ensconced in the mob's middle class, according to court papers and interviews with law enforcement officials.

According to an F.B.I. source cited in a report from 2000, Mr. Setaro, in a conversation about how he hated working as a bookmaker, said that "if he is ever going to jail it is going to be for what he really is, 'a shylock and a tough guy,' " referring to his work as a loan shark and a debt collector.

DOJ_NMG_0104194

His prediction seems to have been accurate. He served 41 months for extortion.

James Tartaglione, a onetime Bonanno family captain who became a government witness in 2003 and has testified against fellow mobsters in several recent trials, explained the distinction to a jury in 2004.

"There's people that go out there, just have a knack for earning money," Mr. Tartaglione said at the trial of Bonanno boss Joseph Massino, an earner in his own right who was forced to give up more than $9 million in ill-gotten gains after he was convicted of murder and racketeering, and then agreed to cooperate with prosecutors. "They know how to put businesses together, and they are just good at what they do, as far as business. Then you got those tough guys that could go out and kill somebody and do whatever they have to do."

It is not easy to gauge the real net worth or earning capacity of an organized-crime figure. Most are constantly scheming to hide their assets and income — and not only from taxing authorities and federal prosecutors eager to seize them.

They often deceive their own crime families about schemes that are "off the books" and unknown to their superiors.

In New York's crime families, money generally flows up, from associates to soldiers to their captains to the administration and ultimately to the family's boss. But few procedures are set in stone.

The families do not have auditors. They rely on harsh punishment as a deterrent. In many mob murders, the victims were killed because they failed to pay tribute, or so the bosses thought, according to prosecutors and investigators.

Organized crime has many rules. Drug-dealing and prostitution are taboo; one cannot strike a fellow made man, or sleep with his wife or daughters; soldiers cannot borrow from a loan shark without approval; killing a boss is forbidden. But these rules are for people who revel in breaking rules.

Money flows into organized-crime families from almost as many sources as there are schemes in the heads of mobsters, from traditional staples like loan sharking, gambling, labor racketeering, cargo theft and bank robbery to skimming from industries that the mob once controlled and still influences in some cases: garbage hauling, construction, the piers, the garment district and the commercial linen business. Modern innovations include stock manipulation, Internet fraud, identity theft, health care schemes and everything from importing contaminated fish to counterfeiting designer blue jeans.

"There is no generally accepted percentage" that gets passed up, says Mark Feldman, who was in charge of the Organized Crime Section in the Brooklyn United States attorney's office for a decade. "It's a sliding scale driven by the particular greed and need and mentality of the particular individuals who control it."

In the early 1990s, when John Gotti was at the height of his power as the boss of the Gambino family, his 20 captains each handed up $3,000 for him at Christmastime, far less than the $10,000 demanded by his predecessor, Paul Castellano.

Joseph DeFede, who served as the acting boss of the Luchese family from 1994 until 1998, required that $1,000 from each soldier be passed into the family coffers each year. Much of that money went into a fund called the Well, to pay for lawyers' fees, to use for loan sharking and to finance other schemes, according to Mr. DeFede, a gravel-voiced 72-year-old who became a government witness in 2001.

He testified at a 2003 trial that he made about $1.14 million during the four years he served as acting boss and that the organization brought in $6 million, in a stretch of hard times for the crime family that prosecutors say continues.

Since Vincent Basciano, a former acting boss of the Bonanno family, was convicted of racketeering earlier this year, federal prosecutors have sought to seize $11.4 million from him, citing profits they say he has made over two decades, including $5.2 million from gambling operations, $6 million from joker poker and $200,000 passed up to him as tribute in 2004 alone.

Mr. Basciano, who took over the family after Mr. Massino's conviction in 2004, revealed his thinking about the division of lucre and labor in a conversation he had just before Christmas 2003. A captain at the time, he was speaking with Anthony Urso, then the family's acting boss, and Mr. Tartaglione, who was secretly cooperating with prosecutors and wearing a wire.

"Like I told Tony at Christmastime, I'm not taxing any of the guys that are doing the work," Mr. Basciano said, meaning the shooters. Let the earners put up the money, he said.

Mr. Tartaglione underscored the idea that it takes people with different skills to keep the family strong. "You need a lot of different things in the pot to make a good soup," he said.

Inveterate brokesters are a different matter. Few would argue they are a necessary ingredient in any recipe. This colorful cast of crime figures sometimes leaves prosecutors and investigators, not to mention defense lawyers, shaking their heads.

DOJ_NMG_0104195

Carmine Russo and Elio Albanese are two such men, according to interviews with law enforcement officials and defense lawyers. Identified by prosecutors as soldiers in the Genovese family, the two were part of a loose-knit but active bank robbery crew in the 1980s and 90s that pulled off several high-profile heists, according to federal authorities. Mr. Russo most recently pleaded guilty to plotting to rob the payroll of a New York Times printing plant in Queens and was sentenced to 57 months in federal prison.

Mr. Russo, known as Baby Carmine, lived with his mother at the foot of Mulberry Street until she died. He and Mr. Albanese, known as Chinatown, often seemed down on their luck, according to investigators who tracked them over the years. As a rule, they quickly burned through their money and often found themselves hustling and lounging along Mulberry Street.

They found ways to scrape by. In the weeks leading up to the Fourth of July, the two men could be seen from the windows in the rear of the criminal court building in Lower Manhattan, selling fireworks by the case to people in cars who pulled up on Mulberry below Canal Street.

Mr. Russo was released from federal prison in January. A person who knows him says he had been selling plastic bags at the Fulton Fish Market before it moved and was now hoping to open a small business in his Chinatown neighborhood.

His sentence included a $7,500 fine. He has been paying it off in monthly increments of $50 or $60.

Is A Serial Killer Stalking Students? (AP)

AP, December 11, 2006

Vanishing students. Dead bodies. Fears something sinister is lurking in the shadows.

A string of college student drownings across the Midwest has all the makings of great mystery. Or does it?

Rumors have persisted for years that a serial killer is prowling Interstate 94, hunting young men in college bars and plunging them underwater. Investigators, though, say there's no evidence of foul play. They say the victims were so drunk they fell in the river and died.

Not so fast, says criminologist Douglas Gilbertson.

An assistant criminology professor at St. Cloud State University, Gilbertson has spent most of the past year researching the drownings. He completed a study this spring he believes shows patterns that indicate some of the cases could be murders -- and could be linked.

"We definitely do have some cases that are just not accidents. When you fill in the patterns that are coming out, that's the next logical step," Gilbertson said.

St. Cloud police Chief Dennis Ballantine, whose department investigated the drowning death of a St. Cloud State student this spring and concluded it was an accident, called Gilbertson's study a collection of coincidences.

"It would make a great TV drama, but there's no evidence to support it," Ballantine said. "The only common denominator I'm aware of is young people, alcohol and water."

According to Gilbertson's study, more than 20 college-age men from Minnesota to Ohio have drowned after disappearing from a bar or party since 1997. One of the hot spots is La Crosse, Wis., which sits on the Mississippi River and is home to three colleges. Eight college-age men have turned up dead in area rivers after vanishing from bars in the last eight years. Police have ruled the deaths accidental.

The St. Cloud area has seen cases, too. In 2002, St. John's University student Josh Guimond disappeared after leaving a party in Collegeville. This past spring 21-year-old St. Cloud State student Scot Radel disappeared after leaving a downtown bar. His body was later found in the Mississippi River.

In 2004 La Crosse police called a town meeting to allay that city's fears, but ended up getting heckled by people who insisted a killer was on the loose. And talk of a possible killer is everywhere on the Internet.

The killer theory got a boost this fall when Minneapolis police abruptly changed course in University of Minnesota student Chris Jenkins' death. Jenkins vanished from a downtown bar on Halloween 2002 and turned up dead along the Mississippi.

Investigators originally ruled Jenkins' death an accident or suicide, but reclassified it a homicide in November.

The about-face caused other investigators to re-examine their conclusions, but so far no links to Jenkins have emerged. Police in La Crosse have asked the FBI to recheck their findings in the drownings, however.

DOJ_NMG_0104196

La Crosse police Lt. Bob Berndt said he's aware of Gilbertson's study, but his department stands behind its conclusions.

"As police officers we have to deal with the facts," he said.

The Mississippi River divides St. Cloud, a city of about 61,000 people on the wooded plains about an hour and 20 minutes northwest of Minneapolis. Just as in La Crosse, the downtown bar district sits less than three blocks from the river.

Radel's death spurred Gilbertson to dig deeper into the drownings. He and two graduate students scoured the Internet, newspaper stories and police reports. They found 22 victims who went to college within 50 miles of I-94 between Moorhead, Minn., and East Lansing, Mich.

The victims fit a profile: white or Asian men in their early 20s, generally around 5-foot-8 and 165 pounds and athletic, with good grades. No victims were women.

They also found nearly 94 percent of the drownings took place within 100 miles of I-94. Nearly 82 percent of the drownings occurred during the first two weeks of the month, and three-quarters of the disappearance occurred when the moon was less than half-full.

Gilbertson said he can't judge some cases because he doesn't have enough information. He also acknowledges some are accidental. But others could be murders.

If the drownings were all random, there should be greater racial and academic diversity among the victims and they should be scattered all over the map, Gilbertson said.

The moonlight factor could support accidents because drunks would have less light to stumble around in, Gilbertson said. But it also could support a killer operating when darkness is deepest.

Amanda Presenger, one of the students who worked on the study, said the findings support the idea of a killer who travels the Midwest, perhaps for business.

"He's traveling back and forth, maybe at certain times of the month or certain times of the year. Maybe he travels closer to the beginning of the month for his job," said Presenger, 26, of Thunder Bay, Ont.

But for every reason to think a killer is at work, there's a counterpoint.

In 2004, weeks after University of Wisconsin-La Crosse wrestler Jared Dion was found dead in the Mississippi, two professors wrote a letter to students arguing the drownings are accidents.

The leading cause of death for young men is accidents; males between the ages of 15-24 have a drowning rate 10 times higher than females, according to the National Safety Council; and 40 percent of males in college binge drink, wrote then-psychology chair Betsy Morgan and sociology chair Kim Vogt.

"It is often harder to accept explanations that hit close to home -- explanations that involve actions we ourselves have engaged in that put us at risk, "the two professors wrote.

St. Cloud State spokeswoman Marge Proell said the university stands behind Gilbertson's research.

"It's a real good thinking piece, a starting place for taking a look at a problem," she said.

Allan Radel, Scot Radel's father, said he hasn't seen Gilbertson's findings. He thinks his son escaped from someone who had him in a car and meant to rob him. Footprints show Scot tumbled down an embankment to the Mississippi as he was running, headed across the frozen river and fell into open water.

"We do not believe Scot was murdered," Radel, of Owatonna, Minn., said. "We believe our son would be alive today if he hadn't been overserved with alcohol and if he hadn't been alone."

Gilbertson isn't giving up. He's still working on patterns in the drownings, and over Christmas he plans to travel from New York to Minnesota to pinpoint the drownings' exact locations.

"Additional research is necessary," Gilbertson wrote in the study, "and I am hard on its trail."

The Foley Report (WSJ)

The Wall Street Journal, December 11, 2006

Charges of GOP malfeasance helped Democrats in last month's elections, especially those Mark Foley electronic messages to a former Congressional page that became an October sensation. So it's worth noting that the House Ethics Committee report on the episode that was released last Friday concluded with a whimper.

DOJ_NMG_0104197

The bipartisan investigation found no evidence of any attempt to cover up Mr. Foley's communications with pages, despite the partisan and media allegations. Instead, the report confirms what was already well known, which is that GOP Members and staff had warned Mr. Foley about being too friendly with pages but should have been more assertive in blocking the gay Congressman from fraternizing with teenage boys. It found no violation of any House rules and recommended no disciplinary action.

The Committee's conclusions have been criticized as weak in some circles, but this is mostly from the same crowd that had shouted "coverup" without any evidence. The 89-page report sorts with care through the various sworn testimony about who knew what and when, and seems fair and sensible in meting out judgments. It also found no evidence that staff or Members knew about the more sexually explicit "instant messages" to a former page until they triggered Mr. Foley's resignation.

This is worth recalling given the hysterical calls from the right and left at the time for Mr. Hastert's resignation. The Speaker's main failing was putting too much confidence in his senior staff, especially counsel Ted Van Der Meid and Chief of Staff Scott Palmer, who failed to confront Mr. Foley or bring the matter to their boss's attention with enough urgency.

Their motives, the report speculates, might have been narrowly political to protect a GOP Member or because "some may have been concerned that raising the issue too aggressively might have risked exposing Rep. Foley's homosexuality." Whatever their reasons, their failure created an opportunity for Democrats to leak the emails to the press and create the firestorm that dominated the news at a crucial point in the fall campaign.

CIVIL RIGHTS:

Troubled Prisons Push California To Seek A New Approach (NYT)

By Jennifer Steinhauer

The New York Times, December 11, 2006

LOS ANGELES, Dec. 10 — By nearly every measure, the California prison system is the most troubled in the nation. Overcrowding, inmate violence, recidivism, parole absconders and the prison medical system are among its many festering problems.

Now, with the November election behind them, Gov. Arnold Schwarzenegger and state lawmakers from both parties say the time is ripe for the first major overhaul of the system since the 1970s.

Mr. Schwarzenegger, a Republican who easily won re-election, recently took the extraordinary step of declaring a state of emergency in the prison system, a move generally reserved for areas hit by natural disasters.

James E. Tilton, appointed in September by Mr. Schwarzenegger as the secretary of the Department of Corrections and Rehabilitation, described the prison system as a “powder keg” at risk of exploding.

“If you look at the characteristics of other states that have riots, we have an environment that is rife with the same,” said Mr. Tilton, who had been the acting secretary since April.

The creation of new prisons seems likely, but the governor and lawmakers are also seriously contemplating broad changes to the parole system and the establishment of a sentencing guidelines commission — anathema to some just a year ago — like those used by other states to reduce overcrowding and its costs.

“The November election is over, and that is critical in terms of the politics of prison reform,” said the State Senate majority leader, Gloria Romero, Democrat of Los Angeles. “The governor is particularly looking at his legacy, and I do not believe he can have a positive one if he does not solve the prison crisis.”

Overcrowding is so severe that 16,000 inmates are assigned cots in hallways and gyms; last month, the state began asking for volunteers to be moved to prisons out of state.

The system’s medical program is in federal receivership and much of the rest of the system is under court monitoring. Cellblocks are teeming with violence. Seven of 10 inmates released from prison return, one of the highest rates in the country.

The state has the largest number of parole absconders, roughly 20 percent. Life for corrections officers has become so miserable, their union says, that there are nearly 4,000 vacancies. In May, just after Mr. Tilton started work, a corrections officer was held hostage for 10 hours by an inmate with a knife to her throat.

DOJ_NMG_0104198

Like so many things in California, the scope of the prison problem stems largely from its size. The system houses 173,000 inmates — second-place Texas has 152,500 — and has an $8 billion budget.

Its population explosion is in large part an outgrowth of a general increase in the state's population, its unusual sentencing structure and parole system, a legislature historically enamored with increasing penalties, and ballot measures like the three-strikes initiative.

Further, most rehabilitation programs have been eliminated from the system in recent years, which some criminal justice experts believe has increased the rate of recidivism. Some experts also argue that a legislature bound by term limits has created an expertise vacuum on the complex and emotional issue of prison sentencing.

Under laws passed in the 1970s, ironclad sentences for crimes are set by the legislature, with little discretion left to judges. Looked at simply, people sentenced to prison for three years get out in three years, whether they have behaved, gone to school or stared at the wall.

Once out, prisoners are assigned to parole and can be sent back to prison for automatic sentences for technical or criminal violations.

"All of these things lead to this incredible overcrowded prison system," said Barry Krisberg, president of the National Council on Crime and Delinquency.

Changes to the system have been akin to peace in the Middle East — everyone agrees on the outcome, but there has been great debate over its path.

The corrections officers union, among the state's most powerful, has been historically resistant to reducing the prison population. Conservative lawmakers and the governor have resisted any change that smacks of sentence reduction, and their liberal counterparts have been loath to be tarred as soft on crime.

But a consensus has been building over the last six months, with union officials, the governor, public policy experts and many members of the legislature agreeing that a sentencing commission is in order.

Sentencing commissions, made up of a diverse group of experts including former judges and crime victim advocates, essentially treat prison beds as scarce resources that need to be properly allocated.

Used in many states, the commissions, armed with empirical data, establish sentencing grids, with the offense on one axis and the offender's history on another, forming a narrow range of possible sentences.

These grids are presented to judges, who have discretion to go outside the range in light of extenuating circumstances. One of the system's greatest advantages, its proponents suggest, is that it depoliticizes sentencing by taking it out of the hands of elected officials.

Under a sentencing commission, a parole system can also be altered, placing, for instance, violent offenders under intense supervision after their release, and offering nonviolent offenders a chance at early parole.

"The way our current system works, all you have is sticks," said Joan Petersilia, director of the new Center for Evidence-Based Corrections at the University of California, Irvine, and one of the state's leading experts on prisons.

"But we want to give carrots, too," Professor Petersilia said. "If in fact you can show us stable housing and drug treatment program for six months, you are off parole. The benefit of that is self-selection. Inmates who are low risk and who are motivated will do it, and then we reduce caseload size and let officers target very violent offenders."

The best commissions, criminal justice experts agree, are those in which violent criminals spend more time behind bars than they did before the commission's creation, and nonviolent offenders are placed in treatment programs, county jails or other alternatives, paid for in part by the savings accrued from not having them in prison.

Mr. Tilton said that in addition to such a commission, the system would require more prison beds, so prisoners would not be housed in gyms and classrooms and those areas could be used once again for programs to prepare offenders for life outside prison.

These changes have the support of the California Correctional Peace Officers Association, which has regarded the governor warily.

"I am tired of my profession being categorized as a failure when our success is judged on the success of people who everyone else failed with," said Lance Corcoran, a spokesman for the association.

DOJ_NMG_0104199

Not everyone is convinced. "If sentencing commission is a code word for shortening terms, I am against it," said George Runner, the State Senate Republican caucus chairman. "It is an interesting discussion, but it cannot be had until we create more beds and have a parole re-entry program that works."

The California District Attorneys Association also regards sentencing commissions with suspicion and will not support a law that does not increase sentences for some offenders.

Those who think a sentencing commission is an antonym for law and order "should look carefully at the statistics in a state like North Carolina," said Tom Ross, the former chairman of that state's sentencing commission, widely regarded as one of the most successful in the nation.

"Violent and career offenders serve nearly twice as much time as they did before the commission," Mr. Ross said, while low-level offenders are sent elsewhere. "What it resulted in here was a substantial reduction in the incarceration rate."

The Road To Reliable Elections (NYT)

The New York Times, December 11, 2006

Two influential federal advisory groups have added their voices to an emerging national consensus that voting machines must produce a voter-verified paper record if they are to be trusted. One of those groups, the one dominated not by scientists but by election officials, was more grudging than it should have been. But their analyses should give further support to members of Congress who plan to push next month for a strong federal law requiring voter-verified paper records.

More than half of the states now have laws requiring electronic voting machines to produce paper records that voters can review to ensure that their votes were correctly recorded. Voters understand that without this paper, there is no way of knowing if the software registered their choices incorrectly, either by accident or by design.

The National Institute of Standards and Technology, an agency that promotes good standards in everything from medical devices to smoke detectors, recently concluded that paperless electronic voting is unacceptable. The agency's scientists said that for electronic voting to be trustworthy, it must be "software independent," meaning there has to be a means apart from the machines' own software to prove that the vote tallies are correct.

The obvious way to do this is a voter-verified paper record. The institute allowed that there could be other ways, like a video or audio record of votes cast, but those technologies remain unproven.

NIST's report went to the technical guidelines committee of the Election Assistance Commission, the federal agency created after the 2000 meltdown to help improve elections. The guidelines committee voted down a resolution recommending that electronic voting be used only if the results are independently verifiable. Instead, it affirmed the need for paper trails or other independent verification going forward, but recommended giving a pass to localities already using flawed machines.

It is unfortunate that the stronger resolution did not pass. There is no excuse for sticking with unreliable voting machines. The guidelines committee has too many election officials on it, a group who often put their own convenience — and their desire not to be embarrassed by paper vote totals that conflict with the machine totals — ahead of the voters' interest in unimpeachable election results. Still, its opposition to paperless electronic voting is significant.

The Election Assistance Commission, whose role is merely advisory, long ago missed the chance to take the lead on electronic voting reform. The states that adopted paper requirements have done that. And it now looks as if Congress may finally resolve the matter for the whole nation.

Senator Dianne Feinstein, Democrat of California, and Representative Rush Holt, Democrat of New Jersey, plan to introduce legislation to require voter-verified paper records. That legislation has a good chance of passing. If any members of Congress are uncertain why such a law is needed, the NIST report makes the case convincingly.

ANTITRUST:

Unusual Backlash Germinates Within Crop-Biotech Industry To Proposed Delta & Pine Union (WSJ)

By Scott Kilman

DOJ_NMG_0104200

Wall Street Journal, December 11, 2006

Monsanto Co.'s second attempt in seven years to bring southern seed giant Delta & Pine Land Co. to the altar could be running into trouble.

An unusual backlash against the proposed combination is taking root across the U.S. Farm Belt, driven in part by rivals in the crop-biotechnology industry, which Monsanto dominates.

The proposed $1.5 billion deal announced in August would give Monsanto more control over a major crop by a biotechnology company than ever before allowed, a prospect that upsets antibiotechnology activists. Delta & Pine Land's seeds produce half of America's cotton, the nation's fifth-biggest crop. Delta's market share is highest in southern states such as Georgia, where 92% of the cotton is grown from Delta seed.

Wall Street is treating the acquisition as a done deal. Delta & Pine Land stock has hovered just under the $42-a-share offer since Aug. 15, when it jumped 11% on news of the agreement. The shares were at $40.64, down 24 cents, Friday in 4 p.m. New York Stock Exchange composite trading. Monsanto shares fell 43 cents to $48.08 Friday on the Big Board. Monsanto is trading at more than 25 times estimated earnings for its next fiscal year, according to Thomson Financial, compared with about 16 for the stocks in the Standard & Poor's 500-stock index.

Analysts have applauded the proposed combination because it would allow Monsanto to speed penetration of the cottonseed market with new genetically modified traits while ending several years of costly litigation between the two firms over their first breakup. Some biotech-industry leaders are prodding the attorneys general of several states to look into the combination as an antitrust review by the Justice Department extends into its fourth month. "The proposed Monsanto acquisition of Delta & Pine Land is clearly anticompetitive," said Doyle Karr, a spokesman for DuPont Co., the Wilmington, Del., chemicals giant. "We have serious concerns about the impact that it would have on farmers, the agriculture industry and ultimately consumers."

Syngenta AG, the Swiss biotech company, is telling cotton farmers that Monsanto's pending acquisition isn't in their best interest. Lobbyist and former U.S. Sen. Tim Hutchinson of Arkansas is squiring DuPont executives around Congress to press their case against the deal. "There are enough indications of concern that should cause [the Justice Department] to take a careful look," said Rep. Bob Inglis, a South Carolina Republican. Representatives for the North Carolina and Iowa attorneys general said their offices were looking into the deal. Iowa is the home of DuPont's Pioneer Hi-Bred International seed unit. While crop-biotechnology companies have a history of battling in courtrooms, they have tried to present a united front in the face questions over biotechnology safety.

"We are disappointed that competitors are using extreme tactics to try to gin up opposition to a deal that would benefit U.S. cotton growers and the cotton industry," said Carl M. Casale, executive vice president of Monsanto, which is fielding questions about the merger from officials in such noncotton states as Maine and Wisconsin. "The regulators should be allowed to do their job and review this transaction without the background noise," he said.

Delta & Pine Land Chief Executive and President Tom Jagodinski didn't return phone calls seeking comment.

For Delta shareholders, the industry scrape is the latest chapter in what has been an ill-starred romance between the Scott, Miss., company and Monsanto, based in St. Louis. Monsanto offered to buy Delta in 1998 for stock then valued at $1.8 billion. Monsanto backed out in December 1999 after antitrust regulators in the Clinton administration's Justice Department had reviewed the case for 19 months without making a decision. To get executives of Delta & Pine Land to shelve a lawsuit seeking $2 billion in damages over the breakup and consider a new offer, Monsanto promised to hand over $600 million if the new deal doesn't pass antitrust review by August 2007, a deadline that can be extended.

The opposition of DuPont and other firms reflects Delta's role in their plans to challenge Monsanto's decade-long dominance of crop biotechnology. Monsanto owns brands that sell about 25% of the seed used to grow the two biggest U.S. crops -- corn and soybeans -- and has licensed independent seed companies to use its genes.

Today, the majority of genetically modified crops -- including corn, soybeans and cotton -- contain Monsanto genes, which equip plants to make their own insecticide and to tolerate exposure to weedkillers. Such traits make plants so much easier to tend that farmers are willing to pay far more for genetically modified seed than conventional seed. DuPont and others are developing new genes with the aim of replacing Monsanto technology over the next decade. To win, they need to get their inventions into as many bags of seed as possible. DuPont and Syngenta, which own their own brands of corn and soybean seed, don't control any cottonseed. Delta, the last publicly traded pure seed company in the U.S., had been making moves to break its dependence on Monsanto genes.

In July -- a month before the proposed acquisition was announced -- Delta struck a deal to use genes, under development at DuPont's Pioneer seeds unit, designed to give plants the same sort of immunity to weedkillers as Monsanto genes. Likewise, Syngenta had licensed Delta to use genes it is developing that instruct a plant how to make its own bugkiller. To make the deal more palatable to regulators, Monsanto is promising to divest its Stoneville cottonseed business, which controls 12% of the market. Monsanto executives said they would be interested in being able to offer Syngenta and DuPont genes in Delta & Pine Land cottonseed. They stopped short of promising to use competitors' genes.

The Foley Report (WSJ)

The Wall Street Journal, December 11, 2006

'I thought the law to date was that the Department of Justice is not given by the Sherman Act the authority to remake the entire American economy. But if we accept your view, I guess it is."

--Supreme Court Justice Stephen Breyer

That was Justice Breyer seemingly at wits' end earlier this month during oral arguments in Bell Atlantic v. Twombly, a class-action suit in which plaintiffs allege that the Baby Bell phone companies conspired to suppress competition in violation of antitrust laws. Justice Breyer was addressing J. Douglas Richards of Milberg Weiss, the law firm that has been indicted for fraud and is well known for stretching class action law. Twombly was brought on behalf of all telephone users in the continental U.S.

The plaintiffs claim that BellSouth, Verizon, and the other Bells agreed among themselves to refrain from competing against each other and to prevent smaller telecom rivals from entering their respective markets. Mr. Richards had just finished explaining to the Court why "proving the facts alleged is not a plaintiff's burden." He said it was contrary to the Bells' self-interest to stay out of each other's territory and therefore a conspiracy can be inferred.

The Justices seemed unpersuaded that actual facts supporting these claims weren't necessary. They also questioned the plaintiffs' underlying assertion that it was in the Bells' self-interest to invade each other's turf, which by the way had been divvied up not by the Bells but by Justice Department lawyers in the wake of Ma Bell's dismantling.

Justices Antonin Scalia and Ruth Bader Ginsburg told Mr. Richards that the Bells didn't have to conspire to figure out that expanding into a competitor's territory might not pay off. "It seems to me perfectly natural [behavior] for companies that have a certain geographic area in which they are the principal," said Justice Scalia. "[A]lthough technically they can enter somebody else's geographic area, they know that if they do they will be subjected to the same thing."

The High Court's skepticism is warranted and we can hope will be reflected in its decision. The telecom landscape has changed dramatically in recent decades, both since the breakup of Ma Bell and the Telecommunications Act of 1996, which never anticipated the Internet's ability to change incentives and topple business models. Congress gave the Bells access to the long-distance market in return for opening up their local networks to competitors. The expectation was that the regional Bells would march right into each other's territory looking for customers. Things didn't turn out that way.

The traditional telephone market continues to shrink. There's no money in residential service, and the profit from business customers is relatively small. The action is in broadband, and the Bells' real competition comes from wireless providers, cable companies and Internet telephony. The Bells understandably have focused on where their competitive advantage allows them to roll out new services in these new markets, not on moving into the territory of fellow incumbent carriers, where they have no infrastructure in place.

Markets can behave in unison -- think of airline tickets or gas prices -- without necessarily engaging in anticompetitive behavior. And that's as it should be. If the threshold for bringing antitrust conspiracy suits is lowered to the point where, well, you need no direct evidence of an actual conspiracy, then the sky's the limit for the plaintiffs bar. And as Justice Breyer's comment makes clear, a lot more than the cost of phone service would be at stake.

Democrats' Energy Policy To Stress Cutting Demand (WSJ)

By John J. Fialka

Wall Street Journal, December 11, 2006

WASHINGTON -- In one of its final acts, the Republican Congress modestly increased the nation's domestic oil and natural-gas supplies, permitting more drilling for oil and natural-gas in the Gulf of Mexico. When Democrats take control next month, they will attempt to change the direction of energy policy, focusing more on shrinking demand, especially for gasoline and other products that rely heavily on imported oil.

The House will consider a variety of incentives for vehicles that burn 85% ethanol, or so-called biodiesel, where vegetable oils are substituted for petroleum. President Bush is an enthusiastic backer of ethanol, and boosting federal support could be an area where the White House and the new Congress find common ground.

Senate Democrats will consider more direct approaches to curbing fossil-fuel demand, including raising efficiency standards for auto makers, forcing them to make cars that get more miles per gallon of gasoline.

Because Democrats are more influenced by environmental groups, which strongly oppose offshore oil and gas exploration, they appear less willing to consider the supply-side solutions that have been popular in the Republican Congress. Their most recent big energy bill, last year, was heavy on incentives for coal, as well as for ethanol and nuclear power.

Leaders of the coalition that pushed the last energy bill through Congress -- the offshore-drilling measure passed early Saturday morning -- had hoped to open a much larger area before Republicans gave up control. But they declared victory nonetheless. "When it comes to passing important legislation around here," said Rep. John E. Peterson (R., Pa.), "you learn to shoot for the stars in the hope that you might land on the moon. I don't know that we even approached the stratosphere with this bill, but I do believe it represents an important first step."

Sponsors of the offshore-drilling package, originally called the "Gulf of Mexico Energy Security Act," say it will lead to production of 1.26 billion barrels of oil and as much as 5.8 trillion cubic feet of natural gas -- enough to heat and cool six million homes for 15 years -- which lie under the 8.3 million acres in deepwater areas of the Gulf opened for exploration.

The measure is less ambitious than an earlier version passed by the House, which could have opened 356 million acres, but was rejected by the Senate. It would have opened up areas along the Atlantic and Pacific coasts as well as in the Gulf and would have allowed states to waive federal moratoria that prevent offshore drilling.

The new bill doesn't add much beyond what likely would have happened without congressional action. Much of this land already was scheduled for opening by the Interior Department over the next five years. But with the changeover in Capitol Hill, Republicans and energy-industry allies figured it was the best they would be able to get for some time.

Agriculture groups and the chemical industry want more exploration in what are believed to be gas-rich areas along the outer continental shelf. Farm groups want cheaper natural gas because it's a prime ingredient of fertilizer. The chemical industry, which uses natural gas as a feedstock for many chemicals and plastics, argues that many U.S. plants may move overseas, where gas is cheaper, prompting a loss of high-skilled jobs unless gas prices fall in the U.S.

Sponsors of the bill that ultimately passed said it was adequate and timely, coming as the price of natural gas has started moving up, coming out of a mid-year slump. "Just last week," said Sen. Pete Domenici, (R., N.M.), "the price of natural gas was $7.79 per million Btu (British Thermal Units). That is nearly double the price it was two months ago."

U.S. Finds Electric Power Grid Can Fuel Fleets Of Plug-In Cars (WSJ)

By John J. Fialka

Wall Street Journal, December 11, 2006

WASHINGTON -- The nation's existing electric power grid could fuel as many as 180 million electric cars, a Department of Energy study estimates.

The study, being released today by the department's Pacific Northwest National Laboratory, is the federal government's first look at the grid's capacity to handle the demands of so-called plug-in hybrids, which can be operated as an all-electric car for most daily commutes. Until now, there have been few detailed studies of the effect of plug-ins, which are championed by environmental groups and the utility industry.

DOJ_NMG_0104203

Currently there are only a few hundred plug-ins on the road, most hand-made prototypes or unsanctioned modifications of existing hybrids, which use small gasoline engines that charge their electric motors, but can't plug in to recharge.

General Motors Corp. recently announced it will build a plug-in Saturn, and other makers are thought to be planning similar ventures. The report estimates that the current cost of electricity needed to power a car is roughly one-third the equivalent amount of gasoline.

"It is intriguing to think of the trade and national-security benefits if our vehicles switched from oil to electrons," said Robert Pratt, one of the authors of the study and an energy researcher at the laboratory. "Plus, since the utilities would be selling more electricity without having to build more plants or power lines, electricity prices could go down for everyone."

The report estimates that plug-ins, made in volume, would cost between $6,000 and $10,000 more than existing vehicles -- largely due to the cost of carrying larger battery packs. The study estimates that because electricity is cheaper than gasoline, car buyers would recover the additional cost over five to eight years, depending on the price of gasoline.

The study estimates that if 84% of the nation's 220 million vehicles relied primarily on electricity, emissions of carbon dioxide thought to be accelerating climate change would be cut by as much as 5%. Vehicle-produced smog would drop in major cities.

But sulfur dioxide, which causes acid rain, would rise in rural areas where coal-burning power plants are located. The U.S. gets about half of its electricity from burning coal.

Stronger Rules On Produce Likely After Outbreaks Of E.Coli (NYT)

By Andrew Martin

The New York Times, December 11, 2006

With processed fresh produce like bagged salads and baby carrots growing in popularity in the past decade, the Food and Drug Administration realized as long ago as 2000 that recommendations for safe handling of the products were needed.

The agency went so far as to draft guidelines and kept the issue high on its priority list, but pressed by budget cuts and competing F.D.A. demands, the proposal languished.

Now, with the recent outbreaks of E.coli related to processed vegetables, the F.D.A.'s oversight of produce is likely to be treated with new urgency.

"I think it's fairly clear that something needs to change," said Dr. David Acheson, the chief medical officer for the F.D.A.'s Center for Food Safety and Applied Nutrition. Regulations for produce could be part of the changes, he said.

The problems are so acute that the produce industry, long wary of regulation but stung more recently by a decline in sales, is now asking for more government oversight. And some Democratic members of Congress who have long agitated for food safety reforms say they will seek oversight hearings, additional money and new legislation on food safety when they assume control in January.

"The food safety process is collapsing," said Representative Rosa DeLauro, Democrat of Connecticut, who has repeatedly called for merging the food safety functions of the F.D.A. and the Department of Agriculture into one agency.

Part of the problem, critics say, is that the F.D.A.'s food safety budget has been repeatedly slashed even as the agency's responsibilities are multiplying. Besides a growing number outbreaks of E.coli and other nasty pathogens, the F.D.A. is also dealing with new food technologies, nutrition-related labeling issues and more than twice as much imported produce as a decade ago.

No one believes that a beefed-up F.D.A. would eliminate all cases of E.coli, salmonella or other food-borne illnesses. Farmers cannot prevent wild animals from polluting their fields, for instance.

But some observers believe that stronger F.D.A. oversight of produce could reduce the number of outbreaks.

Currently the F.D.A. relies on voluntary food safety guidelines, like the "Guide to Minimize Microbial Food Safety Hazards for Fresh Fruits and Vegetables" from 1998.

Additional guidelines are needed to address the growing processed produce industry, the F.D.A. says, because the risk of contamination is increased as food is handled, particularly if the food is cut or broken, "breaking the natural exterior barrier of the produce."

DOJ_NMG_0104204

In the most recent cases of E.coli, the source has been traced to bagged spinach and to cut green onions.

But passing voluntary guidelines, like the one for processed produce, has become more difficult because of insufficient staffing, research and the deregulatory environment under the Bush administration, according to former F.D.A. employees.

Overall, the F.D.A.'s food safety budget has been declining for decades, with money being shifted into the agency's oversight of drug and medical devices, said William K. Hubbard, a former F.D.A. associate commissioner. He said the portion of the budget devoted to food safety has fallen to about 25 percent from 50 percent in the early 1970s.

Operating funds for the F.D.A.'s Center for Food Safety and Applied Nutrition, the division at the heart of its food safety operations, have decreased to an estimated $25 million next year from $48 million in 2003, and the number of full-time positions has fallen to 817 from 950, according to F.D.A. records.

Food inspectors are a separate part of the F.D.A. budget that was not immediately available; however, the number of inspectors has declined to 1,962 from about 2,200 in 2003, F.D.A. documents show.

"Food safety is a shared goal by the food industry and government regulators, " said Tony Fratto, a White House spokesman. "Outbreaks as we've seen recently are not in the interest of the food industry, consumers, or regulators, so no one should be under the misimpression that food saftey is taken lightly. Our goal has been to ensure that F.D.A. has flexibility and the appropriate level of resources to accomplish its mission. Despite these recent cases, F.D.A. and the food industry have been effective," he said.

Tommy G. Thompson, who as President Bush's secretary of health and human services oversaw the F.D.A., is helping to lead a bi-partisan group called Coalition for a Stronger F.D.A. pushing Congress to increase the agency's budget.

"You can't do it on the cheap," said Mr. Thompson, who left the agency in 2005. "You are going to have to put more dollars in the F.D.A."

Mr. Hubbard, who retired last year, said the agency was currently so stretched that they can do little more than react to outbreaks, rather than try to prevent them. The agency needs more money for research, more staff to develop guidelines and regulations and more inspectors, Mr. Hubbard said.

"F.D.A. is in a position that all they can do is send in inspectors after the cow has left the barn," Mr. Hubbard said. "They don't have the ability to set standards and enforce standards."

But the workload keeps growing. For instance, according to the Center for Science in the Public Interest, a nutrition advocacy group, the number of food-borne illnesses linked to produce doubled from 1998 to 2004.

The amount of imported horticulture products, meanwhile, has increased by 145 percent in the last decade, to $27 billion in 2005 from $11 billion in 1995, according to government statistics.

The Agriculture Department is responsible for regulating meat, poultry and some egg products. The F.D.A. oversees seafood, produce and everything else, estimated to be 80 percent of the food supply. Still the U.S.D.A.'s food safety budget is more than twice as large as the F.D.A.'s, and the U.S.D.A. has about 7,700 food inspectors — nearly four times as many as the F.D.A.

A U.S.D.A. report from 2004 said voluntary guidelines had been unsuccessful in the past.

Problems persist because incentives for growers to adopt better food-safety techniques are weak, according to a U.S.D.A. report that examined an outbreak of Hepatitis A from green onions in 2003.

Outbreaks Reveal Food Safety Net's Holes (WP)

By Annys Shin

The Washington Post, December 11, 2006

First it was spinach. Then tomatoes. Now possibly green onions.

Over the past three months, fresh produce has been the culprit in one episode of food-borne illness after another, the latest an E. coli outbreak that appears to be linked to green onions served at Taco Bell restaurants in the Northeast. More than 60 people have been sickened in that outbreak.

The patchwork of federal and state regulations that is supposed to ensure food safety has become less effective as the nation's produce supply has grown increasingly industrial. Three months after the spinach scare, there is no agreement on what should be done to reduce health risks from the nation's fruits and vegetables even as each episode of illness has heightened a sense of urgency.

The number of produce-related outbreaks of food-borne illness has increased from about 40 in 1999 to 86 in 2004, according to the Center for Science in the Public Interest. Americans are now more likely to get sick from eating contaminated produce than from any other food item, the center said.

"It's fairly clear something needs to change," David W.K. Acheson, a top federal food safety official, said Friday. "Having illness and repeated outbreaks, especially the ones we've seen in the last couple of months, is clearly unacceptable to everyone."

Consumer advocates think that tougher mandatory food safety standards and stepped-up enforcement are the answer. The country's largest food distributors and restaurants are pursuing self-regulation, arguing that government rules can take years to put in place. Produce growers and packers have suggested a voluntary system with elements of mandatory oversight. But even the industry proposals are months away from taking effect.

Several factors have contributed to the rise in outbreaks: greater consumption of fresh produce, especially cut fruits and vegetables; wider distribution; improved electronic reporting of outbreaks; and an aging population more susceptible to food-borne illness. Produce presents a special food safety challenge because, unlike meat, which can be rid of bacteria through proper cooking, it is meant to be consumed raw. There is no "kill step," as food safety experts put it.

E. coli O157:H7 has been a particular problem. Unlike the usually benign E. coli bacteria that live in warm-blooded animals and humans, the strain produces toxins that destroy the intestinal lining, leading to bloody diarrhea, kidney failure and, sometimes, death. It was first blamed for a food-borne-illness outbreak in the early 1980s, leading some microbiologists to suggest that it arose in industrial livestock, which are force-fed grain and pumped with antibiotics.

The strain that caused September's spinach outbreak, which killed three and sickened about 200, has been found in cattle feces near a California spinach field and in wild pigs that roamed through it.

The source of the Taco Bell outbreak has not been found, but the company suspects green onions -- also from California. Fresh tomatoes served in restaurants this fall, believed to have made nearly 200 people sick, carried another bacterium, salmonella.

Taco Bell President Greg Creed said Saturday that the produce supply system needs better guidelines and procedures.

Although meat and dairy products are regulated by the Department of Agriculture, the safety of fruits and vegetables is the responsibility of the Food and Drug Administration and the states. But they have jurisdiction only over processing plants. Food safety at the farm level is largely self-regulated.

That has left government regulators in the position over the past eight years of nagging the produce industry to improve food safety by publishing voluntary guidelines and sending letters of admonishment.

The FDA's critics say the agency doesn't have the manpower to do more. From 2003 to 2006, the budget for the agency's Center for Food Safety and Applied Nutrition has fallen 37 percent, according to agency data. That has meant fewer inspectors and less frequent inspections. In 2005, the FDA conducted 4,573 inspections of domestic food-processing operations. For 2006, the agency said, it hopes to conduct 3,400. There are more than 12,000 such plants in the nation.

"The reality of FDA's situation is they don't have the basic inspectors to inspect the food supply they're in charge of," said Caroline Smith DeWaal, food safety director for the Center for Science in the Public Interest. "They just don't have the people . . . to manage this problem at the farm level."

In mid-November, the CSPI petitioned the FDA, as well as the state of California, to set mandatory safety standards for fruits and vegetables. Consumer advocates also want Congress to give the agency more resources and enforcement powers. They point to two recent food recalls as examples of how rarely the FDA inspects some processing plants.

The FDA last inspected House of Thaller's processing plant in July 2002 and found deficiencies with the food safety plans, sanitation monitoring and pathogen testing, according to records obtained by the consumer group Food & Water Watch. On May 19 this year, the Knoxville, Tenn., company recalled 160,000 pounds of deli salads and dips because of potential contamination.

The agency inspected the facilities of Albert Lea, Minn.-based Mrs. Gerry's Kitchen three times in five years, most recently in August 2005. During those visits, inspectors identified problems with the company's food safety plans. In May, two days before the House of Thaller recall, Mrs. Gerry's recalled 54,000 pounds of salads because of potential contamination.

The FDA's Acheson said the agency's food safety work hasn't suffered as a result of funding constraints.

"As resources shift around in terms of overall total resources and within different centers, what the agency does is to shift to resources to address the maximum public health risk. The spinach investigation was, no question, a high priority," he said. "We can always do more with more, but do I think a lack of resources will impact efforts to prevent future outbreaks? No."

Buyers such as Safeway and Albertsons have chosen not to rely on government regulators and instead hired their own auditors to do inspections. But both food safety officials and auditors say there is little consistency because the government guidelines aren't specific enough.

"We don't have enough science to base those [guidelines] on to be comprehensive," said Kevin Reilly, a California food safety official who is participating in the investigation of the E. coli outbreak traced to bagged spinach. "What's necessary is an agreed-upon set of agricultural practices. Instead of 'Be aware of water quality,' we need to say, 'Test it with this frequency and in this fashion.' "

The privately funded system of audits and inspections, however, remains the produce industry's main tool for preventing future outbreaks.

In October, executives of eight supermarket chains and distributors, including Safeway, Sysco, Wegmans and Kroger, sent a letter to growers and packers, demanding that they develop a food safety program for lettuce and other leafy greens by Dec. 15. The program has been drafted but is still being reviewed by regulators.

Not content to let the growers write their own standards, the Food Marketing Institute, which represents large retailers and wholesalers, and the National Restaurant Association are developing separate guidelines to update those used by private auditors.

The growers, led by two trade groups, Western Growers and the United Fresh Produce Association, have responded with standards that government regulators would enforce through a marketing order -- an agreement farmers pay to participate in designed to stabilize market conditions for certain commodities. Such orders are enforced by the Department of Agriculture's Agricultural Marketing Service, not the FDA, and food safety is not typically their main purpose.

The California Department of Food and Agriculture is considering the growers' proposal and could put an order in place as early as late January, spokesman Steve Lyle said.

The federal Agricultural Marketing Service hasn't responded yet, a Western Growers spokesman said.

Officials at the FDA who are reviewing the proposal have so far welcomed the market-order approach as part of the solution. "If you look at what might be able to happen before next growing season . . . a rule is not a practical proposition," Acheson said.

There's one area of agreement: the consequences of inaction.

"Unless something changes," Reilly said, "we will have another outbreak."

CDC Reports E. Coli Cases Linked To Taco Bell Holding At 61 (USAT)

By Elizabeth Weise

USA Today, December 11, 2006

The E. coli outbreak tied to Taco Bell restaurants in four states may be finally slowing down.

The Centers for Disease Control and Prevention reports that the number of people infected with the dangerous O157:H7 strain is now 61 and holding. The onset of the last reported case was Dec. 2.

Thus far, all the cases have been linked to Taco Bells in New Jersey, New York, Pennsylvania and Delaware, the CDC said in a release.

Will Bortz, a spokesman for Irvine, Calif.-based Taco Bell, said Sunday that tests on all menu items have ruled out every ingredient except scallions as a possible source of the outbreak.

The company last week removed the green onions from the menus of its 5,800 restaurants in the USA and Canada after they were implicated in preliminary tests.

"If you walk into a Taco Bell today, it's completely safe for you to eat. Everything that's on our menu has tested negative. Green onions are off the menu," Bortz said.

DOJ_NMG_0104207

The Food and Drug Administration has not released results of tests conducted on samples taken from the distributor that supplied Taco Bell's green onions. Backup tests have not yet confirmed the source of the contamination.

This fall has seen a string of produce-borne outbreaks, the largest being E. coli in bagged spinach that sickened more than 200 people.

If there's one good thing to come out of the outbreaks, it's that everyone — from producers to the public — is finally focusing on the farm, which is where food safety has to start, said Douglas Powell, professor of food safety at Kansas State University.

Until now, consumer advocates have called for more federal oversight while most produce commodity and grocery groups have told consumers that "food-borne illness is their fault," that is, if they would only properly cook and clean, there wouldn't be a problem, Powell said.

Mike Doyle, a professor of food safety at the University of Georgia in Athens, notes that food producers often argue that raw produce, without the bacteria-killing step of cooking, can't be rendered entirely safe "and still have an acceptable product from a taste and sensory perspective."

"But I just don't think that's the answer," Doyle said. Safety can be achieved "if commitment is made."

Taco Bell has seen this particular light.

"As we move forward, what we would really like is to work with government regulators and the rest of the industry to figure out how to change how things are dealt with at the farm and supplier level," Bortz said. "We need to see if we can stop this from ever happening again."

The meat industry's food-borne illness wake-up call came in 1993 when hundreds were sickened in an E. coli outbreak tied to Jack in the Box hamburgers.

The industry instituted HACCP, which stands for Hazard Analysis and Critical Control Point. A system designed to identify and control hazards, HACCP was originally used by NASA to ensure food safety on space flights.

Within a decade, E. coli O157:H7 rates began to plummet, Doyle said.

Experts considered the produce industry's wake-up call to be the 1996 outbreak of E. coli O157:H7 in unpasteurized Odwalla apple juice, which sickened dozens of people.

"Hopefully enough has happened now that (the produce industry will) get it together one of these days," Powell said.

Has Politics Contaminated The Food Supply? (NYT)

By Eric Schlosser

The New York Times, December 11, 2006

THIS fall has brought plenty of bad news about food poisoning. More than 200 people in 26 states were sickened and three people were killed by spinach contaminated with E. coli O157:H7. At least 183 people in 21 states got salmonella from tainted tomatoes served at restaurants. And more than 160 people in New York, New Jersey and other states were sickened with E. coli after eating at Taco Bell restaurants.

People are always going to get food poisoning. The idea that every meal can be risk-free, germ-free and sterile is the sort of fantasy Howard Hughes might have entertained. But our food can be much safer than it is right now.

According to the Centers for Disease Control and Prevention, 76 million Americans are sickened, 325,000 are hospitalized, and 5,000 die each year because of something they ate.

Part of the problem is that the government's food-safety system is underfinanced, poorly organized and more concerned with serving private interests than with protecting public health. It is time for the new Democratic Congress to reverse a decades-long weakening of regulations and face up to the food-safety threats of the 21st century.

One hundred years ago, companies were free to follow their own rules. Food companies sold children's candy colored with dangerous heavy metals. And meatpackers routinely processed "4D animals" — livestock that were dead, dying, diseased or disabled.

The publication of Upton Sinclair's novel "The Jungle" in 1906 — with its descriptions of rat-infested slaughterhouses and rancid meat — created public outrage over food safety. Even though the book was written by a socialist agitator, a Republican president, Theodore Roosevelt, eagerly read it.

After confirming Sinclair's claims, Roosevelt battled the drug companies, the big food processors and the meatpacking companies to protect American consumers from irresponsible corporate behavior. He argued that bad business practices were ultimately bad for business. After a fight in Congress, Roosevelt largely got his way with passage of the Meat Inspection Act and the Pure Food and Drug Act of 1906.

The decades that followed were hardly an idyll of pure food and flawless regulation. But the nation's diverse agricultural and food-processing system limited the size of outbreaks. Thousands of small slaughterhouses processed meat, and countless independent restaurants prepared food from fresh, local ingredients. If a butcher shop sold tainted meat or a restaurant served contaminated meals, a relatively small number of people were likely to become ill.

Over the past 40 years, the industrialization and centralization of our food system has greatly magnified the potential for big outbreaks. Today only 13 slaughterhouses process the majority of the beef consumed by 300 million Americans.

And the fast-food industry's demand for uniform products has encouraged centralization in every agricultural sector. Fruits and vegetables are now being grown, packaged and shipped like industrial commodities. As a result, a little contamination can go a long way. The Taco Bell distribution center in New Jersey now being investigated as a possible source of E. coli supplies more than 1,100 restaurants in the Northeast.

While threats to the food supply have been growing, food-safety regulations have been weakened. Since 2000, the fast-food and meatpacking industries have given about four-fifths of their political donations to Republican candidates for national office. In return, these industries have effectively been given control of the agencies created to regulate them.

The current chief of staff at the Agriculture Department used to be the beef industry's chief lobbyist. The person who headed the Food and Drug Administration until recently used to be an executive at the National Food Processors Association.

Cutbacks in staff and budgets have reduced the number of food-safety inspections conducted by the F.D.A. to about 3,400 a year — from 35,000 in the 1970s. The number of inspectors at the Agriculture Department has declined to 7,500 from 9,000.

A study published in Consumer Reports last week showed the impact of such policies: 83 percent of the broiler chickens purchased at supermarkets nationwide were found to be contaminated with dangerous bacteria.

Aside from undue corporate influence and inadequate financing, America's food-safety system is hampered by overlapping bureaucracies. A dozen federal agencies now have some food safety oversight. The Agriculture Department is responsible for meat, poultry and some egg products, while the F.D.A. is responsible for just about everything else.

And odd, conflicting rules determine which agency has authority. The F.D.A. is responsible for the safety of eggs still in their shells; the Agriculture Department is responsible once the shells are broken. If a packaged ham sandwich has two pieces of bread, the F.D.A. is in charge of inspecting it — one piece of bread, and Agriculture is in charge. A sandwich-making factory regulated by the Agriculture Department will be inspected every day, while one inspected by the F.D.A. is likely to be inspected every five years.

Neither agency has the power to recall contaminated food (with the exception of tainted infant formula) or to fine companies for food-safety lapses. And when the cause of an outbreak is unknown, it's unclear which agency should lead the investigation.

Last year, Representative Rosa DeLauro of Connecticut and Senator Richard Durbin of Illinois, both Democrats, introduced an important piece of food-safety legislation that tackles these problems. Their Safe Food Act would create a single food-safety agency with the authority to test widely for dangerous pathogens, demand recalls and penalize companies that knowingly sell contaminated food.

It would eliminate petty bureaucratic rivalries and make a single administrator accountable for the safety of America's food. And it would facilitate a swift, effective response not only to the sort of inadvertent outbreaks that have occurred this fall, but also to any deliberate bioterrorism aimed at our food supply.

The Safe Food Act deserves strong bipartisan backing. Aside from industry lobbyists and their Congressional allies, there is little public support for the right to sell contaminated food. Whether you're a Republican or a Democrat, you still have to eat.

Great Lakes Compact At The Center Of Great Debate (USAT)

By Dennis Cauchon

DOJ_NMG_0104209

USA Today, December 11, 2006

The Milwaukee suburb of New Berlin gets half its water from the Great Lakes and half from underground wells that are tainted with radium, a radioactive element.

The city of 38,500 has a simple solution to its water problem: draw more water from Lake Michigan, 10 miles away. That probably won't happen.

New Berlin may look like a typical Midwestern suburb, but it's really a border town — on the edge of the Great Lakes watershed — and the west side of town is on the wrong side of the water slope.

A new multistate agreement working its way through state legislatures builds a legal wall around the largest source of fresh water in the world. The deal would ensure that no Great Lakes water is ever shipped outside the region — not in pipes to Arizona, not in ships to Asia, not even to Madison, Wis., or Columbus, Ohio.

The Great Lakes Water Resources Compact was signed last December by the governors of the eight states that border the lakes — Minnesota, Wisconsin, Illinois, Indiana, Ohio, Michigan, Pennsylvania and New York — and the premiers of the Canadian provinces of Quebec and Ontario. The agreement requires approval of state legislatures before it is sent to Congress for final approval. Ohio's Legislature is expected this week to become the first to approve the pact. New York's may approve it later this month.

"This is not a water grab," says Sam Speck, director of the Ohio Department of Natural Resources. "It's a commitment to protect a resource in the face of climate change and other challenges."

The Great Lakes contain nine-tenths of the nation's fresh water and supply drinking water to 30 million people in Chicago, Toronto, Buffalo and elsewhere. The lakes are an economic engine and the cultural centerpiece for much of the upper Midwest. But the fragile ecology of the lakes has suffered from pollution, invasive species of fish and the diversion of water to support Chicago and other cities.

The new agreement would control who can use the water and how much.

The eight states started work on the compact in 1999 when a Canadian company proposed shipping water in tankers from Lake Ontario to Asia. Other proposals had been floated over the years about piping Great Lakes water to Arizona, western Canada or elsewhere.

"We realized there was nothing legally to prohibit that kind of project or something similar," says David Naftzger, executive director of the non-partisan Council of Great Lakes Governors, which supports environmentally responsible economic growth.

The states and provinces reached a voluntary water deal in 2001, then spent four years trying to agree on language that could be put into law.

The compromise agreement lets "border communities" such as New Berlin apply to use Great Lakes water if they meet tough standards.

Sunny Slope Road is the dividing line in New Berlin. One side of the road has access to all the Great Lakes water it needs. The other side can't get a drop without approval from the state and probably every other state, too. Michigan and environmental groups already have objected.

"It's such a political thing, I doubt it can happen," New Berlin utilities supervisor Rick Jackson says.

His city is under a federal order to reduce the radium in its west side water. The city will probably spend $4 million on a treatment plant to reduce the radium — a naturally occurring substance found in the area's deep well— instead of getting more water from Milwaukee, which supplies the east side of town.

The water agreement was possible because environmentalists, business groups and political leaders agreed on one thing: Nobody outside the region should get Great Lakes water.

"If we want sunshine, we'll move to Arizona," says George Kuper, president of the Council of Great Lakes Industries. "If they want water, let them move to Michigan."

Water rights advocate Terry Anderson, director of the Property and Environment Research Center in Bozeman, Mont., says it's a mistake to lock up Great Lakes water inside the watershed.

He says water rights should be allocated and traded in the marketplace, even if that means shipping water to Asia at the right price. "It's no different than shipping out cars or iron ore," he says.

DOJ_NMG_0104210

Great Lakes water is a powerful economic development tool for industry and tourism in a region that is suffering economically from the decline in the auto industry and other manufacturing businesses.

"Fresh water is our ace in the hole," says Tim Eder, executive director of the Great Lakes Commission, a multistate agency that organizes policy among the states. "If it got to be a humanitarian crisis, I personally might look at letting some water leave the region. But short of that, the water stays here."

Business groups, environmentalists and regulators have practical reasons for locking up the water. Levels in Lake Superior, Lake Michigan and Lake Huron are near historic lows.

The Great Lakes' depths have fluctuated by 4 to 6 feet for the past 4,500 years and the three largest lakes are near the bottom of that range, says Roger Gauthier, a hydrologist at the Great Lakes Commission. Lake Superior entered a drought in 1998 and is at its lowest level in 80 years.

This hurts fishing, hydropower electricity generation, tourism and shipping. Freighters can't carry as much cargo in shallow water. Some islands no longer are surrounded by water.

The big concern: Is the low water level caused by global warming? Warmer winters spur evaporation because the lakes are covered less often with protective ice and snow. "I haven't heard anyone say yet that it's climate change, but we're near record lows, so it makes you wonder," Gauthier says.

Not everyone is thrilled by the water agreement.

"The idea of the compact makes a lot of sense, but it got screwed up a little at the end," says Linda Woggon, a lawyer for the Ohio of Chamber of Commerce. "The last draft had a tiny word change that will make it nearly impossible for any major new development to occur."

The last-minute change says new water withdrawals can't cause a significant change to the quantity or quality of Great Lakes water or any of the rivers or streams feeding into it, Woggon says.

She says the result would mean automatic rejection of a steel plant that wanted to open in the Great Lakes watershed, employ 500 people and use 1 million gallons of water a day.

The business community wanted a balancing test that weighed the value of the new factory or housing development against the environmental impact on the lakes.

Despite these misgivings, the Ohio Chamber of Commerce and other business groups support the deal. They are asking state legislatures to add separate language when approving the compact that interprets the agreement in a less restrictive way. The Ohio bill under consideration has these changes.

Some environmentalists are unhappy, too. Michigan Citizens for Water Conservation opposes the agreement because it puts no limit on the amount of bottled water for consumers that can be withdrawn from the lakes and streams.

"If you fill a truck with water, you have to follow the rules. But if you put the water into bottles less than 5.2 gallons, you can take as much as you want. That makes no sense," says Terry Swier, president of the group, which has sued Nestlé's Ice Mountain water-bottling operation in Stanwood, Mich., for taking water from Sanctuary Springs in the watershed.

But most environmental groups signed on to the compact.

"This sets up a decision-making process and standards," says Cheryl Mendoza, manager of water conservation at the Alliance for the Great Lakes, "so we can take care of water in a responsible way."

Guilty Plea Entered (MARTBULL)

By Charles Boothe, Bulletin Staff Writer

Martinsville Bulletin, December 11, 2006

By ex-deputy in sheriff case

A former Henry County Sheriff's Office deputy has pleaded guilty to two charges in the sheriff's office scandal after reaching a plea agreement with the government. Five charges were dismissed under the agreement.

Bradley Scott Martin, 33, entered guilty pleas on one count of racketeering conspiracy and one count of drug conspiracy in district court in Roanoke on Friday, according to Heidi Coy with the U.S. Attorney's Office.

"It is a written plea agreement that he signed with the government," Coy said, adding that Martin remains free on a $25,000 bond.

A release issued Friday by the U.S. Attorney's Office stated that Martin pleaded guilty to using his position as a county deputy to distribute steroids and ketamine (a Schedule III sedative, also used as a "date-rape" drug), and using his law enforcement connections to avoid detection of his illegal activities by tipping off his co-conspirators.

The penalty for the racketeering conspiracy count is a maximum of 20 years and a $250,000 fine, Coy said. The drug conspiracy count carries a maximum sentence of 20 years and a $1 million fine.

A sentencing date has not been set, she said.

Martin was one of 12 current or former officers, as well as former sheriff H. Frank Cassell and seven others, who were charged in a 48-county, 50-page indictment that was unsealed on Nov. 2. Charges in the indictment include racketeering conspiracy, obstruction of justice, money laundering, perjury and drug and firearm offenses.

Martin was indicted on seven counts related to charges of racketeering conspiracy, drug conspiracy, obstruction of justice and making a false statement to a federal agent.

According to the plea agreement, five of those counts will be dismissed and Martin will be required to offer "substantial assistance" in the case, court records state. That includes "complete and truthful information to attorneys and law enforcement officers of the government," records state.

The indictments were the result of a nearly two-year investigation by federal authorities into an alleged eight-year scheme involving some sheriff's office personnel.

According to the indictment, in 2001, a Drug Enforcement Administration (DEA) agent from Texas placed a telephone call to the Henry County Sheriff's Office to advise officers that a drug ledger had been seized which indicated shipments of drugs were being delivered to "Brad Martin's" house in Martinsville.

The DEA did not realize that "Brad Martin" was a deputy with the sheriff's office, the indictment said. It added that Martin took the call and allegedly shared the information with co-defendants James Alden Vaught and David Allen King. Both Vaught and King were deputies at that time.

Also, Martin and co-defendant William Randall Reed, who also has pleaded guilty in a plea agreement, allegedly received steroids and prescription pills through the U.S. mail from a man in Mexico, the indictment said. Both Martin and Reed also were accused in the indictment of using and selling ketamine and steroids for approximately eight years.

According to Coy, during the plea agreement hearing on Friday, Bondurant said there were eight covert recordings of Martin during the investigation.

Bondurant also told the court, Coy said, that Martin was interviewed by federal agents on May 30 and at first claimed he had no knowledge of the activities. Later, however, he began to admit to more of the alleged illegal acts, including the steroid and ketamine transactions, she said.

Reed entered a guilty plea to one count of racketeering conspiracy at a hearing on Nov. 27. At that hearing, he told the court he was pleading guilty because "I was part of a drug thing ... In possession of some steroids and ketamine. That's what I'm guilty of."

At that hearing, Bondurant told the court that Reed was the "middle man" in at least seven alleged ketamine transactions conducted at rental property owned by Vaught.

Reed was the first one arrested in the case and led federal investigators to Vaught who, according to earlier reports, allegedly also provided investigators with more information that implicated other co-defendants, including Martin.

So far, only Reed and Martin have reached plea agreements. Vaught, who initially pleaded not guilty, is scheduled for a change of plea hearing on Dec. 28 in Roanoke, Coy said.

The other defendants all have entered not guilty pleas. That includes Cassell, who was indicted on two counts of obstruction of justice, one count of money laundering, one count of making a false statement to a federal agency and one count of misprision of a felony, or failure to report a felony.

All defendants remain free on $25,000 bond.

Former Deputy Pleads Guilty (RT)

Roanoke (VA) Times, December 9, 2006

A former Henry County sheriff's deputy pleaded guilty Friday in U.S. District Court in Roanoke to two charges -- one for selling drugs and another for conspiring to commit racketeering.

Bradley Scott Martin, 33, accepted a plea agreement in which four charges of obstruction of justice and one charge of making false statements to a federal agent were dropped.

Martin, wearing jeans, tennis shoes and a button-up shirt, told Judge James Turk that he was pleading guilty because he was involved in selling Ketamine and steroids and was involved in other criminal activity.

Martin and 11 other current and former deputies and former Henry County Sheriff Frank Cassell are named in a 48-count federal indictment.

It accuses the deputies of using and dealing drugs; stealing narcotics and guns from evidence and redistributing them in the community; and lying to federal investigators.

Cassell is accused of protecting deputies he allegedly knew were involved in illegal activity.

The indictment says Martin routinely received steroids and prescription pills through the U.S. Postal Service. Martin used the steroids and sold them to people, including other deputies, the indictment said.

The indictment also said Martin distributed cocaine and marijuana.

The obstruction of justice charges, which were dropped, stem from allegations that Martin helped foil an investigation to arrest a citizen whom Martin allegedly bought and sold drugs with. The indictment also alleges that Martin agreed with other people named in the indictment to lie to investigators.

Assistant U.S. Attorney Tom Bondurant said that as part of the plea agreement, Martin may have to testify against the other deputies and Cassell.

If Martin cooperates, his sentence may be reduced, Bondurant said.

Martin faces a maximum of 40 years in prison and a $1.25 million fine.

He will be sentenced after his co-defendants' cases are over, Bondurant said.

Former Henry County Deputy Pleads Guilty (WDBJ)

WDBJ-TV,, December 8, 2006

Another defendant involved in the Henry County Sheriff's Department scandal has pled guilty.

Former Deputy Bradley Scott Martin pled guilty today to racketeering and a drug conspiracy charge. As part of a plea agreement, the U.S. Attorney agreed to drop five other charges.

Martin faces up to 40 years in prison. No sentencing date has been set.

A federal grand jury in October indicted Sheriff Frank Cassell and a dozen of his current and former deputies on racketeering charges.

Charges Tainted By Police Scandal Dropped In Va. County (AP)

AP, December 8, 2006

COLLINSVILLE, Va. - The federal indictment of Henry County's former sheriff and a dozen past and present members of his department has led prosecutors to drop charges against 28 people because of the taint of the alleged corruption.

The charges dropped include 16 felony drug counts and 25 misdemeanor and traffic infractions.

"These charges could not be effectively prosecuted without the testimony of one or more individuals currently under federal indictment," Commonwealth's Attorney Bob Bushnell said Thursday. "Given the circumstances, I have determined that the appropriate action is to drop these charges."

He said he does not expect any more charges to be dropped.

H. Franklin Cassell, the former sheriff, pleaded not guilty Nov. 27 to charges that he was part of scheme to sell drugs seized from criminals.

An indictment returned in October accused Cassell, 68, of looking the other way as officers sold drugs seized in criminal investigations and also stole guns and other evidence. He is charged with impeding federal agents' investigation and money laundering.

Charges against the other defendants include racketeering conspiracy, narcotics distribution, weapons counts, obstruction of justice and perjury.

One deputy, Bradley Scott Martin, 33, pleaded guilty Friday to charges of racketeering conspiracy and drug conspiracy, U.S. Attorney John Brownlee said in a statement. Martin faces a maximum punishment of 40 years in prison and a $1.25 million fine.

One of seven civilians charged in the case, William Randall Reed, pleaded guilty last month to racketeering conspiracy. A hearing is scheduled Dec. 28 to receive a guilty plea from a former sergeant, James Alden Vaught, a Brownlee spokeswoman said.

Cassell, the top law enforcement officer the economically distressed county along the North Carolina border since 1992, has retired since the indictment was returned.

Three In Drug Gang Sentenced (AC)

Annapolis Capital, December 9, 2006

Three men who admitted being part of a Severn drug gang known as the "Pioneer City Boys" were sentenced to federal prison yesterday.

Federal prosecutors said Tony Maurice Horne Jr. and Troemaine Herbert Storey, both of Glen Burnie, and Jerome Otto Waters Jr. of Annapolis were part of a gang that used violence and intimidation to keep competitors out and silence people who might go to the police.

The words "stop snitching" were spray-painted on the street in several Severn neighborhoods, a prosecutor said.

During separate hearings in Baltimore, U.S. District Court Judge Andre M. Davis sentenced Waters, 29, to eight years, Storey, 29, to seven years and Horne, 25, to 77 months, almost 5½ years.

An associate, Calvin I. Savoy of Severn, was convicted in October of drug charges and of shooting a county police officer during a melee in Odenton in 2004. The officer, William Hicks, wasn't seriously hurt.

Because he had past drug convictions, Savoy faces a mandatory life sentence with no chance at parole.

The shooting of the officer touched off an investigation by county police and the U.S. Drug Enforcement Administration that culminated with the September 2005 indictment of seven men.

All except Savoy have pleaded guilty; several are awaiting sentencing.

Two run from police; one still at large

A 32-year-old woman who was charged with stabbing a man last week tried to run from police custody Thursday afternoon.

Officers determined that two people - Conzuella Jones, 32, and Todd Raynard Neal, 42, - were responsible for the Dec. 2 stabbing of Kirby Millburne Fletcher. Ms. Jones was arrested on Pleasant Street shortly before 1 p.m. Thursday, police said. While waiting for her initial court appearance, she ran from the District Court Commissioner's Office on Taylor Avenue and was apprehended a short time later.

She was charged with the stabbing and escape, police said. Officers are still looking for Mr. Neal, whose last known address was the 1700 block of Belle Drive. He is considered armed and dangerous.

Officers found Mr. Fletcher with several stab wounds on his neck, back and hand at 92 Clay St. He was flown to the Shock Trauma Center at the University Hospital in serious, possibly life-threatening injuries, police said. He was later upgraded to serious, but stable condition.

Area Doctor Charged With Drug Distribution (TOLB)

By Mark Reiter, BLADE STAFF WRITER

Toledo Blade (OH), December 11, 2006

He allegedly wrote illegal prescriptions

DOJ_NMG_0104214

A Michigan physician was arraigned yesterday in federal court on charges that he used a Toledo medical office to illegally prescribe more than $10 million in painkillers to patients.

A 26-count indictment, filed Wednesday in U.S. District Court in Toledo and unsealed yesterday, charges Dr. Leo M. Ognen, 54, with drug conspiracy and drug distribution. Dr. Ognen, who is a former staff member of St. Anne Mercy Hospital in Toledo, was arrested yesterday at his home in Warren, Mich., and arraigned later before U.S. Magistrate Vernelis Armstrong.

He was ordered held in the Lucas County jail after Magistrate Armstrong granted a request from assistant U.S. Attorney Seth Uram to continue a detention hearing until Wednesday.

At the end of the 15-minute hearing, Dr. Ognen tearfully embraced his wife of nearly 30 years. She was in the courtroom with the couple's 20-year-old daughter.

If convicted, the physician faces a maximum sentence of 20 years in prison and a $1 million fine.

The charges stem from a U.S. Drug Enforcement Administration investigation into the alleged illegal dispensing of over two million doses of OxyContin and oxycodone and 1.1 million Percocet tablets at his medical practice in Toledo from January, 2002, to October, 2004.

He is accused of filling prescriptions for the painkillers for new and existing patients at his office without performing examinations on them, and the indictment says that $40 to $50 would exchange hands in return for the illegal prescriptions.

The indictment said that patients' Medicaid card information was taken and the government was billed for the illegal prescription of painkillers; and patients were recruited to persuade family, friends, and neighbors to become new patients.

The indictment didn't reveal the location of the alleged offenses.

Dr. Ognen recently maintained an office at 5715 Dorr St., and court records show he practiced in a medical building at 980 South Byrne Rd. in 2002.

A native of Macedonia, Dr. Ognen received degrees from the University of Belgrade in 1979 and Wayne State University, and practiced at Grace Hospital in Detroit.

He is licensed as a doctor in Ohio and Michigan.

Sarah Bednarski, a spokesman for Mercy Health Partners, said Dr. Ognen resigned from the medical staff at St. Anne in October, 2005.

He previously was on the staff of the former Riverside Mercy Hospital until it closed in 2002.

Steroid Seizure Among Largest (BSUN)

By Matthew Dolan, Sun Reporter

The Baltimore Sun, December 9, 2006

Authorities found about 40,000 units of substance in locker

It seemed like a routine seizure when federal customs agents intercepted a package of steroids at John F. Kennedy Airport in New York. From JFK, the investigation led authorities to Anne Arundel County to what they now call one of the largest stashes of man-made muscle enhancers found in the region.

Federal authorities and Anne Arundel County police searched the locker of the Bally's personal trainer last summer and wrote in court papers that they found about 40,000 vials and tablets of suspected anabolic steroids stuffed inside a locked chest.

"It's unprecedented, as far as we're concerned," said Floyd Pond, deputy director of the Washington-Baltimore High Intensity Drug Trafficking Area task force program. Ed Marcinko, a spokesman for the Drug Enforcement Administration in Baltimore, said he agreed with Pond's assessment.

James Dinkins, the special agent in charge of the U.S. Immigrations and Customs Enforcement's Baltimore office, said he could not answer detailed questions about the investigation his office led because the case is pending in U.S. District Court.

But sources familiar with the ICE investigation said that Schlanger might have been responsible for trafficking in as many as 250,000 so-called units of steroids over the past five years.

Schlanger, 47, of Catonsville, could face up to five years in prison and $250,000 in fines if convicted of federal drug conspiracy charges after authorities said they arrested one of his employees picking up a drug-filled package at a UPS store in July. A trial date has not been scheduled, attorneys in the case said.

DOJ_NMG_0104215

Andrew Alperstein, Schlanger's defense lawyer, said Friday that he and his client had no comment on the charges.

A message left for the manager at Bally Total Fitness in Glen Burnie about Schlanger's employment was not returned yesterday. Alperstein said that his client has been released from federal custody to await his trial.

Court papers filed in federal and state courts, and sources familiar with the case, accuse Schlanger of working as a wholesale drug dealer who cast a wide net for customers, importing the muscle-building drugs through the mail from China and then reselling the steroids in the Baltimore region and nationally through the Internet.

Authorities said in court papers that Schlanger's activities came to light when customs agents intercepted a package filled 3,038 units - usually either a vial or tablet - of steroids at John F. Kennedy Airport in New York City on July 5. The parcel was addressed to "Country Crafts," a federal agent wrote.

While agents investigated, two more packages arrived, one from China and one from Great Britain, court papers show. Authorities reported they contained 960 vials of Igtropin, an insulin-like growth steroid and testosterone enanthate.

Federal authorities brought in Anne Arundel County police to set up a "controlled delivery" of the drugs July 13 to the UPS store in Severna Park. When a man, Pierre R. Gumucio, retrieved the packages, he and his girlfriend, Rachael Ann Martin were arrested, officials said.

Inside their car were bags of clear glass vials of suspected steroids, orange pills and a book marked "ANABOLIC," according to court papers.

At Anne Arundel County's Eastern District, agents wrote that Gumucio confessed.

"Mr. Gumucio stated that he had been an 'on again off again'" recreational drug user for years," ICE Special Agent Jon Marsicano Jr. wrote in an affidavit.

He told investigators that he worked for Schlanger, receiving two to three packages a week for him from China over the past couple of years and wiring overseas payments for the drugs on Schlanger's behalf.

"According to Mr. Gumucio, Mr. Schlanger stated that U.S. Customs flagged him for prior importation of steroids and it was very difficult for him to receive packages without Customs inspecting them," Marsicano wrote in court papers. Schlanger also served as a moderator on professionalmuscle.com, using his connections to find customers around Baltimore and across the country, according to Gumucio's account in court papers.

The break in the case came when Gumucio told agents about Schlanger's storage locker, court papers say.

Anne Arundel police obtained a search warrant for the locker off Fort Meade Road. Inside, they wrote in court papers, they found about 18,200 doses of suspected steroids. Agents familiar with the case said this week that the final number inside the locker was actually 40,000 - a figure reflected in the pending federal indictment against Schlanger.

On the same day, July 14, agents attempted to search Schlanger's home on Arunah Avenue in Catonsville. But as they did, they found Schlanger at home and detained him as they sought a separate arrest warrant.

Inside his home, court papers say, authorities found more steroids, packaging material and vials. In August, a federal magistrate judge signed a search warrant for investigators to obtain electronic records of Schlanger's Yahoo e-mail account. Public court records do not reflect what agents found as part of their search.

After facing charges of drug possession in state court, authorities decided to move Schlanger's case and indicted him for conspiracy to distribute anabolic steroids in federal court on Sept. 20. Gumucio and Martin's drug possession cases remain in state court.

Drugs Factor In Car Crashes, Study Finds (AP)

AP, December 11, 2006

The focus on the dangers of drinking and driving may have overshadowed a similarly serious problem: the effect of drugs, including prescription medication, on drivers.

According to a federal study released Thursday, West Virginia medical examiners have found that drugs turn up almost as frequently as alcohol in the victims of fatal car crashes. The drugs found most often are prescription medications like painkillers and depressants.

DOJ_NMG_0104216

The federal Centers for Disease Control is able to draw that conclusion because West Virginia — unlike most states — routinely tests the victims of fatal crashes for drugs and prescription medications as well as alcohol.

- advertisement -

"We have very thorough and efficient medical examiners," said John Law, spokesman for the state Department of Health and Human Resources. "Doing this has provided us with information on what besides alcohol may be contributing to these accidents. A lot of states don't have that."

The study, released as part of the CDC's Morbidity and Mortality Weekly Report, said it's impossible to determine how often drugs are involved with fatal crashes nationally, because of a lack of data.

But in West Virginia, the regular testing has enabled the CDC to determine that drugs are found in 25.8 percent of people killed in wrecks. That's similar to the percentage of victims found with a blood alcohol level above the legal limit — about 27.7 percent.

"These results suggest that drug use contributes substantially to driver impairment in West Virginia," the report says.

The report studied results from 2004 and 2005, when 784 people died in car crashes in the state. Drug and alcohol tests were performed on roughly 84 percent of those killed. Nearly half the people killed had either alcohol or drugs in their system; 11 percent had both.

"I'm not surprised at all," said Jim Helmkamp, director of West Virginia University's Injury Control Research Center and professor in the Department of Community Medicine.

Helmkamp said results like these indicate the need to educate the public about the dangers of drugs — including prescription medications — and driving, similar to efforts warning against drunken driving.

The drugs found most often by the medical examiners were prescription medications, usually opioid painkillers like hydrocodone and oxycodone or depressants. The illicit drug most commonly found was marijuana, present in 8.5 percent of all victims.

Those results differ from previous studies that hadn't shown prescription medications appearing so frequently in crash deaths, said Dr. Len Paulozzi, a medical epidemiologist at the CDC Injury Center. Local factors — such as the prevalence of prescription painkillers in West Virginia — could be part of the cause for that.

"It's a stretch to say we can extrapolate these results for the rest of the country," Paulozzi said.

There also isn't enough data to determine how many people with prescription medications in their system had legally obtained them, Paulozzi said.

Athletes See Doping Case Appeals As Futile Exercise (LAT)

By Michael A. Hiltzik, Times Staff Writer

The Los Angeles Times, December 11, 2006

The arbitration system is flawed, with a tilt toward accusers. Accidental and trivial cases result in harsh penalties.

A panel of international sports arbitrators hearing a doping case against Olympic sprinter Torri Edwards went out of their way to sing her praises.

They described Edwards, then a 27-year-old USC graduate, as "a diligent and hardworking athlete" who had "conducted herself with honesty, integrity and character."

They acknowledged that her purported breach of doping regulations was entirely unintentional, caused by the obscure additive nikethamide in a couple of otherwise innocent glucose tablets she took at an exhibition race in Martinique.

"She has not sought to gain any improper advantage or to 'cheat' in any way," they wrote in August 2004.

But the arbitrators, while expressing "unease" about the rules and acknowledging their "harshness," still found Edwards guilty of doping. Her sanction: a two-year suspension from international competition.

The punishment was indistinguishable from what could have been imposed on an athlete caught deliberately injecting steroids. It wiped out Edwards' eligibility for the 2004 Summer Olympics in Athens.

Edwards' case and others like it illuminate the flaws in the appeals process for elite athletes accused of doping violations. A Times examination of the appeal system found that:

DOJ_NMG_0104217

• Athletes are presumed guilty and denied routine access to lab data potentially relevant to their defense.

• Trivial and accidental violations draw penalties similar to those for intentional use of illicit performance-enhancing substances.

• Anti-doping authorities or sports federations have leaked details of cases against athletes or made public assertions of their guilt before tests were confirmed or appeals resolved.

• Arbitrators, theoretically neutral judges, are bound by rules drafted and enforced by the World Anti-Doping Agency and its affiliates, including the U.S. Anti-Doping Agency. They have almost no discretion to adjust penalties to fit individual circumstances.

The WADA rules govern the admissibility of evidence, the burden of proof and the selection of the arbitrators themselves. In each category they tend to favor the accusers. Athletes wishing to compete in national, international and Olympic events subject to WADA jurisdiction have no option but to agree to this system.

Anti-doping authorities argue that these rules — indeed, the very requirement that appeals be heard by arbitrators, rather than in court — are crucial to ensuring a fast and efficient process.

The question is whether they go so far that they deprive athletes of due process and fair hearings.

On the surface, anti-doping arbitrations resemble other commercial arbitrations. Generally, the athlete and the prosecuting agency each select one arbitrator, and those nominees jointly select a third. But the limits under which the panels operate differ from those in other commercial arbitrations.

"The rules are designed to make it as easy as possible to convict an athlete," Howard Jacobs, a prominent Agoura Hills-based athletes' attorney, told an American Bar Assn. conference this fall.

The arbitration provisions, he said, require that "their tests are presumed to be scientifically valid. It's assumed that their labs did everything perfectly. And they have no obligation to provide you with documentation to rebut these presumptions."

This also differs from the standards in a U.S. court of law, where defendants or litigants are routinely granted access to a wide range of documents and the right to cross-examine expert witnesses and challenge technical evidence in great detail.

A costly undertaking

Accused athletes find that challenging a system stacked against them can be extraordinarily costly, prompting some to abandon any effort at defense.

"It wiped out my life savings and my college savings," Zach Lund, 27, a world-class skeleton sled racer from Salt Lake City, said of his effort to clear himself of doping charges.

In 2005, a drug test found traces of finasteride, an ingredient in anti-baldness medication, in his urine. The substance had been banned only that year over concerns that it might mask the presence of steroids in urine samples. That concern, however, was based on a single study by a WADA lab that had not been peer-reviewed by a medical journal. And Lund had been taking the hair restoration prescription for five years.

"I lost all my sponsorships and my funding" from the U.S. Olympic Committee, Lund said in an interview. "I even had to get money from my family and friends. The system is broken. Right now, it's catching people who make mistakes."

An arbitration panel acknowledged that the finasteride came from Lund's medication. In upholding a one-year suspension that deprived him of a chance to compete in the 2006 Winter Olympics in Turin, Italy, which opened on the very day of the ruling, arbitrators called him "an honest athlete" and acknowledged that the substance had no performance-enhancing effect.

They conceded that they had reached their decision "with a heavy heart": Although Lund had faithfully disclosed his medication on anti-doping forms at every event, no official had ever alerted him to the change in finasteride's status.

"The panel finds this failure both surprising and disturbing, and is left with the uneasy feeling that Mr. Lund was badly served by the anti-doping organizations," they wrote. Still, under the rules, the best they could do was impose the minimum one-year sanction.

A perfect record

USADA has never lost an arbitration case in its history, a record that spans six years and more than 40 proceedings. Authorities call that record a testament to their skill at bringing only bulletproof cases.

DOJ_NMG_0104218

"If you're a clean athlete, you have nothing to worry about," says Travis T. Tygart, the agency's general counsel. "We don't proceed if it's not a doping case."

USADA Chief Executive Terrence P. Madden dismisses criticism of the arbitration process as sour grapes from athletes' lawyers.

"These are the same old tired arguments that we've heard for six years, and it's the same defense counsel who bring them up," Madden said.

Madden and Tygart contend that the agency's advantages in the arbitration system only compensate for its lack of governmental powers, such as subpoena authority. Athletes "want a set of rights that far exceeds the powers we have," Tygart says. "They say you have to give them constitutional due process. If that's so, then give us search-and-seizure powers to balance out that right."

But criticism of the process is more widespread than they acknowledge. Even some arbitrators are uncomfortable with the system.

"It's not serving the purpose it was meant to — to give the athlete a real opportunity to be heard," says one long-term doping arbitrator who did not want to be named so as to avoid internal controversy.

Pushing back

Arbitrators staged a rare revolt against anti-doping rules last summer in the case of Mariano Puerta, an Argentine tennis player who had accidentally ingested a tiny amount of a banned stimulant just before playing in the French Open. Puerta faced an eight-year suspension, which the panel considered tantamount to a lifetime ban for the 26-year-old athlete — "a result that is neither just nor appropriate," the panel wrote.

They agreed that Puerta's positive test resulted from his unwittingly sharing the same water glass that his wife had used for her medication.

Arguing that an appropriate penalty did not seem to be contained within WADA's rules, they fashioned their own solution by imposing a two-year ban. "The panel is not persuaded … that it is necessary for there to be undeserving victims in the war against doping," they explained.

But Puerta's case is unique. Only three times has an arbitrator in a U.S. case even filed a dissent. All three were by the same arbitrator: San Francisco lawyer Christopher L. Campbell, a former Olympic wrestler often selected as an arbitrator by athletes.

One of Campbell's dissents came in the case of Kyoko Ina, a U.S. figure skater accused of refusing a drug test late one night. Evidence showed that a USADA official had led her to believe the test could be rescheduled for the next day. Because of the misunderstanding, she was threatened with a four-year suspension, despite never having failed a test or been suspected of doping.

"When any organization, including [USADA] turns this fight against doping on innocent athletes, that behavior is unacceptable," Campbell wrote.

Ina negotiated a two-year suspension and subsequently joined a professional ice show.

The current arbitration system took form after the creation of WADA in 1999, when sports organizations concluded that a unified anti-doping regime was preferable to the patchwork of national and sports-specific policies then in effect.

The tilt toward the prosecution in arbitration cases begins with the selection of arbitrators themselves. The rules require all arbitrators to be accredited by the Swiss-based international Court of Arbitration for Sport. In the U.S., the initial appeal by an athlete is heard by members of the court's North American branch. Any subsequent appeal is heard by panelists selected from the court's international membership.

Many arbitrators have current or prior professional relationships with USADA, WADA or other sports organizations that frequently serve as the prosecution in anti-doping cases.

Of the 45 members of the North American branch, at least 24 have such affiliations. They include Richard Young, an outside counsel to USADA, and WADA Chairman Richard W. Pound. Although neither has arbitrated a doping case, athletes' attorneys say their mere membership in the sports arbitration pool fosters an impression that the system is slanted against them.

DOJ_NMG_0104219

In 2001, USADA staged an expense-paid visit for all accredited arbitrators and their spouses to the UCLA Olympic Analytical Laboratory, the leading WADA lab in the world. The session, attended by 22 of the 38 arbitrators then in the North American pool, featured presentations by USADA officials and Don H. Catlin, the lab director, capped by a night out at a Santa Monica restaurant.

"The arbs are jurors," says Edward G. Williams, an athletes lawyer who contends the session was tantamount to "a bribe."

"I've said anyone who went through that session should be disqualified," Williams said. "I always lose that argument."

The most powerful element tilting the process toward the prosecution is the presumption that the agencies' scientific tests are valid and that the work of WADA's accredited laboratories, which perform all the blood and urine tests, always meet international standards. The presumption is written into the WADA Code.

The presumption shifts the burden to the athlete to prove that the lab's work fell short of scientific standards and that its failures affected the outcome. The effect is to render the athlete guilty unless proved innocent. That's a reversal of the situation in a U.S. court of law, where prosecutors carry the burden of proof from start to finish.

"The athlete is being held accountable, but the lab can have a series of small errors and is not held to a strict liability," says David L. Black, president of Aegis Sciences Corp., a Nashville-based independent doping lab. "No deficiency in the lab performance ever seems to rise to the level of impeaching their finding."

Adding to the perception of bias are frequent leaks disclosing the names of athletes under investigation and public statements by anti-doping and sports officials asserting the athletes' guilt, even before appeals have run their course.

Earlier this year, for example, Pound suggested that former Tour de France champion Lance Armstrong had been guilty of doping in 1999. He based his comments on disputed and supposedly confidential research data compiled by WADA's Paris lab.

"It's a case that has to be answered," the WADA chairman said about what he called "documentary" data linked to Armstrong. His statements, along with other comments from sports authorities, drew rebukes from inside and outside the agency.

"Pound shoots at everything that moves," complained Hein Verbruggen, president of the International Cycling Union.

Losing trust

Scott Burns, an American member of WADA's executive committee, also objected. According to minutes of the September 2005 committee meeting, he complained that it was "the antithesis of what was done at WADA … to speak out or speculate precipitously, especially in public." As a result, Burns said, WADA risked having "lost the trust of athletes."

Another problem facing athletes is the limited availability of independent experts such as Black. A WADA rule prohibits members of its 34 accredited laboratories from testifying in defense of an athlete in a doping case.

The rule exists to shield the WADA labs from political pressure that might be exerted on behalf of a high-profile athlete from their own country, said Olivier Rabin, the agency's medical director.

Still, it reserves the expertise of most of the top doping scientists in the world for use exclusively by the prosecuting agency.

"It's difficult to establish the credibility of our experts when they go up against people who do this every day for a living," said Michael Straubel, a law professor at Valparaiso University in Indiana who has defended numerous athletes.

Athletes' attorneys also face obstacles obtaining technical documents from the agencies. Under USADA rules, the agency is required to produce only records concerning the specific test performed on the athlete's own sample.

Not included are documents that might shed light on a WADA lab's general proficiency or its treatment of other similar cases, arguably pertinent to defense questions about lab consistency or reliability.

Tygart calls the document package routinely shipped to accused athletes "fair and overly generous." The U.S. agency generally rejects requests for further data unless the athlete "can articulate a need that's not a fishing expedition," he says.

USADA's position will probably be tested by Tour de France champion Floyd Landis, who has been charged with testosterone doping in the 2006 race.

Jacobs, Landis' attorney, submitted a 10-page request in October for documents related to the Paris WADA lab's general experience with the testosterone screening. Landis hopes to challenge whether the French scientists "have sufficient expertise at running this test" and whether they can justify their criteria for declaring the cyclist's sample positive.

Tygart rebuffed Jacobs. "Every request you make appears to seek documents or information not called for by the rules," he wrote. The defense lawyer is expected to ask arbitrators to force the release of more documents.

DOJ_NMG_0104220

Even when an athlete is able to present a detailed case, the WADA Code ties arbitrators' hands in several ways. For example, arbitrators are prevented from considering an athlete's intent when judging a doping charge.

Under the prevailing principle of "strict liability," the mere presence of a prohibited substance in a blood or urine sample is sufficient to establish the violation, even if it is proved that the breach was accidental.

"We are fact-finders, and we apply the law within the narrow strictures that we are given," says Maidie Oliveau, an experienced anti-doping arbitrator based in Los Angeles.

Arbitrators may overturn a proposed suspension only if an athlete can prove he or she bears "no fault or negligence." They may reduce a suspension, albeit by no more than half, if they find "no significant fault or negligence." The standards for such relief are ambiguous and "virtually impossible to meet" in practice, says Jessica K. Foschi, who studies legal issues in doping at Duke University Law School.

A suspension waived

In the seven years since WADA's founding, only one athlete out of hundreds who have been sanctioned is known to have met the "no fault" standard: Australian tennis player Todd Perry. He proved last year that a tournament doctor had refilled his legal asthma inhaler with a banned drug without notifying him.

Arbitrators waived Perry's two-year suspension. Though they also absolved him of fault, they let stand his formal reprimand. Under the agency's strict liability doctrine, Perry remained a violator for having an illicit substance in his system.

The strict liability standard applies even when a doping charge hinges on subjective interpretations of laboratory readouts. These include WADA's test for erythropoietin, or EPO, a hormone that promotes red blood cell formation.

Chances of a misreading are high, according to the technical literature and experts interviewed by The Times. Several recent EPO charges have been dropped because retests failed to confirm initial lab findings or encountered other testing flaws.

"Testing is far behind where it needs to be, but the rules don't reflect that," Foschi says.

Foschi, who was accused and cleared of doping charges as a 14-year-old swimmer in 1995, criticized no-fault rules that require an athlete to prove how a substance entered his or her body to obtain a reduced penalty.

"The person who is most in trouble is someone who is genuinely innocent and has no idea how something got in his or her system," she said.

In her own case, she says, her sample was taken at an event in Pasadena, but she was not informed of the results until a week later, when she was competing across the country and the Pasadena venue had been dismantled. "By then it was impossible to go back and investigate."

Frustration with a harsh and rigid system may ultimately increase pressure for outside judicial review.

"There are cases where everyone doubts that justice has been done," says Bradley J. Andreozzi, a Chicago lawyer who has prosecuted and defended doping cases. He said the program is in danger of becoming "just a trap for the unwary."

But reforming the system could be costly. "The price of relaxing strict liability would be a period of less-stringent controls," said John Hoberman, an expert in doping policy at the University of Texas.

The cost of prosecuting authentic doping violations would go up, he predicted. "The payoff might be much better tests and not trampling on the rights of athletes who have all been thrown into one category labeled 'guilty,' " Hoberman said.

Many professionals within the system believe that the appeals process must become more flexible.

"We should have more discretion within certain parameters, such as in cases where there's no performance enhancement and no intent," said the longtime arbitrator, who asked to remain anonymous to avoid internal controversy.

USADA officials say they have proposed revisions to the WADA Code allowing arbitrators more latitude to reduce penalties in inadvertent cases — or to impose enhanced penalties in egregious cases.

But WADA's leaders are leaning in the opposite direction. Pound, for one, says the rules are already flexible enough to accommodate all situations that arise in individual cases.

"The system, as a system, is a pretty good one," he said. "It can be tweaked here or there, but we're not sitting down with a blank sheet of paper and redesigning the entire world anti-doping system."

Athletes' Unbeatable Foe (LAT)

The Los Angeles Times, December 10, 2006

Anti-doping authorities serve as prosecutor, judge and jury. The innocent often pay a high price.

The worldwide sports anti-doping program, created to fight performanceenhancing drug use in international athletics, imposes severe punishments for accidental or technical infractions, relies at times on disputed scientific evidence and resists outside scrutiny, a Times investigation has found.

Elite athletes have been barred from the Olympics, forced to relinquish medals, titles or prize money and confronted with potentially career-ending suspensions after testing positive for a banned substance at such low concentrations it could have no detectable effect on performance, records show.

They have been sanctioned for steroid abuse after taking legal vitamins or nutritional supplements contaminated with trace amounts of the prohibited compounds. In some cases, the tainted supplements had been provided by trusted coaches or trainers.

The findings emerge from a Times examination of more than 250 anti-doping cases involving runners, cyclists, skiers, tennis players and competitors in dozens of other sports from around the world.

Alain Baxter, 28, became the first Briton to win an Olympic medal in Alpine skiing, placing third in the slalom at the 2002 Winter Games in Salt Lake City. Two days later he tested positive for methamphetamine, a banned stimulant. He was forced to forfeit his bronze medal.

His offense? He had used a Vicks Vapor Inhaler bought in Utah to treat his chronic nasal congestion. Unlike the Vicks inhalers sold at home, the American version contained traces of a chemical structurally related to meth — though lacking its stimulative qualities.

Despite testimony from a Vicks scientist that the compounds differed, an arbitration panel hearing Baxter's case ruled that because anti-doping authorities regarded the chemicals as related, he was guilty.

"It never crossed my mind that it would be different from the British one," Baxter told the BBC upon returning home. "I didn't think I was doing anything wrong."

A 17-year-old Italian swimmer treating a foot infection with an antibiotic cream her mother bought over the counter failed a doping test at a swim meet in 2004. Neither Giorgia Squizzato nor her mother realized that the cream's ingredients included a prohibited steroid — or that applying it between her toes could result in a positive urine test.

Arbitrators in her case acknowledged that "the cream did not enhance the athlete's capacity" and hadn't "favored her performance."

Nevertheless, according to the anti-doping program's zero-tolerance, or "strict liability," policy, which treats an athlete as guilty regardless of how a substance got into his or her body, Squizzato was judged negligent. Her penalty: a one-year suspension.

Stringent anti-doping measures have become a fact of life for the thousands of athletes participating in national and international events since the creation of the World Anti-Doping Agency, or WADA, at an international sports conference in 1999. WADA's founding was prompted by a rash of doping scandals threatening the credibility of global sports.

What has evolved to protect competitive purity since then is a closed, quasi-judicial system without American-style checks and balances. Anti-doping authorities act as prosecutors, judge and jury, enforcing rules that they have written, punishing violations based on sometimes questionable scientific tests that they develop and certify themselves, while barring virtually all outside appeals or challenges.

WADA's authority stems from the World Anti-Doping Code, which has been adopted by 186 governments, including the United States, and hundreds of Olympic and international athletic organizations. Under its provisions, athletes competing in sanctioned events are subject to mandatory urine and blood testing at any competition.

Athletes also must submit to unannounced random tests and provide authorities with detailed calendars showing where they can be found at any time, even on vacation.

A test sample is typically divided into two vials, labeled "A" and "B." The "A" sample is the first to be tested. If it comes up positive for a banned substance, the athlete may demand a confirmation test of the "B" sample. If that is also positive, the code allows the agency to declare the athlete in violation of doping rules and impose a penalty ranging from a public warning to a lifetime ban. Generally, the athlete also is disqualified from the event at which the violation allegedly occurred.

An accused athlete's only recourse in the face of a doping charge is arbitration, under rules of evidence dictated by WADA and designed to give the authorities the benefit of all doubt.

In many countries, including the United States, athletes have no right to appeal an adverse arbitration ruling to the courts. In the vast majority of cases, including every case heard in the U.S., the arbitrators have upheld the violation.

Tests for banned substances may be performed only at one of the 34 labs around the world accredited by WADA. Athletes are not permitted to have their samples tested at any lab outside the agency's system. The rules also prohibit WADA labs from doing any tests in defense of an accused athlete.

WADA Chairman Richard W. Pound, 64, a Montreal lawyer, argues that the program must be so stringent and uncompromising to be effective against doping, which he calls "the biggest threat to sports."

"The less discretion there is in the finding of a doping offense, the better it is," he told The Times in an interview.

Pound, a former competitive swimmer who finished just out of medal contention at the 1960 Summer Olympics in Rome, dismissed the notion that a significant number of doping cases are accidental or inadvertent; WADA policy states that every athlete is responsible for everything he or she ingests or applies to the body. In the case of adulterated supplements, he said, "If you didn't know what was in there, it's your own damn fault." In the rare cases that an athlete can be proved truly faultless, he added, the system is flexible enough to temper its penalties.

"If you're captured by a squad of Nazi frogmen and injected with a steroid, you're going to be found positive," he told The Times. "But it wouldn't be a two-year suspension."

The effect of a doping allegation on an athlete's life is immediate and crushing.

"For people who have never had to deal with something like this, it's hard to grasp what it takes away from you," says Rachael Burke, 23, a swimmer at the University of Virginia, whose urine sample turned up in May 2004 with a trace of boldione, an obscure steroid, possibly from a contaminated nutritional drink. Burke had never had a positive result in any other test in more than a decade of competitive swimming.

"You have no idea what happened," she recalled in an interview. "You have no control over the fact that they are going to announce to the entire public that Rachael Burke, this girl that everyone has seen grow up in the spotlight, has tested positive for steroids. The next day, you have to walk on the pool deck and people are saying, 'I wonder if that's why you were so good when you were 8 years old.' You're accused and convicted without a chance to defend yourself."

Concerned that fighting the charge would cost her family tens of thousands of dollars in legal and professional fees and that the arbitration rules were stacked against her, she eventually agreed to a two-year suspension. The sanction knocked her out of international competition, but preserved her right to swim in NCAA events.

Cases like Burke's undermine the program's credibility, says John Ruger, a former Olympic biathlon competitor who serves as athletes' ombudsman of the United States Olympic Committee in Colorado Springs.

He asserted that the anti-doping system sweeps up "two, three, five people every year who are not intentionally cheating."

Ruger added: "If the anti-doping program is to succeed worldwide, athletes have to believe it's a fair process."

Travis T. Tygart, general counsel of the U.S. Anti-Doping Agency (USADA), WADA's largest national affiliate, disagrees with Ruger's figures. He said the agency goes to great lengths to ensure that only the guilty are punished. He said about 20% of all its potential cases are tossed out, leaving only those USADA regards as irrefutable.

"We're not in this to falsely accuse," Tygart said.

He and other anti-doping officials maintain that underground efforts to cheat with new "designer drugs" are a continuing problem, an allegation reinforced by revelations in the Bay Area Laboratory Co-Operative, or BALCO, case.

The lab allegedly provided dozens of professional and amateur athletes with undetectable performance-enhancing treatments. Through 2004, USADA said, 13 athletes had been sanctioned under WADA rules based on testimony and evidence in the BALCO case, including some who never tested positive for any steroid.

DOJ_NMG_0104223

Yet the international anti-doping program's own statistics cast some doubt on the concerns expressed by Pound and other officials about a sports world awash in drugs. Of USADA's thousands of tests per year, fewer than 0.5% have produced sanctions. Many of those were for prescription medications or substances with little or no performance-enhancing effect.

In 2005, for example, USADA conducted 8,175 tests and imposed sanctions on 20 athletes. Its testing program consumed $5.6 million that year, or 47% of a $12-million budget funded primarily by Congress.

Today the program is facing unprecedented controversy, the result of several high-profile cases.

One involves American sprinter Marion Jones, accused of failing an initial doping test last summer. She immediately rushed home from an international track meet in Switzerland. When her second "B" sample came up negative, the case against her appeared to collapse.

The case remains open, however. Pound has infuriated Jones' supporters by suggesting the negative second test may have been flawed. He told BBC radio he was worried "that someone is misinterpreting things or doing things wrong."

In another simmering controversy, California cyclist Floyd Landis, the 2006 Tour de France champion, is appealing USADA's charge that he doped with testosterone during the July endurance race. He denies taking any performance-enhancing drug and is demanding a public arbitration hearing.

Landis also has posted online (at http://www.floydlandis.com) the laboratory evidence against him, giving the public a rare inside glimpse of a doping dispute and the science behind it.

The records show, for example, careless bookkeeping errors. Samples attributed to Landis were recorded under several incorrect serial numbers. Also, results from multiple tests on the same samples, all by the same Paris lab, produced markedly inconsistent results.

The Landis camp contends the documents prove he is innocent. "There is no basis for a positive test," says Arnie Baker, a San Diego physician and cycling coach. He is consulting for the Landis defense. "How it got this far in the first place, I have no idea."

'A closed system'

Nestled among industrial shops on a short block in West Los Angeles, just across from a Bed Bath & Beyond, is the world's preeminent sports anti-doping laboratory.

The nondescript three-story UCLA Olympic Laboratory is the domain of Don H. Catlin, a professor of molecular and medical pharmacology at UCLA Medical School who has made the fight against sports doping his life's work.

Holding contracts not only with WADA but with the National Collegiate Athletic Assn. and the National Football League, the UCLA lab performs nearly four times as many blood and urine tests as the global runner-up, in Cologne, Germany. Its work is commonly considered the gold standard of sports doping science.

For all his expertise, however, Catlin is forbidden by WADA rules from testifying in defense of an athlete in a doping case. He and the lab's more than 40 employees are prevented by WADA rules from engaging in "testing or expert testimony that would call into question … the scientific validity of work performed in the anti-doping program."

Despite WADA's claims of "public transparency and accountability," it operates largely as a hermetically sealed scientific community with minimal public oversight.

WADA pays labs, usually one of those in its network, to develop tests for banned substances. It then is the sole arbiter of the test's scientific validity.

WADA determines threshold levels at which traces of a substance are deemed a violation.

And under WADA rules, the same lab that performs a positive test on an "A" sample also must conduct the confirming test on the "B" sample.

"You have a closed system where very few people in the world know what the science is, and the system has a vested interest to make sure its findings are confirmed," says David L. Black, president and chief executive of Nashville-based Aegis Sciences Corp., a large independent doping lab unaffiliated with WADA.

"The lab should just be a fact-gatherer, but the WADA system is designed in a way that the labs are not just objective fact gatherers, but part of the body of prosecution," Black said.

The EPO riddle

DOJ_NMG_0104224

No test in WADA's arsenal has drawn as much fire as its assay for synthetic erythropoietin, or EPO — a hormone that increases stamina.

EPO doping has been banned since the 1990s, when the synthetic version began to be used by athletes to improve their stamina. A urine test to identify artificial EPO was introduced in 2000 and has been refined several times since.

It is not a simple test. It can require 36 hours, scores of laboratory steps, sophisticated machinery and a high level of technical skills.

Unlike tests that produce empirical measurements or unmistakable indicators, such as litmus paper, the EPO test involves a significant level of interpretation. Because natural and synthetic EPO produce similar readings in the lab, even experienced technicians viewing the same results can differ in their conclusions.

Results also can be clouded by other natural substances in the sample or by poor lab technique.

"It's a more difficult test than others in that it doesn't give you a fingerprint," Catlin acknowledged in an interview, saying "the EPO test needs more work." However, he also called it "safe and defensible — we would not practice it if it were not."

Yet Catlin's lab produced perhaps the most conspicuous contradictory finding in an EPO test, leading to the apparent collapse of the doping case against sprinter Jones. The UCLA lab's test on her "B" urine sample failed to confirm its own positive finding on her "A" sample.

Catlin says the case represents the first such mismatch in an EPO test by his lab. He declined to discuss it further, because the matter is under investigation by WADA.

But Allen K. Murray, an Irvine biochemist who witnessed the confirmation test on Jones' behalf, says her "A" sample should never have been declared positive in the first place.

"I have very serious questions about the 'A' result," he said, arguing that the quantity of the sample in the "A" test was too low to give a clear reading and that the lab interpreted the relatively faint image too aggressively.

At worst, he said, the initial test should have been declared inconclusive.

Jones's case was not the first flub involving an EPO test.

In 2003, Kenyan distance runner Bernard Lagat was charged with EPO doping after a race in Switzerland. The charge was dropped when his "B" sample proved negative.

Evidence uncovered by Lagat's defense team revealed his sample had been grossly mishandled — transported for hours in a car at temperatures sometimes exceeding 100 degrees, then inadequately cooled at WADA's Cologne lab. His experts testified that those conditions promoted chemical reactions in his urine sample that could have produced a false positive result.

They cited numerous other shortcomings in the EPO test that they say rendered it prone to false positives.

Lagat, who had been suspended by Kenyan sports authorities and barred from the world track championships after the initial finding, was reinstated in time for the 2004 Olympics, where he won the silver medal in the 1,500-meters event.

But with his lawyers contending that Lagat's "reputation will be tarnished by the doping suspicion for the rest of his life," he sued WADA and international track authorities in a German court. He demanded about $650,000, the value of potential prize money and sponsorship contracts he said he lost during his suspension.

The German court ruled that it did not have jurisdiction in the case.

Meanwhile, after Belgian triathlete Rutger Beke was charged with EPO doping during a 2004 race, scientists from a Belgian university tested the hypothesis that under certain conditions, intense exercise by some athletes could produce a positive EPO test in the absence of doping.

The test was instrumental in persuading a Belgian court to nullify Beke's doping charge, one of the rare cases in which WADA's science was tested in court — not its own arbitration regime.

It remains the rarest of WADA cases: overturned.

Nandrolone cases surge

Beginning in the late 1990s, anti-doping authorities saw a surge in positive tests for substances related to the powerful steroid nandrolone, a phenomenon that would pose a special challenge for WADA's program.

DOJ_NMG_0104225

The reason was that WADA's own scientists knew that many cases were unintentional. Athletes, like the general public, were unaware that nutritional supplement makers were selling products contaminated with traces of nandrolone and other banned substances.

A statistical surge in nandrolone cases "allowed the testing program to puff out its chest and say, 'Look at how much we're doing,' " said Charles Yesalis, professor emeritus of health policy and administration at Penn State University and a leading expert on drug abuse in sports.

Studies performed by UCLA's Catlin and by researchers at the Cologne lab, then under the International Olympic Committee, showed in 2000 and 2002 that a wide range of nutritional supplements commonly taken by elite athletes were contaminated with nandrolone and other steroids.

Catlin's research, furthermore, made clear that it was not difficult for tests to distinguish a contamination victim from a cheater. His paper noted that an athlete taking nandrolone in a determined effort to cheat would show levels higher than 100,000 nanograms per milliliter, or parts per billion, of urine.

WADA's threshold for a doping violation, however, had been set in single digits: 2 parts per billion for men and 5 for women. It remains at that level today.

And anti-doping officials have continued to bring cases against athletes for positive tests almost certainly derived from contamination or for steroid levels that could not possibly have any performance-enhancing effect.

Irvine swimmer Kicker Vencill, for example, proved through lab tests in 2003 that the supplements he had taken were contaminated, causing his violation. He later sued the supplement maker in state court and won a $578,635 judgment.

Vencill appealed his suspension from international competition, but arbitrators concluded that the unwitting contamination of his multivitamins by the manufacturer did not relieve him of liability for consuming any banned substances.

"The evidence shows that the presence of a prohibited substance in the athlete's urine was caused by his ingestion of a prohibited substance — whether in a vitamin, a supplement or otherwise — for which the athlete bears complete responsibility."

The arbitrators upheld his two-year suspension, agreeing with USADA that he should receive the maximum penalty, "just as in any case of … 'intentional doping.' "

"In their opening and closing statements, USADA said they were going to prove me a cheater," said Vencill, recalling his arbitration hearings. "It's a war in there, and you're fighting for your character and your integrity."

Anti-doping officials are unapologetic about the nandrolone cases and officially skeptical of explanations of innocence.

"You've got to hear these things over and over again to understand what a mantra it is," Pound scoffed in an interview. "You've got to say, 'Come on. Get over it. You're filled with nandrolone.' "

But there also are hints of internal disagreement. One of the program's arbitrators agreed with an accused athlete that she had ingested trace amounts of nandrolone unintentionally in adulterated vitamins.

American cyclist Amber Neben had tested positive for a concentration of 6.9 parts per billion of the steroid after a Montreal race, 1.9 over the limit for women — but vastly short of any potential performance-enhancing effect.

Arbitrator Christopher L. Campbell favored imposing no penalty, arguing that the fight against doping should not harm "innocent victims of a poorly regulated vitamin supplement industry."

Campbell was outvoted. By a 2-1 margin, the arbitration panel suspended Neben for six months.

Zero Tolerance: Some Questionable Results From Anti-doping Case Files (LAT)

The Los Angeles Times, December 11, 2006

Brooke Blackwelder

34, Cyclist from Boise, Idaho

A gold medalist at the 1994 Goodwill Games, she tested positive in 2001 for steroids traced to "likely" contamination of nutrition aids. Arbitrators called her "a credit to her community and a role model to young women," but ruled that her lack of intent to dope was immaterial.

Result: an eight-month suspension.

Rickey Harris

24, Runner from Centreville, Va.

He was a top hurdler on the track and field team at the University of Florida in 2005 when he tested positive for Dexedrine, a medication for attention deficit disorder. Arbitrators agreed he was under the "mistaken belief" that he had provided paperwork for a waiver, but the school failed to file it.

Result: a one-year suspension.

Johannes Eder

27, Skier from Viehofen, Austria

Just before his cross-country relay at the 2006 Olympics, he suffered severe diarrhea. His physician, a former team doctor, advised by phone that he inject himself with a saltwater solution. Arbitrators agreed he was indeed seriously ill and his treatment could not have enhanced his performance.

Result: a one-year suspension, because the injection should have been done by a doctor.

Christine Ohuruogu

22, Runner from London

The 400-meter racer and top hopeful for London's 2012 Olympics missed three random drug tests. An independent disciplinary panel attributed it "only to forgetfulness." Members called her one-year suspension "very harsh" for an athlete "who had no intention" of cheating.

Result: a threatened lifetime Olympics ban is pending.

Giorgia Squizzato

17, Swimmer from Mestre, Italy

While competing in Germany, she used an antibiotic skin cream on a foot infection. Her urine tested positive for "a low concentration" of a steroid in the cream. Arbitrators said it "did not enhance the athlete's capacity," she did not intend to cheat, but she was negligent.

DOJ_NMG_0104228

Result: a one-year suspension.

Alain Baxter

28, Skier from Scotland

He took third in the slalom at the 2002 Winter Olympics but failed a drug test because he used a Vicks Vapor Inhaler made in the U.S., which unlike U.K. brands has a mild relative of a banned stimulant.

Result: a three-month suspension and forfeit of his Olympic bronze medal.

Meth Labs Abundant This Hunting Season (USAT)

By Judy Keen

USA Today, December 11, 2006

Hunters stalking deer and pheasant also are finding methamphetamine labs or their remnants in remote areas this fall.

Three Michigan hunters have discovered separate dumps of equipment and chemicals used to make the illegal drug, says State Police Lt. Chet Wilson. Hunters in Arkansas, Indiana and Tennessee have made similar finds.

The encounters can be risky, especially if someone is using the lab when a hunter discovers it. Approaching meth users while wearing "camouflage clothing and carrying a firearm can be a recipe for disaster," warns a hunting handbook published by South Dakota's Department of Game, Fish and Parks. It advises hunters to keep their distance and avoid contact with the solvents and acids used to "cook" the drug.

Methamphetamine is a highly addictive stimulant that can be injected, snorted, smoked or swallowed. It is made in home labs using cold pills and other easily purchased ingredients. The process creates a distinctive odor that's often compared to cat urine.

Federal and state laws restricting sales of cold tablets containing ephedrine or pseudoephedrine, key components of meth, have reduced the number of labs, law enforcement officials say.

"Due to a new law that bans sales of pseudoephedrine off the shelf, we have seen an extreme reduction in meth labs," says Rod Slings of the Iowa Department of Natural Resources' law enforcement bureau.

Those who still make meth are moving to isolated areas to escape detection.

"Wildlife areas are a place cookers can go and not risk having the neighbors next door turn them in," Slings says. Hunters there find labs or meth dumps several times each season, he says.

Hunters occasionally spot "tweakers" making meth in rural areas, but it's more common to find leftover equipment. Officials tell hunters to look for ordinary plastic coolers with hoses, gas cylinders and stained coffee filters. South Dakota's hunting handbook recommends hunters look for lye, iodine, brake cleaner and stained cookware.

"Hunters come across a cooler or some other type of containers, and they're curious, and they want to open them," says Wes Baxter, a sheriff's deputy in Craighead County, Ark. A hunter there recently found a cylinder with copper tubing, batteries and rubber gloves.

"We strongly encourage people not to touch these items," Baxter says. Hazardous-waste removal teams often are called in to dispose of the toxic equipment.

Natural resources and law enforcement officials use public-relations campaigns to warn about the dangers of meth gear. The Minnesota Deer Hunters Association sponsors public-service announcements on radio stations each fall to warn hunters to be on the lookout for meth labs. "How can people abuse our natural resources like this?" asks Mark Johnson, the group's executive director.

Lt. Carl Lamb of the Seymour, Ind., police department has conducted seminars for hundreds of area hunters and farmers. After the training sessions, he says, "They recognize what to look for and know not to mess with it."

Larry Dale, a hunter and hunting safety instructor in Petersburg, Ill., says hunters can be "useful eyes and ears" for law enforcement when they know how to identify meth-related equipment. The drug and its makers, he says, are "a general menace to society."

Afghan Poppies To Get Herbicide Spray (AP)

By Jason Straziuso

DOJ_NMG_0104229

AP, December 11, 2006

The top U.S. anti-drug official said Saturday that Afghan poppies would be sprayed with herbicide to combat an opium trade that produced a record heroin haul this year, a measure likely to anger farmers and scare Afghans unfamiliar with weed killers.

John Walters, the director of the U.S. Office of National Drug Control Policy, said Afghanistan could turn into a narco-state unless "giant steps" are made toward eliminating poppy cultivation.

"We cannot fail in this mission," he said. "Proceeds from opium production feed the insurgency and burden Afghanistan's nascent political institutions with the scourge of corruption."

Afghans are deeply opposed to spraying poppies. After nearly three decades of war, Western science and assurances can do little to assuage their fears of chemicals being dropped from airplanes. Because of those fears - and because crop dusters could be shot down by insurgents - spraying would need to be done on the ground.

The Afghan government has not publicly said it will spray, and President Hamid Karzai has said in the past that herbicides pose too big a risk, contaminating water and killing the produce that grows alongside poppies.

But Walters said Karzai and other officials have agreed to ground spraying.

"I think the president has said yes, and I think some of the ministers have repeated yes," Walters said without specifying when spraying would start. "The particulars of the application have not been decided yet, but yes, the goal is to carry out ground spraying."

Gen. Khodaidad, Afghanistan's deputy minister for counter-narcotics, said the government hadn't made any decisions yet. But a top Afghan official close to Karzai said the issue was being looked at closely.

"We are thinking about it; we are looking into it. We're just trying to see how the procedure will go," said the official, who spoke on condition of anonymity because of the sensitivity of the issue.

Opium production in Afghanistan this year rose 49 percent to 6,700 tons - enough to make about 670 tons of heroin. That's more than 90 percent of the world's supply and more than the world's addicts consume in a year.

A U.S. official who asked not to be named told The Associated Press last month that if Afghans don't spray in 2007 "there's going to be a lot of pressure on the government for spraying ... a lot of pressure from the U.S."

At the news conference Saturday, Walters tried to emphasize to the largely Afghan media members in attendance that spraying was perfectly safe. He said the herbicide glyphosate - sold commercially in the United States under the name Roundup - would be used, and that it was a safe and common weed killer.

He said the U.S. uses glyphosate to spray marijuana plants in Hawaii and that it's also used against coca plants in Colombia.

"We are not experimenting on the people of Afghanistan," he said. "We are not using a chemical that has a history of questionable effects on the environment."

Walters said he didn't expect the fight against poppies "to be a one-year success story." A recent U.N. report said it would take a generation - 20 years - to defeat the drug trade in Afghanistan.

To Save Lives In New Jersey (NYT)

The New York Times, December 11, 2006

Intravenous drug addicts who become infected by sharing contaminated needles and then pass on the infections to spouses, lovers and their unborn children account for about half of the AIDS cases in New Jersey. The state's drug-related infection rate is said to be twice the national average.

These tragic statistics cry out for life-saving programs that slow the spread of infection by giving addicts access to sterile syringes. At the moment, however, New Jersey is the only state that is still resisting this proven AIDS-prevention strategy.

The Legislature can bring the state into line with long-established medical policy — and save lives in the bargain — if it passes a set of bills that would establish municipal syringe exchange programs.

Needle access programs have the overwhelming support of the medical, social service and AIDS prevention communities. Nonetheless, some lawmakers are afraid of supporting them publicly for fear that they will be accused of encouraging drug use.

DOJ_NMG_0104230

But that is simply not the case. Data from across this country and abroad show that needle exchange actually slows the spread of disease without increasing intravenous drug use. Thanks to the effectiveness of these clean needle programs, their value is no longer in doubt.

New Jersey lawmakers should bear this in mind as they approach the vote. A vote for the needle access program is a vote for saving the lives of men, women and unborn children. A vote against the program is a vote for more infections, higher medical costs and more unnecessary deaths.

TAX:

IRS Employees Return Nearly 6 Months After Flooding Closed Headquarters (column) (WP)

By Stephen Barr

The Washington Post, December 10, 2006

Susan Hedeler is going home -- to eleven-eleven, as she calls it.

The Internal Revenue Service headquarters building, at 1111 Constitution Ave. NW, has reopened, almost six months after heavy rains flooded the basement and sub-basement, destroying electrical and air-conditioning equipment.

Hedeler is set to be in her sixth-floor office this morning and to get back to old routines, including a breakfast stop at a favorite eatery. She will no longer be one of the "displaced," working from home or from IRS offices in New Carrollton.

Her commute to 1111 will take about 30 minutes -- a vast improvement over the 90 minutes she spent on buses and trains traveling from her Northern Virginia home to New Carrollton. Her workday will be smoother, , with colleagues nearby and a complete set of reference files not far from her desk.

The June flooding came as Hedeler's office, media and publications, was ramping up production of tax forms, instruction sheets and other material for the 2007 tax filing season. Managers were at an outside-the-Beltway retreat, but the management meeting quickly turned into a planning session when the staff learned that the flood had closed the headquarters for what officials initially projected would be 30 days.

"It was rather fortuitous that we were all there," Hedeler said. Managers went to work contacting employees and figuring out who worked on critical programs and needed to be given offices first.

By mid-July, all of the publications staff had been assigned temporary cubicles and offices in New Carrollton. But the staff kept up with their work, even as they waited for offices, because many could work elsewhere on their laptops.

"It was a bit of a challenge," Hedeler recalled. Employees used to working together on one floor of the downtown headquarters were spread across three buildings at New Carrollton. Although the IRS moved computers and files from downtown to the temporary offices, there were times when employees had to hunt down documents or try to retrieve them electronically.

"Some of the things I thought weren't necessary to take with me, I missed while I was there," Hedeler said. Still, she added, "you can't take everything with you."

Despite the sense of camping out in New Carrollton, Hedeler said she had "positive experiences," such as meeting new people and forging new working relationships.

The IRS accommodated many employees by putting them on flexible work schedules and allowing them to work at home and at telecommuting centers. Hedeler said that she worked from home "a couple of days a week" and that "being able to be hooked up to the computer at home certainly made my life a lot easier."

But she missed working at the IRS headquarters. She returned once to get some work material and ran into her boss. "We both sort of simultaneously said, 'This is so sad.' It was. It was like someone or something had died. It was an eerie feeling."

The June 25 torrential downpour shut down the IRS, Justice Department, National Archives and other buildings in the low-lying Federal Triangle. But the flooding sunk the IRS.

An estimated 5.5 million gallons of water flooded the basement and sub-basement at 1111, almost enough to fill the tank where killer whales live and perform at SeaWorld in Orlando.

The sub-basement, which was under 20 feet of water, held the building's electrical transformers, electrical switch gears and chillers. In the basement, the flooding damaged food service areas, computer equipment and offices.

DOJ_NMG_0104231

The General Services Administration has spent more than $25 million on repairs, which will be finished in April.

More than 2,000 employees work in the building and will return in phases. A group of about 400 returned Friday, and more than 600 come back today. An additional 800 employees will be back by Dec. 19, and the remainder will return after Jan. 1, the IRS said.

Hedeler, the senior staff assistant to the IRS director of media and publications, said her office adhered to its production schedule for forms and documents, despite the disruption caused by the flooding.

She laughed and said, "You're going to get your 1040, don't worry."

CONGRESS-ADMINISTRATION:

At Session's End, Congress Cuts Taxes (CSM)

By Gail Russell Chaddock

The Christian Science Monitor, December 11, 2006

In a final, late-night surge of legislating, the 109th Congress passed $45 billion in tax cuts and a trade package affecting at least 150 developing nations, as well as a range of smaller bills on issues from healthcare to energy. But they left most of the current fiscal year's spending decisions to the next Congress.

It was the last gasp of a lame-duck Congress caught between two majorities - and ready to go home. With Democrats poised to take control of both the House and Senate next month, Republicans used their final hours in charge of Congress to make good on promises to many of Washington's most powerful interests as well as to American families they hope to woo back in 2008.

The 11th-hour output includes popular tax extenders, such as the research and development tax credit for businesses and the tax break for college tuition. It also includes more controversial provisions, such as opening some 8.3 million acres along the Gulf Coast to oil and gas drilling, and a trade deal with Haiti that could hurt US textile interests.

Meanwhile, Democrats say the outgoing "do nothing" Republican Congress met rarely and accomplished little. On Friday, House majority leader-elect Steny Hoyer (D) of Maryland announced there would be more five-day work weeks in the next Congress "to address the critical issues facing our nation and fulfill our responsibility to oversee the executive branch." (Under GOP control, the Washington work week was about 2.5 days.)

In the final days, Republicans faced their greatest opposition from within their own ranks. "This is an embarrassing situation to be chairman of [the] Budget Committee in a Republican Congress and to have a bill brought to the floor that does such damage to the budget," said Sen. Judd Gregg (R) of New Hampshire in a floor speech directed mainly to his GOP colleagues Friday night.

As late as Friday, eight senators from textile states were threatening to block the omnibus trade and tax bill unless a proposal to lift tariffs on clothing manufactured in Haiti was removed. They said it would open US markets even further to unfair competition from China, but they fell short of the votes needed to prevail.

"It's stunning that the House leadership and Senate as its last act before it adjourns is going to ramrod a job-destroying trade bill past the Congress," said Auggie Tantillo, executive director of the American Manufacturing Trade Action Coalition, before Friday's vote.

In response, backers said the trade package, including permanent normal trade relations with Vietnam, will lower costs for US manufacturers and consumers.

"This legislation will help to create stronger trading partners for the future, while also recognizing our responsibility as having one of the world's strongest economies to help developing countries grow," said House Ways and Means Chairman Bill Thomas (R) of California in a statement after the 212-to-184 House vote.

The 109th Congress also voted to postpone completing nine of 11 FY 2007 spending bills until Feb. 15, forcing Democrats to take up divisive spending issues as they are ramping up in the next Congress.

"It's real act of defiance by the lame-duck Congress and a conscious attempt to set up a political problem for the next Congress," says Julian Zelizer, a congressional historian at the Boston University.

DOJ_NMG_0104232

"It's more than just leaving a budgetary mess. It's creating a huge problem in how Democrats will solve the tension within their party between fiscal conservatives and those who want to start new spending initiatives and how Democrats will deal with corruption and whole pork-barrel issues," he adds.

GOP Lawmakers Add Provision To Passing Tax Package (WP)

By Jeffrey H. Birnbaum And Lori Montgomery

The Washington Post, December 11, 2006

Republican lawmakers, with little public debate, quietly added a billion-dollar health-care benefit to legislation that was rushed through Congress just before it adjourned Saturday morning.

Acting at the urging of several major business lobbies eager to reduce their medical-insurance costs and the outgoing chairman of the House's tax-writing committee, lawmakers adopted the provision even though only a single committee had previously approved it.

The provision, which materialized without fanfare late last week inside a massive tax-cut measure, expands the amount of money that can be contributed tax-free to health savings accounts (HSAs). The accounts can be used to pay medical bills and for other health-related coverage.

The legislation allows anyone to shelter thousands of dollars annually in HSAs, regardless of how much that person pays for a health-insurance deductible. Current law limits HSA contributions to the amount of a person's deductible. The expansion would cost the government $1 billion in lost tax revenue over the next decade.

Democrats, who will take control of Congress next month, have generally opposed the expansion. But supporters said that House Ways and Means Committee Chairman Bill Thomas (R-Calif.) championed it and pressed it through to final approval in the wee hours Saturday morning.

A coalition of high-profile corporate organizations, which pushed for the legislation, spent last week deploying lobbyists across Capitol Hill and urging their members back home to write letters and place phone calls to lawmakers. The U.S. Chamber of Commerce, the National Federation of Independent Business, the American Bankers Association, the Business Roundtable and several insurance companies belonged to the coalition, according to Paul Dennett, vice president for health policy of the American Benefits Council, a leading participant in the group.

Even the advocates doubted until the last minute that their provision would succeed.

"We nicknamed [ourselves] the 'Keep Hope Alive Coalition,' " Dennett said. "It seemed that the provision might fall off the wagon."

That it remained in the bill was thanks largely to Thomas, who "quite clearly played the strongest role," Dennett said, adding, "In Democratic offices, this was something they didn't want to do."

Organized labor, a major backer of Democrats, has disparaged HSAs as a way for companies to unload more of the cost of medical coverage on their workers.

The American Benefits Council, meanwhile, has argued that HSAs allow both employees and employers to save money. Dennett said the newly approved provision merely improves the program, which was first enacted in 2003 and now is used by more than 3 million Americans.

"These are modest but sensible kinds of things that need to be done," he added.

The Ways and Means Committee approved the provision in late September, right before Congress adjourned for the midterm elections. The legislation was passed neither in the Senate nor on the House floor until it was okayed as part of the larger bill last weekend.

"This has been a clear Republican priority and there was an opportunity . . . to move this package of good legislation," said Ianthe Jackson, spokeswoman for the Ways and Means Committee. "This is something that Mr. Thomas believes in, and making minor adjustments will help these accounts continue to grow."

HSAs were created to encourage people to choose high-deductible insurance plans, take control of their health-care spending and, ultimately, bring down medical costs. High-deductible plans are increasingly popular among employers because they are less expensive than traditional plans. HSAs allow families enrolled in such plans to sock away money tax-free to pay their out-of-pocket expenses. Under current law, annual contributions to the accounts are limited to the amount of a person's annual insurance deductible and cannot exceed $2,700 for an individual or $5,450 for a family.

Under the new law, if it is signed by President Bush as expected, any health savings account holder could choose to shelter the maximum amount, which is scheduled to increase next year to $2,850 for individuals and $5,650 for families.

The HSA provision was one of several pro-business items that managed to get through Congress at the eleventh hour. The tax measure revived more than 20 tax breaks, at a cost of $38 billion over five years, and nearly a dozen credits promoting alternative energy sources. It also opened 8.3 million acres in the Gulf of Mexico to oil and gas drilling and prevented a 5 percent cut in Medicare payments to doctors from taking effect Jan. 1.

Health savings accounts were not publicly identified as part of those negotiations until Thursday, after House and Senate negotiators, including Thomas and Senate Finance Committee Chairman Charles E. Grassley (R-Iowa), emerged from an early-morning session with an agreement about what the final package would include. Hours later, the Ways and Means Committee released an explanation of that legislation, with the expansion of health savings accounts slipped in among 22 tax breaks, 11 energy measures and nearly 30 "other provisions."

In a news release, Thomas called the package "a bipartisan compromise that is 'must-do' work in Congress this year." He urged "my House and Senate colleagues to approve it quickly."

They did so after midnight Saturday, with both chambers giving overwhelming approval to the legislation. The HSA provision was barely mentioned in the closing congressional debate.

Congress Bolsters Health-Care Initiatives (WSJ)

By Sarah Lueck

The Wall Street Journal, December 11, 2006

WASHINGTON -- As Congress ended its session, lawmakers authorized billions of dollars in spending to shore up government health initiatives -- from funding for Medicare and medical research to antibioterrorism efforts -- passing legislation that included provisions aimed at injecting more transparency and accountability into the programs.

Congress agreed to pay physicians a bonus in exchange for more data on the quality of care provided to Medicare's elderly and disabled beneficiaries. In addition, the National Institutes of Health stands to get a boost in funding for research, but also must set up an electronic tracking system that would help Congress monitor how its grants are used.

States and local governments will continue to receive federal grants to help them prepare for health emergencies, such as a bioterrorism attack, but they will have to show the federal government that they are making progress, or risk losing the money.

The changes underscore that as the government's health-related responsibilities grow Congress and many policy makers want more for its money. And in the face of big disagreements over how to solve some major health issues on the horizon, lawmakers are pushing incremental changes that could pave the way for broader solutions down the line.

This is clearest in Medicare, the federal health program that covers more than 40 million elderly and disabled people. Congress agreed to erase a scheduled reduction in payments to physicians, but it made a 1.5% bonus payment available only to physicians who report to Medicare how they perform on certain specified barometers of health-care quality. Initially, the payments will be based on whether the physician reports the data, but the system lays the groundwork for higher payments to better-performing physicians.

Among the information Medicare officials will collect: whether doctors provide aspirin and beta blockers to patients having heart attacks, and whether elderly patients are screened for their risk of falls. These practices are considered indicators of good patient care.

Hospitals, too, will have greater responsibility for reporting quality-of-care data. While most hospitals already have been doing quality reporting on inpatient care, the new legislation requires them to do so for outpatient services to receive the full payment scheduled under law for those services. Congress added an additional wrinkle to the program in the latest legislation, requiring the Department of Health and Human Services to consider ways that the hospital data could be made available to the public.

DOJ_NMG_0104234

The quality-reporting provisions may well prompt criticism from health-care providers. Already, the American Medical Association, while praising the payments Congress awarded its physician members, said it has "concerns" about the quality-reporting system.

The Medicare changes were part of a tax bill Congress passed before heading home.

Separately, the House and Senate also worked out their differences on a complex package of health legislation that lumped reauthorization of the Ryan White CARE Act, which funds state-level treatment of people with HIV and AIDS, with a reorganization of the NIH and anti-bioterrorism initiatives.

The NIH provisions, a top priority of House Energy and Commerce Chairman Joe Barton (R., Texas), would provide the $30 billion-a-year agency a boost of about $4.5 billion in the next two years. Congress still must appropriate the funds.

Mr. Barton has criticized the NIH for being a "hodgepodge of different interests," and insisted on greater collaboration and transparency at the agency. In addition to a new requirement to track grants electronically, the legislation calls for the NIH director to send biennial progress reports to Congress on research activities. The legislation also sets up a "common fund," valued at $1.5 billion next year, which the NIH director controls and can spend on research involving more than one of the agency's institutes.

On bioterrorism, Congress passed new requirements for the secretary of health and human services to set benchmarks for states and localities receiving federal grant money to prepare for health emergencies. States also must begin matching the funds in 2009, and they must perform regular drills and exercises to identify weaknesses in their emergency-response systems and report what they find to the federal government.

The health package also calls for a $1 billion in grants to biotechnology firms developing drugs and vaccines for bioterrorism-related illnesses and infectious diseases. The money, a response to criticism of the government's beleaguered $5.6 billion Bioshield program, is intended to help companies through the so-called Valley of Death, a period in the start-up process when they need to conduct costly research and scale-up manufacturing capabilities but don't yet have products that translate into government contracts or private investment. Congress also gave the federal government more flexibility to award periodic payments when the companies meet predetermined milestones.

Congressional action "sends a signal" that the government is committed to funding the bioterrorism sector, said John Clerici, a lawyer at McKenna Long & Aldridge who represents biodefense clients. The bill would benefit many of the small biotech firms focusing on this type of research and was supported by some venture-capital firms because they have invested in the sector or would like to.

Crucial to getting the health package through Congress was an agreement to redistribute funds in the State Children's Health Insurance Program, which provides grants to help states cover low-income children. Mr. Barton initially objected to a plan that would have given unspent SCHIP funds from one group of states—including Texas—and given them to other states that are facing shortfalls in their programs, such as Massachusetts and Rhode Island. But the final deal capped the money shifted away from Texas at $20 million, and Mr. Barton agreed to move the other health legislation through the House. He also won Senate passage of his NIH changes.

Congress also changed the funding formula in the Ryan White program, which provides grants to states and cities for treatment of people with AIDS. Now, cases of HIV—not just full-blown AIDS—also will be counted when the federal government is deciding how to dole out the money, a move that shifts resources to states, including many in the South, with relatively newer epidemics of the disease. Lawmakers from states with more long-running epidemics, including New York, New Jersey and California, had objected to the change. The final agreement lessened the blow to those places.

US Lawmakers Exit With A Last Nod To Oil Drilling (CSM)

By Brad Knickerbocker

Christian Science Monitor, December 11, 2006

As one of its final acts, the 109th Congress Friday approved opening to oil and gas development 8.3 million previously protected acres off the Gulf Coast - a last bid to influence energy and environmental policy before the Democrats assume control.

DOJ_NMG_0104235

Industry officials are pleased; environmentalists much less so.

"Let's hope this is Congress's one last fling with Big Oil and that we can make a fresh start to achieving true energy security with ... the new Congress," said Carl Pope, Sierra Club executive director, in a statement.

But John Engler, National Association of Manufacturers president, says exploring the outer continental shelf is "critical to the US economy." Just how critical depends on the cost of development and on whether other sources of gas and oil are sought and found as well.

For example, the Bush administration is considering lifting a ban on drilling in Bristol Bay, Alaska, imposed by Congress after the 1989 Exxon Valdez oil spill in Prince William Sound. But congressional resistance to such energy-extraction efforts - including in the Arctic National Wildlife Refuge - is likely to mount after Democrats take control of the House and Senate.

Democrats, for their part, say they'll close what they see as loopholes in a program requiring companies to pay royalties on oil pumped on US property. Critics - including the Government Accountability Office and the US Interior Department's inspector general - say officials have not enforced the collection of royalty payments amounting to tens of billions of dollars.

Interior's IG recently found that the number of departmental audits and auditors had declined markedly since 2000. As a result, the investigation found, just 20 percent of firms involved in oil and gas development and 9 percent of properties had been examined in the past three years. Interior often relies on oil companies to report the amount of resources extracted on federal land, which forms the basis for royalty payments.

Testifying before Congress in September, Interior's Inspector General Earl Devaney said the agency operates in a culture that "sustains managerial irresponsibility and a lack of accountability." In defense of their record, Interior officials note that audits in fiscal year 2006 covered 73 percent of revenues, up from 46 percent in 2003.

Still, the IG report led R.M. "Johnnie" Burton, director of Interior's Minerals Management Service, to pledge to strengthen procedures, improve administrative controls, and enhance tracking systems.

Under the Gulf Coast drilling bill passed Friday, 37.5 percent of royalties will go to Louisiana, Texas, Mississippi, and Alabama; 12.5 percent to land and water conservation programs; and 50 percent to the US treasury. To win over Florida lawmakers, the bill disallowed drilling within 125 miles of the Florida coast.

Congress Approves Bill To Criminalize 'Pretexting' (WSJ)

By David Rogers And Robert Guy Matthews

The Wall Street Journal, December 11, 2006

WASHINGTON -- Spurred by the Hewlett-Packard Co. scandal, Congress approved legislation that would make it a federal crime to obtain an individual's telephone records without his or her approval.

The measure spells out new federal criminal penalties for those who buy and sell such fraudulently obtained records. The White House said President Bush will sign the measure.

The bill targets "pretexting" tactics, where investigators use schemes to impersonate their target and gain access to private phone records. Investigators hired by H-P used the strategy this year when investigating who leaked information to reporters.

About 12 states have made telephone pretexting a crime, but there is currently no clear federal prohibition. Former H-P Chairman Patricia Dunn and several others were charged in the pretexting scandal for violations of California's state privacy laws. Ms. Dunn has pleaded not guilty.

Journalists and media organizations that purchase confidential records knowing they were obtained without the consumer's consent could be subject to fines of as much as $500,000 and imprisonment for as much as 10 years. Additional penalties would be imposed in cases where the information is used to commit further federal crimes or causes substantial financial harm, for example, to a consumer whose identity has been stolen.

The law contains an exception for law-enforcement agencies.

Until recently, telephone pretexting has existed in a murky legal realm, and federal regulators and state attorneys general often have been forced to bring cases under general consumer protection or antifraud statutes.

DOJ_NMG_0104236

Many consumer advocates called the bill an important first step to quash pretexting, but they warned that the bill does nothing to prevent people from using impersonation methods to gain access to private details on electricity, gas, and water-and-sewage bills.

"The legislation leaves open the wider issue of pretexting to get all forms of consumer records," said Rob Douglas, an information-security consultant and editor of PrivacyToday.com. "I would hope that this would continue to be an issue for the next Congress."

Some consumer advocates wanted the legislation to go further, forcing phone companies to increase their security procedures. Phone companies were against more-stringent mandates, saying they were victims along with their customers, of fraudulent pretexting.

"This legislation focuses on the criminal," said Joe Farren, spokesman for CTIA-The Wireless Association, a cellular-carriers trade group. "What we shouldn't be doing is trying to blame the victim."

Pretexting isn't a new issue. In 1999, Congress passed legislation making it illegal to obtain financial records using the scheme.

Democrats Can Smell The Pork (WP)

By Robert D. Novak

The Washington Post, December 11, 2006

The sterile, confused lame-duck session of the Republican-controlled 109th Congress ended with a quiet victory by reformers that staved off an estimated 10,000 earmarks. But it could not be called a farewell to pork. As the House approached adjournment Thursday, Democrats signaled they may countenance a return to free and easy spending ways when they assume the majority Jan. 4.

The hero of the lame-duck session was freshman Republican Sen. Jim DeMint of South Carolina. He was instrumental in blocking a Senate-House conference on a military construction appropriations bill, which would then be used as the last train out of town to carry pork. But just as the reformers were cheering Thursday, a coalition of Republicans and Democrats defeated a procedure designed to inhibit Pentagon earmarks.

That leaves an unanswered question for the new Democratic majority. Rep. Rahm Emanuel, the dynamic new member of the House Democratic leadership, has exhorted colleagues not to forget that their campaign against the Republican "climate of corruption" brought them into power. But does Emanuel's concept of reform go beyond new lobbyist control regulations and extend to the bipartisan addiction to pork-barrel spending?

The first closed-door meeting of Republican senators after their drubbing in the election erupted in discord after the leadership laid out plans for an omnibus spending bill, putting all unfinished appropriations bills in one package. That would provide a cornucopia of earmarks for members of Congress to bring home to their constituents.

But DeMint rose to make clear that he and his fellow freshman Republican, Sen. Tom Coburn of Oklahoma, would use the many parliamentary devices at their disposal to block an omnibus bill. Their alternative was what is called a continuing resolution, extending spending at its present level into February. That meant the lame-duck session would be porkless.

Sen. Ted Stevens, the old appropriator renowned for delivering pork home to Alaska, erupted with an exhibition of his famous hair-trigger temper. Sen. Thad Cochran, a courtly Southern gentleman and Stevens's successor as Appropriations Committee chairman, made the case in calmer language. Sen. John McCain, happy to have two Senate rookies pick up the anti-pork mantle he has carried for many years, was making snide comments in a stage whisper. But DeMint was not about to be moved by either threats or persuasion. The military construction bill was the last vehicle suitable for earmarks. The formidable Sen. Kay Bailey Hutchison of Texas, the Appropriations subcommittee chairman handling that measure, was determined to conclude action on it in a Senate-House conference. With uncharacteristic anger last week, a frustrated Cochran said he was not about to take dictation from two freshman senators. But they blocked the conference from taking place.

As this became clear Thursday, a second triumph for the reformers loomed with apparent imminent passage of Coburn's "report card," under which the Pentagon would grade earmarks on a scale of A to F. Before the election recess, the Senate voted

96 to 1 to add that proposal to the Defense appropriations bill. But the fix was in. The House removed the Coburn amendment by a 394 to 32 vote, while promising to consider it as a free-standing bill in the lame-duck session.

House Armed Services Committee Chairman Duncan Hunter went on the House floor Thursday to approve the report card. But the appropriators struck back. Rep. Bill Young, chairman of the Defense appropriations subcommittee, argued: "I don't want the Pentagon having to spend all that time grading the work that we in the Congress do." Rep. Ike Skelton, Hunter's Democratic successor, said the next Congress "will offer a better approach." Young and Skelton both predicted the report card would inhibit earmarking. The proposal was voted down on Friday, 330 to 70, with only two Democrats voting for it.

The issue of spending reform is in Democratic hands. Emanuel, the newly elected House Democratic Caucus chairman, e-mailed colleagues Nov. 17 with a call for reform. The takeover of the House that he led as Democratic Congressional Campaign Committee chairman, Emanuel said, sent a message that "it's time for a change, and change starts by cleaning up Washington."

But in reiterating the Democratic campaign's promises to "reform lobbying and ethics rules," Emanuel did not mention the corrupting influence of earmarks.

We Passed Vital Laws (USAT)

USA Today, December 11, 2006

The Congressional session that just concluded actually leaves a solid record of achievement for America. The House and Senate both worked to protect our country, crack down on crime, promote a strong economy, improve education and approve sensible judges in a fair manner.

In particular, Congress passed and the president signed bills to establish special tribunals for accused terrorists, begin securing our border, rein in North Korea's nuclear ambitions, crack down on methamphetamine, track pedophiles, extend tax relief, open markets to U.S. exports, cut spending, secure pensions, encourage retirement savings, update bankruptcy laws, create a Google-like search engine for federal spending, and establish new scholarships for students in fields important to the economy's future. The Senate confirmed two new Supreme Court justices and reduced federal judicial vacancies to their lowest level in 20 years. The president will also soon sign legislation to increase domestic energy production and forge nuclear power cooperation agreement with India.

Nonetheless, some widely supported measures fell victim to obstructionist tactics. Democrats, for example, blocked popular proposals to make it easier for small businesses to buy health coverage for their employees, reform our broken medical liability system, do more adult stem cell research, and increase the minimum wage.

It's clear, likewise, that "values" issues such as marriage protection and flag burning have broad appeal with the public as a whole. Voters in 27 states have approved marriage protection amendments, and all 50 state legislatures have called for a constitutional amendment to ban flag burning. When such a popular groundswell exists, then Congress should act.

Some problems Congress faces stem from systemic flaws in America's processes. No matter who has been in charge, all appropriations bills have passed on time on only three occasions in the past 30 years. Improving things will require a strong mutual commitment on the part of the White House and the leadership in both houses of Congress to reform the spending process, fix entitlements, tackle earmarks and eliminate the deficit.

Much work remains ahead, but I'm proud of all the vital laws that did get through.

Bill Frist, R-Tenn., is the outgoing Senate majority leader.

109th Congress' Big Success: Lowering The Achievement Bar (USAT)

USA Today, December 11, 2006

In the end, nothing became the 109th Congress so much as its going, which it finally did Saturday on the heels of an ethics report that seemed to symbolize two years of feckless behavior. Even some key Republicans left town lamenting a record of failure.

DOJ_NMG_0104238

The House ethics committee blistered Speaker Dennis Hastert and other Republicans for ignoring a decade of warnings that Rep. Mark Foley, who resigned in disgrace this fall, was trying to sexually exploit male pages. But, with typical toothlessness, the panel found no violation of the rules and meted out no punishment.

That's pretty much the story of the past two years: Anything went if it helped preserve GOP power, but very little was achieved to address the nation's problems. The successes of 12 years of Republican rule, most notably welfare reform, were concentrated in the first four — before fundraising, cozy relationships with lobbyists and exercising the perks of office overrode the promises of integrity, fiscal responsibility and limited government that brought Republicans to power.

As Sen. John McCain, R-Ariz., put it: "We came to change Washington, and Washington changed us."

The 2005-06 House and Senate met for fewer days than any Congress did in the past half century — fewer even than the "do-nothing Congress" President Harry Truman railed at in 1948, which passed the Marshall Plan that helped rebuild postwar Europe.

The 109th boasts nothing that comes close. A pretty good pension reform. Hurricane Katrina relief. Some help for free trade. An energy bill that hasn't made much difference. A bankruptcy bill that helps business and hurts consumers. A bill weakening protections against torture. And tax cuts, unmatched by spending cuts, that sent the nation deeper into deficits that the Republicans created.

The Senate Republican Policy Committee released a 26-page "major accomplishments" list that included — not making this up — a resolution allowing senators and their aides to ask each other for donations for Katrina victims.

It's not as if there wasn't important work to do. Social Security and Medicare are two years closer to fiscal disaster. Cities are enacting immigration laws because Congress never agreed on reform. Despite numerous scandals, there was no serious effort at ethics fixes. For partisan reasons, Congress virtually abandoned oversight even of the Iraq war.

What Congress often did instead was to indulge in divisive, time-wasting debates that fired up the GOP base. Flag burning. Gay marriage. The controversy over removing Terri Schiavo's feeding tube.

Congress even punted its most basic job: approving all 11 annual spending bills that keep the government's lights on.

Some Republicans' cluelessness was clear in their words. Rep. Mike Pence, R-Ind., complained that he and his colleagues were just too "tired" to do any serious work in their lame duck session. The three-day weeks must have been exhausting.

None of this says the Democrats will do better. They're already showing signs of reneging on campaign promises to improve ethics, rein in pork-barreling and implement 9/11 commission proposals. In fact, the Republicans were evicted because they became the very image of the corrupt and arrogant Democrats they overthrew in 1994.

Now it's up to resurgent Democrats to fulfill the promises they made to voters and build a better record. They'll have at least one thing going for them: It's a low bar.

Good Fish News (WP)

The Washington Post, December 11, 2006

BEFORE LEAVING town, Congress passed an important piece of legislation for the health of America's oceans. Two commissions in recent years have concluded that only bold policies can prevent the collapse of coastal ecosystems. The bill, which reauthorized and improved upon the nation's fisheries management laws, wasn't bold enough and contained a few unfortunate compromises, but it represents progress.

Fisheries management is hugely important. When it's done poorly, the result is the disappearance of fish stocks, serious economic hardship for coastal communities and untold environmental damage. When it is done effectively -- as in Alaska -- the result is a win-win for environmental and economic interests. The keys are the responsible use of science in setting catch levels, a firm ban on overfishing and insistence that depleted stocks be permitted to rebuild.

Congress's first accomplishment was in generally rejecting efforts to weaken the rules -- which, given where the debate started, was no small thing. The bill clarified that regional fisheries councils, some of which have permitted overfishing of depleted stocks, must stop doing that. It obliged the councils to follow the advice of their scientific committees in setting annual catch limits. While a provision providing firm accountability for exceeding such limits got watered down, the insistence on science reflects a substantial and important change.

Assuming the councils respect Congress's will, the bill will move American fishing toward sustainable levels. It also has strong provisions regarding destructive methods of fishing on the high seas that will strengthen the hand of the administration, which has been trying in international negotiations to stop such practices in international waters.

The bill is a good start. It shows that the dire warnings of oceanic death have opened some eyes among policymakers.

Pelosi Piques Public's Interest (LAT)

By Faye Fiore

The Los Angeles Times, December 11, 2006

WASHINGTON — When Nancy Pelosi appeared on national television on the morning after voters returned the House to Democratic hands, Leon Rebibo's phone started ringing in Los Angeles.

A pearl wholesaler, Rebibo fielded calls from more than four dozen women of all political stripes who wanted a muted, multicolor strand of South Sea Tahitian pearls, just like the one Pelosi was wearing.

"I'm very disappointed the Democrats won, but I absolutely love her necklace. If my husband hears me, he's going to kill me," Rebibo recalled one Republican woman whispering into the phone.

As Pelosi prepares to be sworn in Jan. 4 as the first female speaker of the House, she has become an object of fascination and curiosity in political circles and beyond. Barbara Walters interviewed her as one of the year's 10 most fascinating people. People magazine has written about her twice in recent weeks. An article in a Palm Springs newspaper ran with the headline: "How To Get the Nancy Pelosi Look." (Answer: an Armani suit.)

Only weeks ago, Republicans were doing their best in the heat of the campaign to paint Pelosi, 66, as a conservative's nightmare — a San Francisco liberal out of touch with the American mainstream. But more recently, a poll measuring political charisma showed that she had "dramatically improved her standing" with the public, sponsors of the survey said, with voters knowing her better and feeling warmer toward her.

Now Pelosi is planning a series of events to commemorate her swearing-in as the senior official in the House, second in the line of succession. The events in the first week of January will try to plant Pelosi's version of her life story in the national consciousness, showing her as an Italian American and devout Catholic from Baltimore, who married her college sweetheart, raised five children, ran for Congress in middle-age and shattered a Washington gender barrier days before her sixth grandchild was born.

The impending inauguration kicks off the contest over who will define Nancy Pelosi: Republicans who see her as a reckless liberal, or Pelosi herself, who wants to be seen as an American Everywoman, leading her party on a steady course to the center.

"She is trying to dispatch the stereotype put forth by Republicans," said Kathleen Hall Jamieson, director of the Annenberg Public Policy Center at the University of Pennsylvania. "The advantage she has is the country didn't know her before. Her challenge will be to take votes cast against Republicans and the war in Iraq and transform them into votes for the Democratic Party in 2008."

Though the details are in flux, plans are to begin the celebration Jan. 2 with a luncheon in Pelosi's hometown of Baltimore, reminding people she is not just a wealthy San Francisco matron but also the daughter of Thomas D'Alesandro Jr., a beloved Maryland congressman and Baltimore mayor.

The next day will include Mass at Trinity College in Washington, a nod to her alma mater and her faith. A tea will follow for female Democratic activists, lawmakers and donors. It will celebrate the 110th Congress, which convenes with the highest number of women in U.S. history.

The day will be capped by a dinner at the Italian Embassy — Pelosi is also the first Italian American speaker — where Tony Bennett is slated to sing — what else? — "I Left My Heart in San Francisco."

DOJ_NMG_0104240

The Jan. 4 gavel-passing will officially install her as speaker, the highest office ever attained by a female elected official in the U.S. She will set out her agenda in a speech to the House, then avail herself for the traditional photo session that gives the 434 other House members and their families a chance to have their picture taken with Pelosi pretending to swear them in.

The day ends with a 3,000-seat black-tie dinner and concert, with scheduled performances by Carole King and Jimmy Buffett, among others. Invited glitterati include Warren Beatty and Annette Bening, said Brian Quintana, a Malibu producer involved in the planning.

On Friday, a "People's House" event is planned at the Capitol, where Pelosi will meet and thank a broader group of well-wishers. The business of Congress will proceed in between, with Pelosi convening the House to launch the much-promoted "First 100 Hours" agenda that includes ethics reforms and a minimum-wage increase.

"Nancy Pelosi wanted a humble swearing-in and to go about the people's business," Quintana said. "Then, calls started coming in from all over the country. She decided we needed to thank the people who helped her get here."

The cost of the events will be covered by campaign donations, except the Friday morning People's House, which is paid for by congressional funds.

Four months ago, Pelosi barely registered on the name recognition scale, which served her well at the time; GOP attempts to demonize her fell flat because few knew who she was.

Now many more do.

"This is a dangerous time in terms of public reception. She has the newsworthiness but not the power," said former Democratic strategist Paul Begala. The introduction thus far has been bumpy. She stumbled when House Democrats rejected her choice of Rep. John P. Murtha of Pennsylvania as majority leader. In pushing Murtha, Pelosi stirred up a divisive flap that muted the big moment when House Democrats formally made her their leader.

Having spent years watching her party outmaneuvered in the message wars, Pelosi is soliciting advice from former Clinton White House Press Secretary Mike McCurry, one of the Democrats' most respected communication strategists.

Plans are also afloat to move the main communications operation from the speaker's office to incoming Democratic Caucus Chairman Rahm Emanuel of Illinois. He would handle party message and rapid response.

Meanwhile, all eyes are on Pelosi.

On Friday, Leon Rebibo's Pearl Source in Los Angeles unveiled "The Nancy Pelosi" — a replica of her Tahitian pearls. They will sell for $5,999 — a bargain compared with what Rebibo figures the real thing is worth.

In New Congress, Seniority Takes Back Seat To Spirit (WP)

By Lyndsey Layton

The Washington Post, December 11, 2006

They call themselves the "30-Something Working Group," a loose collection of House Democrats in their 30s and 40s who have begun making waves.

During the campaign season, the group took to the floor of the House nightly to give speeches during a period known as special orders, when lawmakers are permitted to speak for up to an hour about any topic after the day's business is complete.

The core of the group -- Reps. Kendrick Meek and Debbie Wasserman Schultz of Florida and Timothy J. Ryan of Ohio -- began talking at 10 or 11 p.m. Never mind that the House chamber was essentially empty at that hour. C-SPAN was recording the sessions, and insomniacs around the country got to know the three young Democrats. The trio sometimes used props and took irreverent jabs at the Republicans in honing their party's message.

"I was in the Minneapolis airport and the clerk in a shop said to me 'Are you on TV?' " Wasserman Schultz said. "I couldn't believe it. People across the country were watching."

The young Democrats played an important role in helping their party take control of Congress, and now they are beginning to reap the benefits. Nancy Pelosi, the California Democrat who will become speaker of the House when her party assumes control of Congress next month, is making room for these and other young House Democrats, giving them opportunities they would not normally enjoy under the rigid seniority system that typically defines life in the Capitol.

DOJ_NMG_0104241

Last week, Pelosi announced Wasserman Schultz will be a deputy chief whip and Meek and Ryan will serve on the party's steering committee, which sets policy and makes committee assignments, along with two incoming freshmen. In addition, Wasserman Schultz and Davis are being considered for a seat on the prestigious Ways and Means Committee, which sets tax policy, and Meek is vying for a seat on the Appropriations Committee.

"Some members have waited four or five terms to be a member of Appropriations or Ways and Means," said Meek, who hauled an oversized rubber stamp to the House floor to argue that the Republican Congress was in lockstep with the White House. "The fact that an incoming third-termer is even being considered is evidence that Speaker Pelosi is committed to giving opportunities to younger members to participate in real policymaking."

At a Tuesday meeting of the Democratic caucus, where House members heard from several experts about Iraq, Pelosi insisted that freshmen members ask the first round of questions, a departure from past practice.

And when the new Congress convenes next month, Democratic leaders will break an ethics reform package into several individual bills so that freshmen can introduce each bill and get their first opportunity to make a speech on the House floor.

The idea, aides and party strategists say, is to put a younger, fresh face on the Democrats to embody the change Pelosi promised throughout the midterm campaign. They say she wants to reward several young lawmakers who worked hard during the election. And she wants to help establish those who won Republican seats and need to gain credibility before the 2008 election. She is also looking for ways to cultivate young voters for the party, aides say.

"People who were recently elected and have been through tough elections have a sense of the mood of the country and their communities, and [Pelosi] wants to encourage those voices," said Rep. Chris Van Hollen (Md.), 48, also considered part of the new generation. "There was a period of time where the attitude was newer members should be seen and not heard. That's not the case."

Van Hollen worked closely during the campaign season with Rep. Rahm Emanuel (Ill.) and is a leading candidate to replace Emanuel as chairman of the Democratic Congressional Campaign Committee. Emanuel, 47, was elected chairman of the House Democratic Caucus, making him the fourth-ranking Democrat in the House.

One common thread that set the young representatives apart from longtime party stalwarts was a hunger and a determination to take control of Congress, several younger members said.

"The 'old bulls' have been in the minority for 12 years, and all of them recognize what landed us in the minority and that a new working order is necessary and is in the works," said Rep. Stephanie Herseth, a sophomore lawmaker from South Dakota.

Almost two-thirds of the Democratic veterans in the House have known only life under GOP rule. "They stopped believing it was possible," Wasserman Schultz said. "If you keep losing election cycle after election cycle, it wears you down. We were able to restore some of their belief. They needed our energy and our intensity."

Spending Woes Await Dems In New Congress (USAT)

USA Today, December 11, 2006

When the Democrats take control of Congress next month, they will also have to take charge of resolving spending issues that the old Congress couldn't.

As the clock ticked toward adjournment over the weekend, Congress approved a flurry of last-minute bills, but could not reach a deal on nearly a dozen annual spending bills for the fiscal year that began Oct. 1.

Instead, lawmakers approved a stopgap measure that keeps the federal government running through Feb. 15 — about a week after President Bush unveils his budget plans for fiscal year 2008.

"The new Congress is going to have to do in five weeks what the old Congress couldn't do in five months," said Stan Collender, a former congressional budget committee aide. He said the stage is set for a budget showdown with Bush, who is more likely to veto Democrat-passed spending bills.

Budget work on about $400 billion for agencies as varied as the Education Department, the Department of Agriculture and Health and Human Services will be left unfinished also.

"I think this Congress will be remembered for its failures more than its accomplishments," said Rep. Jack Kingston, R-Ga., a member of the Appropriations Committee, which oversees most federal spending.

DOJ_NMG_0104242

Rep. Dave Obey, D-Wis., who will become Appropriations Committee chairman when the new Congress is sworn in Jan. 4, called the stopgap-spending bill "a blatant admission of abject failure by the most useless Congress in modern times."

Broad disagreement over levels of federal spending for fiscal 2007, and how to avoid raising the annual deficit above its current level of roughly $250 billion, prevented Democrats and Republicans from agreeing to most of the spending bills it must pass each year to fund the government.

One dispute was over how much to increase spending available to Veterans Affairs hospitals, which are faced with growing demands for care and backlogs of patients from the Iraq war and earlier periods of service.

In other end-of-session business, the House ethics committee on Friday said it found no evidence that any current lawmakers or aides violated any rules in the case of former congressman Mark Foley. The panel recommended no sanctions but accused some House members of being "willfully ignorant" of the consequences of his behavior.

The Florida Republican resigned in September after he was confronted with sexually explicit and other inappropriate electronic messages he allegedly sent to former teenage pages.

To The Victors Go The Invoices (WSJ)

By David Rogers

The Wall Street Journal, December 11, 2006

WASHINGTON -- In the closing hours of the Republican-controlled Congress, impatient House Democrats took a swing at oil and gas interests -- a sign of things to come in January.

The punch fell wide: Their amendment, seeking to recoup royalties from energy companies drilling on federal lands, failed 207-205. There was pride in coming so close. But the defeat also betrayed a level of confusion in the new majority and fear that it won't have the resources needed to carry out its agenda after midterm election victories.

What had begun as a simple two-paragraph amendment to a tax bill had grown to fill 11 pages before it was offered with hand-scrawled notations and a new multibillion dollar provision exempting middle-income families from the alternative minimum tax through 2007.

"We'll be back with 30 more votes in a month," said Rep. Edward Markey (D., Mass.) the chief sponsor. But the budget math won't change, and Democrats still face this question: how to pay for their initiatives and address significant fiscal problems left behind by outgoing Republicans?

For Mr. Markey, recovering billions in oil royalties is both good government and a means to pay for lower interest rates charged to students on their college loans. Continued AMT relief in 2007 is something his party also wants. But the failed amendment became a thinly disguised attempt by Democratic tax writers to charge the AMT costs to Republicans before tougher deficit-reduction rules are put in place in January.

The failed amendment was to have been added to a $45.1 billion omnibus tax package, itself an exemplar of how much Congress approaches decisions on an installment basis because lawmakers can't face the long-term costs. Filled with scores of provisions, the bill finally was sent to President Bush with bipartisan support around 2 a.m. Saturday. Attached to the measure was a historic Vietnam trade bill as well as an extension of trade provisions important to Haiti and Andean nations.

Before passage, Senate Budget Committee Chairman Judd Gregg (R., N.H.) -- proclaiming himself "embarrassed" -- vainly protested that the bill was $17.5 billion over budget limits set by Republicans themselves.

He was voted down 67-21, with less than a third of his party supporting him. Even Mr. Gregg's numbers understate the longer-term impact, because most of the tax breaks are only extended through 2007, meaning the new Democratic majority next year will come under immediate pressure to make room in its 2008 budget to extend them again.

These include popular deductions for college tuition, teacher classroom expenses, and state and local sales taxes, a big issue for the home state of new Senate Majority Leader Harry Reid (D., Nev.). The corporate-research tax credit, which had expired at the end of 2005, is both restored and expanded through 2007, meaning the annual costs will be even greater when Democrats address the issue for 2008.

And after years of trying, the insurance industry won a provision allowing new, middle-income homeowners to deduct the cost of mortgage-insurance premiums -- an idea many Democrats will find hard to resist and which had early support from tax writer Sen. Blanche Lincoln, (D., Ark.).

The deduction, which the industry estimates could save $200 to $400 a year per household, is targeted to families with adjusted gross income below $110,000. Insurers hope it will make first-time home buying easier, because families are less likely then to have the equity to make a large enough deposit to avoid having to have mortgage insurance, typically 20%. But the provision is narrowly prescribed to 2007. Only new mortgage contracts issued after Dec. 31 would qualify and premiums paid before the end of 2007. The deduction's short-term cost is about $91 million; that is, unless it also gets extended down the road.

In the same vein, new short-term credits are introduced, such as for the purchase of mine safety equipment by coal companies. Puerto Rico and the Virgin Islands will benefit from Washington sharing -- on a temporary basis -- more of its collections of rum excise taxes.

Two spending elements attached to the tax bill are also telling. Coal-state senators won a $4.9 billion provision to lift federal spending for retired miner's health benefits and abandoned mine reclamation. As part of the same compromise a new set of tax breaks was added to promote the use of health-savings accounts, but again on an incremental one-year basis to play down the costs.

The second spending issue dealt with government supported health-care programs, which represent a huge strain on future budgets. In the case of Medicaid, a joint federal-state health program for the poor, the bill makes it harder for the Bush administration to crack down on schemes used by states to increase Washington's share of the program. Hospital and nursing-home lobbies argued for the amendment, but the result is to give the White House less flexibility in addressing cost problems.

In the case of Medicare, negotiators agreed to forestall a scheduled 5% cut in reimbursements for physicians under the program, covering the elderly and disabled. But the bill only meets part of the estimated $13 billion in costs now, meaning the next Congress will start further in the hole. Democrats accepted the outcome, not so much because they liked it but because they have a longer-term interest in building a partnership with physicians, whom they consider pivotal to any long-term effort to address health-care costs. As part of the agreement, an extra 1.5% bonus payment would go to doctors who participate in a health-care data reporting program to begin next July. And Democrats would like to create a more stable reimbursement situation for physicians in return for more help in identifying long-term savings in health care.

One problem that won't wait for the long term is the still unfinished business of spending for the fiscal year that began Oct. 1. Before surrendering power, Republicans sent Mr. Bush a stop-gap bill late Friday to keep agencies operating through Feb. 15, but Democrats will now be saddled with having to sort through what amounts on an annual basis $463 billion in discretionary spending.

The Department of Veterans Affairs is given greater discretion to shift as much as $684 million from other accounts to deal with the shortfall that develops in medical care. But other agencies are less fortunate, and if an agreement isn't reached quickly between Democrats and the White House, the domestic-appropriations debate could become entangled with Mr. Bush's anticipated request next year for more money for the war in Iraq.

Leaving The Dems Some Hot Potatoes (USNEWS)

By Silla Brush

U.S. News and World Report, December 11, 2006

Nearly everyone on Capitol Hill calls it a mess. Democratic leaders at their end-of-the-year press conference railed about Congress's failure to finish answering the dollars and cents questions of funding the government. "They are going to leave a mess as they go out," said Democratic House Speaker-elect Nancy Pelosi. Some of their brethren across the aisle, including the Republican senator in charge of appropriations, were dismayed, too. Across town, the president's bean counters at the Office of Management and Budget also wished Congress had finished its appropriations work earlier.

But it wasn't to be. The lame duck Republican-led Congress punted nearly a half-trillion dollars in unfinished spending over to next year-to the Democrats, that is. Just when the Democrats hope to be talking about the minimum wage and college tuition and fulfilling their campaign pledges for a "new direction," they'll be saddled with looking backward and making a host of spending decisions fraught with peril. Their plans to hit the ground running with a flurry of politically popular initiatives may just have run into a gaping pothole.

That's because the lawmakers who left Washington last week-after working for just 103 days this year, fewer than the "Do Nothing Congress" of 1948-completed only two (defense and homeland security) of the 11 spending bills that finance 13 government agencies. Late Friday, Congress instead appeared headed toward passage of a stopgap continuing resolution to keep the government funded through February. But that leaves Democrats with $463 billion in fiscal year 2007 spending issues to resolve on their watch before they take up the budget again-probably in the spring-for fiscal year 2008. "We're going to have to do two years' work in one year," says Rep. David Obey, the Wisconsin Democrat who will take over the House Appropriations Committee.

In the best of times, Congress usually tries to finish the budget process by October of each year for fiscal years that run from then through the following September. Often, a few bills drag on, but "finishing just two of the appropriations bills by January is nearly unprecedented," says Brian Riedl, a budget analyst at the Heritage Foundation.

Politics? Throughout the year, Republicans were split between fiscal hawks intent on combating special-interest spending on lawmakers' favorite programs-earmarks-and moderates who argued for more funding. Those Republican factions never fully agreed, so they decided to leave the headache for Democrats.

Veteran Congress watchers also suspect that a good deal of politics was involved in the calculus. According to this theory, some Republicans figure that Democrats will have a hard time governing with the spending bills on their shoulders, meaning they face the risk of losing momentum early. "When they found Democrats were in the majority in the House and Senate," says James Horney of the Center on Budget and Policy Priorities, "they said, 'Hey, not our problem anymore.'"

Short-term resolutions are no way to run a government. Fundamental choices aren't made-and those that have been tediously negotiated aren't acted on. Lots of agencies and programs drift into a kind of bureaucratic limbo as they lose the ability to plan. In the end, costs can also rise. The Justice Department, for example, will reportedly have 70 percent less money than the president's request because of stalled negotiations. The Census Bureau, which is trying to start a new computerized system for the 2010 census, risks a $1 billion cost overrun, if funding uncertainties mean a pilot program can't be started or the purchase must be delayed. "The more mundane-sounding but necessary accounts are the ones that get hit," Stephen McMillin, the deputy director of OMB, tells U.S. News.

Is The Farm Bill's Fat Finally In The Fire? (USNEWS)

By Bret Schulte

U.S. News and World Report, December 10, 2006

The agriculture industry is hoping for a 2007 bumper crop-of money. When Congress reconvenes in January, one of its top priorities will be hashing out a new six-year farm bill, an always anticipated Washington ritual that has regularly delivered massive subsidies to the industry and howls of protest from budget hawks and others. Supporters say the money has kept the farm economy afloat through market crashes and dire weather. But the farm bill has a reputation for being heavy on wasteful pork-barrel funding. One published report cited $1.3 billion for folks who don't farm at all. Critics say it's time to end the payouts. And environmental and trade considerations have made the bill a platform for debate on some of the nation's most crucial issues.

From fiscal years 2002 to 2006, the government spent $93.3 billion subsidizing "commodity crops" like corn, wheat, rice, and soybeans, flooding the international market with cheap goods. It may keep the American farm economy going, but the policy threatens free-trade agreements; World Trade Organization talks are stalled because of agriculture subsidies by the United States and equally protectionist European nations. Another chief complaint: Seventy-two percent of the money goes to just 10 percent of the recipients. "The big guys get bigger ... the small operators are left behind," says Ken Cook of the Environmental Working Group.

While Big Ag is pushing for another barnburner, the largess of the 2002 farm bill, penned at a time of government surplus, is gone. This time, nothing will come easy.

Dust Bowl. The farm bill's roots are in the Great Depression. But when the economy recovered, subsidies didn't stop, partly because of powerful legislators from farm states. In 1996, Indiana Sen. Dick Lugar attempted major reform with the Freedom to

DOJ_NMG_0104245

Farm Act, which cut subsidies to staple crops and allowed farmers more choices in planting. It passed, in part, because of a bullish commodities market. But when prices fell, the agriculture industry clamored for help. By 2002, it was back to business as usual.

But the business of agriculture, and the farm bill, are changing. Fruit and vegetable growers are demanding their slice of the pie as they face stiffening competition from imports. They have the backing of the powerful California delegation in Congress and have already submitted their own bill. But ethanol will dominate talks. Not only are corn prices booming because of ethanol demand, but the gasoline substitute could give producers a way around international trade regulations through an exception that's made for environmental purposes, such as renewable fuels. Free-traders want to kill all subsidies, and environmental groups who have the ear of some Democrats oppose more corn-based ethanol, preferring switch-grass- and wood-chip-based biofuel. They also fear that more corn production will remove land from the bill's Conservation Reserve Program, which currently keeps about 36 million acres of farmland out of production.

From all this, an odd-couple alliance is forming among Bread for the World, the libertarian Cato Institute, the liberal Environmental Defense, and the conservative Club for Growth. Expect talks to accelerate by early spring. Most insiders predict calls for reform will keep Big Ag from going home with the usual honey pot, but it won't be left hungry, either. For some, that's enough. "It's almost like a revolution is taking place," says Kathleen Rogers of Earthday Network. If that's so, change may be coming quick to rural America.

A Billion Here, A Billion There... (USNEWS)

By Edward T. Pound

U.S. News and World Report, December 11, 2006

For years the Department of Interior's Minerals Management Service operated pretty much in the backwaters of the nation's capital, drawing little scrutiny from the press or Capitol Hill. Such obscurity, however, is a thing of the past. Last summer, congressional investigators discovered that the agency had bungled its job so badly that energy companies legally avoided paying an estimated $2 billion in royalties on oil and natural gas extracted from federal waters. The final tab to taxpayers could reach $10 billion. Lawmakers, to put it mildly, are incensed.

Now, when the new Congress convenes in January under Democratic control, there will be scrutiny aplenty of the beleaguered Interior Department unit. In the Senate, Democrat Ron Wyden of Oregon will chair a subcommittee and vows a "very vigorous" investigation of the oil and gas leasing program run by the minerals agency. Taxpayers, Wyden said in an interview, are victims of a giant "rip-off" by oil and gas companies. In the House, says a senior aide to Rep. Nick Rahall, the West Virginia Democrat expected to chair the House Resources Committee, "there will be an intensive and exhaustive review of royalty underpayments."

"Steal a loaf." The minerals agency may be little known, but it has been an important source of revenue for the U.S. Treasury and for American Indians. Last year, it collected $9.9 billion in royalties on oil and gas pumped from federal and Indian lands and from U.S.-owned coastal waters. Some 2,600 companies hold 27,800 producing leases.

The current scandal focuses on the agency's failure to ensure that oil and gas producers paid their full share of royalties on oil and gas pumped from the deep waters of the Gulf of Mexico. This is what happened: MMS officials inexplicably failed to include provisions in some deep-water leases that would have required energy companies to pay royalties once the price per barrel reached a certain level. That mistake cost the Treasury some $2 billion in lost revenue. Today, the minerals agency is attempting to cut new deals with 12 of the 56 oil companies that hold these lucrative leases. A few companies seem keen on working something out. "We would like to see a mutually beneficial solution," says Donald Campbell, a spokesman for Chevron Corp.

As congressional investigators dig deeper, they have an important ally in the Interior Department's chief watchdog, Inspector General Earl Devaney. He has been snapping at the heels of MMS officials for years. Last week, he issued a tough, 50-page report warning that the minerals agency's audit and compliance program on royalty payments for federal and Indian properties is so flawed that there is a high risk that the agency "may not detect underpaid royalties." Agency officials defended the program but promised to fix any problems.

Devaney's conclusion came as no surprise to investigators at the Project on Government Oversight, a watchdog group that has long criticized the minerals agency for lax oversight of energy producers. "If you don't have a policeman in the neighborhood," Beth Daley, POGO's chief investigator says, "the thief is going to steal a loaf of bread from the bakery." The watchdog group has helped the government recover hundreds of millions of dollars in royalty underpayments.

The scandal has hurt MMS's top official, Johnnie Burton, who testified in September before a House panel chaired by Rep. Darrell Issa, a California Republican. In an interview, the lawmaker says bluntly that Burton misled Congress. "She said she hadn't learned about the missing price thresholds [in some deep-water] leases until 2006," Issa says. But he has information, he says, indicating that Burton learned of the problem two years earlier. Issa wants Burton out. "I would like to see a reformer in that position," he said. "I do not believe she is a reformer." Burton, says an Interior Department spokesperson, declined to comment on Issa's statements.

Even some of the agency's own auditors are appalled at the mess. A former top auditor has filed a lawsuit in federal court, claiming that the minerals agency blocked his efforts to recover money owed to the government. Look for this to be one of the first big housecleaning moves when Congress comes back after the holidays.

Senate Confirms Jordan To 3rd Circuit Replacing Senior Judge Jane Roth (LAW)

By Elizabeth Bennett, The Legal Intelligencer

Legal Intelligencer, December 11, 2006

The U.S. Senate confirmed Judge Kent A. Jordan to the 3rd U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals on Friday.

Jordan, formerly a judge for the U.S. District Court for the District of Delaware, was nominated in June to replace Judge Jane R. Roth, who took senior status on the appellate court effective May 31. Both Roth and Jordan are Republicans.

Directly before his appointment to the district court in 2002, Jordan was vice president and general counsel of the Corporation Services Co. in Wilmington, Del. He joined the company in 1998 after five years as a partner with Wilmington firm Morris James Hitchens & Williams.

From 1987 to 1992, Jordan was an Assistant U.S. Attorney, after having spent two years as an associate with Potter Anderson & Corroon, another Wilmington firm.

Admitted to the Delaware bar in 1984, Jordan clerked for Judge James L. Latchum of the Delaware District Court from 1984 to 1985, after receiving his J.D. from the Georgetown University Law Center. He received his B.A. from Brigham Young University in 1981. Jordan was born in West Point, N.Y., and resides in Delaware.

"Kent Jordan embodies all the qualities one should look for in a judge -- integrity, a thorough understanding of the law, a keen intellect, a willingness to listen to both sides of a case, and a strong work ethic," said U.S. Sen. Tom Carper, D-Del. "I believe he will do an outstanding job and will continue in the tradition of fine Delawarean jurists that have served on the federal bench."

Historically, two seats on the 3rd Circuit bench have gone to Delaware jurists. Jordan's nomination continues the tradition. Roth is from Delaware, and the state's other representative on the court is Judge Thomas L. Ambro, who joined from private bankruptcy practice at Wilmington firm Richards Layton & Finger. He was nominated by President Bill Clinton and confirmed in 2000.

SF Protesters Urge Pelosi To Pursue Impeachment Of Bush (SFC)

By John King

San Francisco Chronicle, December 11, 2006

(12-10) 13:48 PST SAN FRANCISCO -- As Democrats prepare to take control of Congress, a small but spirited rally in San Francisco called on the future speaker of the House of Representatives, the city's Rep. Nancy Pelosi, to move impeachment to the top of the legislative agenda.

"We need Nancy Pelosi to serve and represent her people. We need her to stand up and say I'm going to do what's right," said Norah Foster, one of the organizers of the rally at United Nations Plaza near San Francisco's City Hall and Civic Center.

"If she puts impeachment back on the table, I'm confident Bush and Cheney will resign within four months," Foster said during the rally.

DOJ_NMG_0104247

The protest -- organized by Bay Area anti-war groups -- was held on the 60th International Human Rights Day. Similar rallies were scheduled in other large American cities.

The turnout was a far cry from the street-filling protests held in opposition to the invasion of Iraq in 2003. The listeners at U.N. Plaza barely outnumbered the two dozen or so organizers, who were wearing orange jumpsuits, windbreakers and T-shirts.

But neither the small turnout -- nor intermittent rain -- dampened the speakers' ardor.

Bushes Join 'Dr. Phil' At Christmas Show (AP)

By Ann Sanner

AP, December 11, 2006

President Bush enjoyed a lively set of Christmas music Sunday night, swaying and bobbing his head as music stars like Taylor Hicks and Gretchen Wilson belted out classic carols.

TV host "Dr. Phil" McGraw and his wife, Robin, emceed the annual "Christmas in Washington" concert at the National Building Museum. The event benefited the Children's National Medical Center.

"Since this event began a quarter of a century ago, 'Christmas in Washington' has become one of the most cherished holiday traditions here in our nation's capital," Bush said.

As Americans gather with their families over the holidays, Bush said, U.S. troops abroad "must know that our nation is grateful for your service."

"American Idol" winner Hicks led off the show with "Santa Claus Is Coming to Town." Country singer Wilson performed "I Saw Mommy Kissing Santa Claus," while 12-year-old "America's Got Talent" champ Bianca Ryan sang "Have Yourself a Merry Little Christmas." Pop-opera quartet Il Divo performed "White Christmas." The lineup also included soul singers Chris Brown and Corinne Bailey Rae.

The president and first lady Laura Bush joined all the performers onstage for the finale, including "Hark, the Herald Angels Sing."

The event will air Wednesday night on Turner Network Television.

Earlier Sunday, the Bushes attended services at St. John's Episcopal Church, a block away from the White House. The president also went on a bike ride at a wildlife refuge in Maryland.

A Partisan Take On The Shadow President (FT)

By Caroline Daniel

Financial Times, December 11, 2006

In Executive Privilege, a sex and politics thriller written by Dick Cheney's wife, Lynne, President Zern Jenner laments: "The history of the presidency in the 20th century is the history of a gradually weakening institution." Her book reflected the sombre pillow talk of her husband. It was written in 1979, four years after Mr Cheney became the youngest White House chief of staff for President Gerald Ford. He was profoundly affected by the reassertion of Congress over the executive branch after Watergate and by the submission of his boss to testify on the Hill.

Thirty years later, those concerns no longer find expression in his wife's fictional characters. As vice-president, his goal has been to restore to the presidency the unimpeded constitutional power to conduct national security policy and pass on his office "in better shape than we found it".

In Vice, Lou Dubose – a reporter who has previously taken aim at Republican icons George Bush, Tom DeLay and Karl Rove – and Jake Bernstein, set out to depict how Mr Cheney's has become the most powerful vice-presidency in history, "insulated from any accountability – from the Congress and even from the president with whom he shared executive power".

The partisan tone can be deduced from the chapter headings: "Covert Cover-up", "Lady MacCheney" and the "Torture Presidency". In a liberal-pleasing epilogue they say he created a "still largely invisible constitutional crisis". The book concludes with the word "bullshit", noting he went to the Iraq war on the basis "of forged documents that he knew were bullshit".

The book is best on the methods used to consolidate power, not the man. His ascent has been aided by the assiduous cultivation of patrons, including Donald Rumsfeld, former secretary of defence, from whom he learnt the art of marginalising enemies, the calculated leak and giving oral advice rather than leaving a paper record.

Reinforcing the image of Mr Cheney as the shadow president, the authors reveal the ways he has bolstered his authority. His national security team read all the e-mail traffic to and from the president's National Security Council staffers, yet they are not allowed to read the communications of his staff.

Exploiting loopholes, his legal counsel redefined his office as a branch of Congress to avoid Freedom of Information requests, yet failed to submit to Senate ethics rules that require disclosure of details on staffing or travel. He has the same power to classify information as the president and, in his first year in office, he defended the secrecy of his energy task force to shield advice from oil executives.

His most potent legacy is national security law. In the 1980s, during the Iran-Contra hearings, he defended the administration's right to conduct covert operations. After September 11 2001, he conceded the need to "work, through, sort of the dark side", and pioneered terrorist surveillance and harsher interrogation methods, earning himself the title in a Washington Post editorial, "Vice-President for Torture".

On the most contentious claims, such as whether he steered $7bn in no-bid Iraq contracts to Halliburton, the oil services company he ran from 1995 to 2000, the authors offer implications, not facts. "If [Scooter] Libby [chief of staff] had been briefed on the contracts, it was all but impossible that Dick Cheney was out of the loop," is one loaded assertion.

Where the book is weakest is on offering real insight into the man behind the austere, avuncular image and half crooked smile. It fails to explain a man who earned a reputation as a Wyoming congressman, as a reassuring, attentive listener, a conservative but political pragmatist, but is now seen as a stubborn figure, so indifferent to his public image that he went duck shooting on election day.

This is a story told from the outside looking in. As well as leaving a limited paper trail, Mr Cheney trails few anecdotes. There are a few glimpses of a more complex character behind the caricature – of him turning to alcohol after flunking out of Yale to become a lineman and enjoying rowdy parties during his time on the Hill – but Nicholas Lehman's 2001 profile in The New Yorker gets closer to capturing his enigmatic personality. Ron Suskind's One Percent Doctrine better explains his transformation after the first Gulf war, when Mr Cheney asked: "How many additional American casualties is Saddam worth? And the answer is not very damned many," into an unwavering advocate of a transformationalist foreign policy, driven by a visceral sense of threat rather than by being a true believer in spreading democracy.

Indeed, democracy at home is no easier. The new Democratic majority is likely to drag Mr Cheney, who prefers to operate in back rooms or on conservative talk shows, into the spotlight. The incoming chairman of the House Energy and Commerce Committee will hold investigations into his energy task force and spending on government contractors in Iraq. While he is likely to resist efforts to testify the danger is that, for all his efforts over the past six years to pass on his office in better shape, his actions have triggered a backlash, ushering in the same kind of congressional reassertion of power that so defined him three decades ago.

Inquiry Sought Over Evangelical Video (WP)

By Alan Cooperman

The Washington Post, December 11, 2006

A military watchdog group is asking the Defense Department to investigate whether seven Army and Air Force officers violated regulations by appearing in uniform in a promotional video for an evangelical Christian organization.

In the video, much of which was filmed inside the Pentagon, four generals and three colonels praise the Christian Embassy, a group that evangelizes among military leaders, politicians and diplomats in Washington. Some of the officers describe their efforts to spread their faith within the military.

"I found a wonderful opportunity as a director on the joint staff, as I meet the people that come into my directorate," Air Force Maj. Gen. Jack J. Catton Jr. says in the video. "And I tell them right up front who Jack Catton is, and I start with the fact that I'm an old-fashioned American, and my first priority is my faith in God, then my family and then country. I share my faith because it describes who I am."

Pete Geren, a former acting secretary of the Air Force who oversaw the service's response in 2005 to accusations that evangelical Christians were pressuring cadets at the Air Force Academy, also appears in the video. The Christian Embassy "has been a rock that I can rely on, been an organization that helped me in my walk with Christ, and I'm just thankful for the service they give," he says.

The 10-minute video is on the group's Web site, Christianembassy.com. The organization was founded nearly 30 years ago by the late Bill Bright, who also founded Campus Crusade for Christ. The Christian Embassy Web site says the group holds prayer breakfasts each Wednesday in the Pentagon's executive dining room and organizes small groups to help military leaders "bridge the gap between faith and work."

Army Brig. Gen. Bob Casen refers in the video to the Christian Embassy's special efforts to reach admirals and generals through Flag Fellowship groups. Whenever he sees another fellowship member, he says, "I immediately feel like I am being held accountable, because we are the aroma of Jesus Christ."

The Military Religious Freedom Foundation, a watchdog group led by retired Air Force lawyer Michael L. "Mikey" Weinstein, is requesting an investigation in a letter to the Defense Department's inspector general.

Weinstein, a White House lawyer in the Reagan administration, cites Defense Department regulations barring personnel from appearing in uniform in "speeches, interviews, picket lines, marches, rallies or any public demonstration . . . which may imply Service sanction of the cause for which the demonstration or activity is conducted."

All the officers are identified in the video by their Defense Department positions, "yet the video failed to include any disclaimers indicating that the views expressed were not those of the Department of Defense," the letter says.

It asks whether the officers received permission to promote the Christian Embassy and whether any other religious or secular organizations have been allowed to use Pentagon facilities and uniformed personnel in promotional videos.

Catton said yesterday that he does not remember whether he sought approval to appear in the video, which he said was made in 2005. "If someone asked me today to do it, I for sure would ask permission," said the general, who sparked controversy this year by raising money from fellow officers for a congressional candidate.

Christian Embassy officials in Washington did not return phone messages left at their homes and offices over the weekend.

Air Force Lt. Col. Todd Vician, a Pentagon spokesman, said yesterday that "it is impossible for me or the department to comment on a letter we haven't received yet." Once the letter is in hand, he added, "I'm confident that the inspector general will take the appropriate action."

In 2003, Army Lt. Gen. William G. "Jerry" Boykin drew criticism for appearing in uniform before church groups and saying, in remarks captured on video, that President Bush was "appointed by God," that the United States is "a Christian nation" and that Muslims worship "an idol." The inspector general's office determined that Boykin had not violated any rules, and he remained in a top intelligence post.

This year, Navy chaplain Gordon J. Klingenschmitt was court-martialed for appearing in uniform at a political protest in front of the White House, though he maintained that all he did was lead a prayer.

Weinstein noted that his son and daughter-in-law, who are serving as first lieutenants in the Air Force, received written permission in July to appear in a documentary based on the book "Constantine's Sword," a history of Christian anti-Semitism.

"They may appear on camera for this documentary, but as they will be speaking for themselves, as private citizens, not for the Air Force, they cannot appear in uniform," says the order, a copy of which Weinstein provided to The Washington Post.

Shuttle Crew Prepares For Building Blitz At Station (USAT)

By Traci Watson

USA Today, December 11, 2006

Early data from Saturday's launch of space shuttle Discovery show the ship is in good health and suffered no damage on the way to orbit, deputy shuttle program manager John Shannon said Sunday.

"It was a very typical ascent," Shannon said. "The team sees nothing of concern at this time."

NASA stepped up its scrutiny of the shuttle's condition after launch-pad debris punched a hole in shuttle Columbia's heat shield in 2003. The hole went undetected, and the vehicle fell apart as it re-entered the atmosphere, killing the crew.

Discovery's liftoff was the first night launch in four years. The darkness meant that many launch cameras had less of a view than during the day or none at all.

DOJ_NMG_0104250

However, engineers got good footage of parts of the spacecraft illuminated by the fiery plumes of its own rockets and thruster jets.

"I was surprised," by the amount of detail the cameras captured, Shannon said. He said cameras at the launch pad showed that the shuttle's fuel tank, the source of the debris that fatally struck Columbia, was in better condition than during any of the past three shuttle flights.

Despite the good camera views, Discovery's astronauts spent Sunday performing a survey of their ship. The data they gathered is the most important in determining whether their spacecraft can get them safely home.

Led by astronaut Nicholas Patrick, the crew spent nearly five hours Sunday surveying the wings and nose. Those areas feel the hottest temperatures — roughly 3,000 degrees — as the shuttle re-enters the Earth's atmosphere. The inspection job is both crucial and tedious, requiring the astronauts to spend long periods keeping tabs on the shuttle's arm in case it malfunctions.

In 2005, a shuttle crew had to fight with balky technology to aim the camera. Earlier this year, a shuttle crew found itself focusing on what turned out to be not damage to the heat shield but splattered bird droppings.

The first part of the inspection Sunday went so smoothly that the crew finished the heat-shield inspection nearly an hour ahead of schedule.

The shuttle's square white heat-shielding tiles will be inspected today. As Discovery nears the International Space Station for docking, shuttle commander Mark Polansky will send his spacecraft into a slow somersault at 3:45 p.m. ET. The crew of the space station will snap photos of the tiles and other parts of the shuttle as Discovery does its flip.

The combination of Sunday's survey and the photos by the station crew today will make up for the fewer photos during launch, Patrick said before the flight.

After docking with the station, Discovery's crew will immediately embark on a six-day building blitz that will transform the orbiting laboratory. After the 4:47 p.m. ET docking, two Discovery astronauts will command the shuttle's robotic arm to reach into its cargo bay and pluck out an early Christmas gift for the station, a new piece to be added to the station's aluminum framework.

The shuttle's robotic arm then will hand the new girder to the station's robotic arm. It will be a dicey operation: If the astronauts steering the shuttle arm are a few inches off, they could bash the arm into the shuttle's cargo-bay doors and damage the cooling system there.

Delivery of the girder is only the first step in what NASA officials call the most complex shuttle mission devoted to building the station, which has been occupied since 2000. Discovery's crew, with the help of Mission Control and the station's residents, plan to rewire the lab and start up its cooling system. Much of the equipment to be turned on has waited in orbit for years. No one knows whether it will work.

"We have a lot of work in front of us, but so far so good," lead shuttle flight director Tony Ceccacci said Sunday.

First Day In Space For Discovery Includes Full Check For Damages (AP)

AP, December 11, 2006

CAPE CANAVERAL, Fla. -- Astronauts aboard the space shuttle Discovery woke up to The Beatles on Sunday, their first morning in space, where the first order of business will be to make sure their ship wasn't damaged during launch.

The crew lit up the sky late Saturday with a fiery ascent that practically turned night into day in the first nighttime launch in four years. Then it was on to the international space station to rewire the orbital outpost.

The astronauts began their day to the mellow tunes of "Here Comes the Sun."

"Good morning, Discovery. We especially want to thank you for the burst of sunshine you brought into our lives last night. It was an awesome launch," Shannon Lucid from Mission Control radioed up to the crew.

Check out the latest NASA updates on the Discovery mission, including a launch blog, Webcast and pictures at NASA's Web site.

"It was pretty great for all of us, too," Commander Mark Polansky responded.

Astronauts will spend the day inspecting the shuttle for potentially critical heat shield damage from debris that may have fallen off the external tank during lift off, the problem that doomed the shuttle Columbia in 2003.

DOJ_NMG_0104251

Nicholas Patrick, one of the five astronauts experiencing zero gravity for the first time, will use the shuttle's 50-foot robotic arm and similarly long boom with sensors and a camera to inspect the ship. The survey is scheduled to start at 3:12 p.m.

The shuttle is scheduled to dock with the space station Monday to begin conducting three complicated spacewalks to rewire the space station from a temporary to a permanent power source.

NASA had to beat the odds to get off the launch pad Saturday. After only a 30% chance of good weather earlier in the day and a two-hour delay in fueling, Discovery streaked through a moonless sky at 8:47 p.m. EST. "It just all came together perfectly," launch director Mike Leinbach said.

The mood was also upbeat aboard Discovery. "I think we have five people who just haven't stopped smiling yet," Cmdr. Polansky said after the shuttle reached space.

During the 12-day mission, Discovery's crew will also deliver an $11 million addition to the space lab and bring home one of the space station's three crew members, German astronaut Thomas Reiter of the European Space Agency. American astronaut Sunita "Suni" Williams will replace him, staying for six months.

The two veterans aboard the shuttle are Cmdr. Polansky and Robert Curbeam, who will spacewalk three times. The others are pilot William Oefelein, and mission specialists Patrick, Williams, Joan Higginbotham and the European Space Agency's Christer Fuglesang, who was the first Swede in space.

Mr. Fuglesang carried some unusual food into orbit: several cans of moose sausage and moose pate.

The mission is one leg of a three-year race to finish construction on the space station before shuttles are retired in 2010. After Discovery's mission, 13 more shuttle flights are needed to complete the lab.

The launch was the first at night since Endeavour's flight in November 2002 and only the 29th in darkness of NASA's 117 total shuttle launches.

NASA had required daylight launches for three flights after the Columbia accident so that clear images could be taken of the external fuel tank. Foam broke off Columbia's tank at liftoff and struck the spacecraft's wing, leading to the disaster that killed seven astronauts. Mission Control in Houston told Discovery's crew that there were no initial reports of any serious problems with the latest launch and that the shuttle was "in great shape."

"What you've seen tonight is the successful accomplishment of the most challenging, demanding, technically state-of-the-art, difficult thing that this nation or any nation can do," NASA Administrator Michael Griffin said.

Saturday's launch was only the fourth since the Columbia disaster in 2003 and the third of the year. It also was the last scheduled liftoff from pad 39B, which will be modified for new rockets that will take astronauts back to the moon in 2020. "It's kind of the end of an era," Mr. Leinbach said.

Time For A Power Boost At International Space Station (CSM)

By Peter N. Spotts

The Christian Science Monitor, December 11, 2006

Imagine overhauling the electrical system of a transatlantic airliner in midflight, and you get an inkling of the challenge NASA faces this week as it takes the next major step in completing the International Space Station.

Saturday night, the shuttle Discovery and its seven-member crew arced into the sky, spraying a trail of fire that lit the night. Tuesday, astronauts Robert Curbeam and Sweden's Christer Fuglesang begin the first of three spacewalks to ensure that the orbiting outpost can provide the power and cooling needed to house six crew members and run European and Japanese labs, slated to arrive at the station beginning next October.

Astronauts will help install a new $11 million truss to the station's "backbone." And they will connect a set of solar panels, delivered in September, to the station's power grid.

These are not simple plug-and-play operations. Controllers in Houston will have to partially retract an existing solar array to give the new panels room to move as they track the sun. Then ground controllers must reroute the flow of electricity through the station so that astronauts don't handle live wires during their spacewalks. Vital life-support systems will be shut down in parts of the station, temporarily erasing the protective redundancy built into the station. Equipment that must be kept running to ensure redundancy will have to be "jumpered" to the powered half of the grid.

If all goes as planned "it won't be as complicated" as it could be, says Kirk Shireman, the space station's program manager. "But you have to prepare yourself for quite a number of ugly contingencies."

Some of the hardware the astronauts must activate have been dormant for years. "It's like storing a car in a garage for four years, then turning the key to see if it starts," he continues. This mission is important for the station's future, which itself is important as NASA plans to explore the moon and, perhaps, Mars.

"One of the things we're going to learn from the station is in fact how to work through failures or problems" during long-lived manned missions, acknowledges NASA Administrator Michael Griffin. Until the space station came along, he continues, US missions consisted of brief episodes on orbit or at the moon. "Even Skylab was 84 days, less than three months. When we go to Mars, we need three years."

If the station represents a step on the ladder that will ultimately allow humans to climb out of low-Earth orbit for long-term exploration, it also remains a test of Washington's reliability as a partner in global manned-spaceflight projects.

Last week, NASA unveiled a rough outline of its plans for a lunar outpost, whose evolution beyond a single dot on the lunar map will depend on international participation.

NASA's likens the effort to the history of exploring Antarctica. Some 50 years passed between the first successful round trip to the South Pole and the establishment of permanent bases there. Visits grew longer, and the bases expanded, until today, where many nations have year-round facilities there. The outlines of a lunar outpost bear the same gradualist features.

Yet NASA's vision for space explorationis the first set of goals set out by President Bush and endorsed by Congress that by design spans administrations and generations. Several science-policy analysts have noted that it's difficult to see how NASA will be able to do it with the money it's likely to receive from Congress. By one analysis, from the original Mercury flight in 1961 through the Apollo-Soyuz mission of 1975, NASA spent roughly $145 billion in 2005 dollars. The two-decade-old shuttle program carries a $150 billion price tag to date. And the station's costs have ballooned from an initial estimate of $8 billion to roughly $100 billion. Yet given its current budgets, NASA is likely to have only $75 billion available through 2020, when the current plan anticipates fresh human boot prints on the moon.

Dr. Griffin notes that the US is not the only spacefaring nation where political support for human space exploration ebbs and flows.

"There is nothing I can say that is in any way a guarantee," he adds. "We are going to meet our commitments and finish the space station." He says that this should serve to give international partners "some confidence in us for the long term. We want to have them with us when we take the next step. Enterprises of this magnitude must have a leader, and in this era of world history, the United States is that leader. But it needs to be an alliance. We hope that others will take the risk and go forward with us."

Mail Rates To Be Harnessed As Part Of Postal-Overhaul Bill (WSJ)

By John D. Mckinnon And Rick Brooks

The Wall Street Journal, December 11, 2006

The Postal Service generally will be barred from raising postage rates beyond the rate of inflation for the next decade under an overhaul passed by Congress.

The new law -- the first major changes to the service in more than three decades -- aims to stabilize rates for households and bulk mailers and to help the service cope with the challenges of the Internet and compete against delivery companies such as FedEx Corp. and United Parcel Service Inc.

The White House said President Bush would sign the bill.

In return for accepting new limits on rate-setting, the Postal Service was given new flexibility in the process of setting rates and will gradually be relieved of billions of dollars of employee-retirement expenses.

The changes should make the Postal Service more attractive to catalog companies and other bulk mailers, by letting them plan costs more accurately. For consumers, the changes could bring more frequent rate increases, though they would rarely be as large as some recent ones, including an average 8.5% jump proposed in May that would be the biggest price increase in 12 years if it takes effect. Under that, the cost of a first-class postage stamp is supposed to rise to 42 cents in May from the current 39 cents.

Sponsors also hope that by capping rates, they will force the Postal Service to become more efficient. The legislation also calls for plans to shrink the service's huge employee and infrastructure base.

At the same time, a financial overhaul will allow the Postal Service to erase billions of dollars of unfunded retiree health-care obligations, thanks to an earlier reduction of its obligations for pension benefits for its workers.

The Postal Service has been using those savings to pay down debt for the past couple of years. The bill also achieves some savings on employee-injury claims by requiring workers to take sick time for three days before filing for workers compensation.

In addition, postal officials will have to make many of the same disclosures as public companies, including complying with financial-reporting provisions of the Sarbanes-Oxley law. A newly formed Postal Regulatory Commission will have the power to issue subpoenas and burrow much deeper into the Postal Service's operations than its current regulator.

The Postal Service has its origins in the earliest days of the country, and used to be a government agency. It was partly privatized beginning in the early 1970s, to force it toward self-sufficiency. Despite strides, much of its business model has been made obsolete by fax machines, email and Internet commerce, as well as increased competition from private carriers. The new changes aim to make it run more efficiently.

While the changes generally make the Postal Service more competitive, it isn't clear they can offset challenges such as continued declines in the volume of first-class mail. Some analysts say the Internet could help as well as hurt the Postal Service, by generating more package shipments from Web-based commerce. Meanwhile, though, the Postal Service remains responsible for providing universal mail service, and about one million new addresses are added each year.

The overhaul bill appeared to be in big trouble in recent weeks. But bulk mailers rallied to push it through after House Democrats -- led by Rep. Henry Waxman of California -- signaled that they were willing to drop their opposition to the rate cap. That led mailers to put pressure on the White House to reach a deal. The Bush administration, in turn, relented on some of its demands for big concessions on contract benefits from Postal Service employees.

"When this bill looked dead a month or two ago, it sparked a lot of people to action," said Robert E. McLean, executive director of the Mailers Council, an Arlington, Va., trade group of mailers who generate about 70% of U.S. mail volume.

The last hurdle was a concern that congressional appropriators would have to absorb about $1.8 billion over 10 years -- the cost of running the newly empowered regulatory commission and inspector general's office.

FedEx and UPS generally supported the bill, even though UPS has accused the Postal Service of using its monopoly on first-class mail deliveries to prop up its package operations. The hostility has eased now that FedEx and UPS carry mail on their planes. "We have been in favor of postal reform for a long time and anything that allows the Postal Service to make decisions more nimbly and operate more like a business," said Kristin Krause, a FedEx spokeswoman.

Muzzling Those Pesky Scientists (NYT)

The New York Times, December 11, 2006

The Environmental Protection Agency disclosed last week that it had revised — stood on their head is more like it — procedures it has used for 25 years to set standards for air pollutants like soot and lead. The administration said the change will streamline decision making. Perhaps it will. It will also have the further effect of decreasing the role of science in policy making while increasing the influence of the agency's political appointees.

This is disheartening, but not surprising. Whether the issue is birth control or global warming or clean air, this administration has already acquired a special place in regulatory history for the audacity with which it has manipulated or muzzled science (and in some cases individual scientists) that might discomfit its industrial allies or interfere with its political agenda.

The E.P.A. is required every five years to review scientific research and set new exposure levels for six pollutants identified as hazardous to human health. Normally, recommendations are first solicited from two groups of scientists: professional staff members inside the agency and independent outside scientists. Those recommendations are then sent to the department's senior officers — nearly all political appointees — who shape departmental policy and then send it to the White House and Office of Management and Budget for clearance.

Under the new process, initial reviews will be done by staff scientists and political appointees, who together will produce a synopsis of "policy-relevant" science — which sounds ominously like science tailored to predetermined policy outcomes. The independent scientists, meanwhile, will be frozen out until the very end, when they will be allowed to comment on proposals that will have already generated considerable momentum.

The betting among environmental groups is that these new procedures will lead to weaker air quality standards more in keeping with industry objectives — indeed, the American Petroleum Institute is already claiming credit for some of the changes. The new procedures will also help spare the agency the sort of public embarrassment it suffered in October, when its final standards for soot turned out to be far weaker than those recommended earlier (and virtually unanimously) by its staff scientists and the outside consultants.

Under the new process, when the E.P.A. considers how it will set air pollution standards, the only debate it will have is with itself.

Outsourcer In Chief (NYT)

By Paul Krugman

The New York Times, December 11, 2006

According to U.S. News & World Report, President Bush has told aides that he won't respond in detail to the Iraq Study Group's report because he doesn't want to "outsource" the role of commander in chief.

That's pretty ironic. You see, outsourcing of the government's responsibilities — not to panels of supposed wise men, but to private companies with the right connections — has been one of the hallmarks of his administration. And privatization through outsourcing is one reason the administration has failed on so many fronts.

For example, an article in Saturday's New York Times describes how the Coast Guard has run a $17 billion modernization program: "Instead of managing the project itself, the Coast Guard hired Lockheed Martin and Northrop Grumman, two of the nation's largest military contractors, to plan, supervise and deliver the new vessels and helicopters."

The result? Expensive ships that aren't seaworthy. The Coast Guard ignored "repeated warnings from its own engineers that the boats and ships were poorly designed and perhaps unsafe," while "the contractors failed to fulfill their obligation to make sure the government got the best price, frequently steering work to their subsidiaries or business partners instead of competitors."

In Afghanistan, the job of training a new police force was outsourced to DynCorp International, a private contractor, under very loose supervision: when conducting a recent review, auditors couldn't even find a copy of DynCorp's contract to see what it called for. And $1.1 billion later, Afghanistan still doesn't have an effective police training program.

In July 2004, Government Executive magazine published an article titled "Outsourcing Iraq," documenting how the U.S. occupation authorities had transferred responsibility for reconstruction to private contractors, with hardly any oversight. "The only plan," it said, "appears to have been to let the private sector manage nation-building, mostly on their own." We all know how that turned out.

On the home front, the Bush administration outsourced many responsibilities of the Federal Emergency Management Agency. For example, the job of evacuating people from disaster areas was given to a trucking logistics firm, Landstar Express America. When Hurricane Katrina struck, Landstar didn't even know where to get buses. According to Carey Limousine, which was eventually hired, Landstar "found us on the Web site."

It's now clear that there's a fundamental error in the antigovernment ideology embraced by today's conservative movement. Conservatives look at the virtues of market competition and leap to the conclusion that private ownership, in itself, is some kind of magic elixir. But there's no reason to assume that a private company hired to perform a public service will do better than people employed directly by the government.

In fact, the private company will almost surely do a worse job if its political connections insulate it from accountability — which has, of course, consistently been the case under Mr. Bush. The inspectors' report on Afghanistan's police conspicuously avoided assessing DynCorp's performance; even as government auditors found fault with Landstar, the company received a plaque from the Department of Transportation honoring its hurricane relief efforts.

Underlying this lack of accountability are the real motives for turning government functions over to private companies, which have little to do with efficiency. To say the obvious: when you see a story about failed outsourcing, you can be sure that the company in question is a major contributor to the Republican Party, is run by people with strong G.O.P. connections, or both.

So what happens now? The failure of privatization under the Bush administration offers a target-rich environment to newly empowered Congressional Democrats — and I say, let the subpoenas fly. Bear in mind that we're not talking just about wasted money: contracting failures in Iraq helped us lose one war, similar failures in Afghanistan may help us lose another, and FEMA's failures helped us lose a great American city.

And maybe, just maybe, the abject failure of this administration's efforts to outsource essential functions to the private sector will diminish the antigovernment prejudice created by decades of right-wing propaganda.

That's important, because the presumption that the private sector can do no wrong and the government can do nothing right prevents us from coming to grips with some of America's biggest problems — in particular, our wildly dysfunctional health care system. More on that in future columns.

A Town Running Hot And Cold (WP)

By Howard Kurtz

The Washington Post, December 11, 2006

Washington is awash in leaks these days, giving us a rare glimpse of what really goes on behind the carefully manicured landscape of official statements.

Goodness gracious, when even Donald Rumsfeld is saying privately that the Iraq war strategy "is not working well enough or fast enough" -- and someone furnishes his memo to the New York Times -- it is clear that the administration's once-legendary discipline has broken down.

What is also clear is that the private doubts of top officials are closer to the media's dark portrait of the war than to the "absolutely, we're winning" rhetoric of President Bush. That is especially noteworthy in light of all the criticism that administration officials have heaped on correspondents in Iraq for focusing too heavily on violence and ignoring signs of progress.

The reigning assumption of reporters -- that they're not always getting the full story from government officials -- seemed vindicated by twin leaks to the Times, involving the Rumsfeld memo and a classified assessment by national security adviser Stephen Hadley that was critical of Iraqi Prime Minister Nouri al-Maliki. The disclosures also underscored how a single Deep Throat, by slipping someone a piece of paper, can transform coverage of even the most important events. From the Pentagon Papers to the outing of Valerie Plame, this has been a well-trafficked route.

A similar phenomenon was at work with the Baker-Hamilton commission, where multiple sources dribbled out most of the panel's main recommendations on Iraq well before the findings were made public last Wednesday. In fact, the group headed by former secretary of state James Baker was such a sieve that by the time the members formally unveiled their report, it seemed like old news. An entire debate took place before any member of the group had made an on-the-record utterance.

The Hadley memo -- devastatingly leaked as Bush was about to meet with Maliki in Jordan -- said that "the reality on the streets of Baghdad suggests Maliki is either ignorant of what is going on, misrepresenting his intentions, or that his capabilities are not yet sufficient to turn his good intentions into action.'' A senior administration official told reporters that the memo was merely about "building better capabilities with the Maliki government."

Bush and Vice President Cheney have excoriated news organizations, especially the Times, for publishing national security secrets, but not this time. "I guess it's easier to rally the faithful with a cry of 'national security' than with a complaint that 'this is really embarrassing,' " Times Editor Bill Keller told the New York Observer.

But White House counselor Dan Bartlett says officials are indeed upset: "I haven't seen a more egregious leak in my time in government, timed to influence a very important meeting with a head of state."

David Greenberg, a professor of journalism and history at Rutgers University, says that "you see this kind of breakdown in an administration's unitary facade when there's a lot more internal dissension. As a rule, leaking occurs when people in an administration feel there's some kind of advantage to be gained in mobilizing public pressure, and journalistic pressure, against someone else on the inside."

The Rumsfeld memo, dated the day before the midterm elections, laid out a series of options on Iraq, including "withdraw U.S. forces from vulnerable positions" and move them to an "assistance" role, based in Kuwait and some parts of Iraq.

When asked by NBC's David Gregory why the president wasn't "saying publicly what top members of this administration who were running the war were saying privately," press secretary Tony Snow said Bush had made clear that "things are not getting well enough fast enough."

Snow also accused Gregory of being "partisan" last week after a question in which the correspondent merely summarized the recommendations of the Baker group and quoted co-chairman Lee Hamilton. Snow was arguing that the report was not a rejection of the president's Iraq policy, as it was depicted by nearly all news organizations.

At the very least, the Rumsfeld memo -- which some think was leaked by allies of the soon-to-be-former Pentagon chief to burnish his image -- clashes with his dogged public defense of the war policy and repeated accusations that reporters are getting things wrong.

"While you expect internal memos to be more wide-ranging and candid, I don't think there's as big a disconnect as is being suggested," Bartlett says. "I don't think it is the role of the secretary of defense to throw out a whole range of options for the public to chew on." Journalists have "selectively quoted the president," he says, setting up a false contrast by ignoring some of Bush's more sobering comments about Iraq.

One tidbit from the Rumsfeld memo shows the importance of the PR war: He says the administration should "go minimalist" by announcing any new policy on a "trial basis" so it can readjust if necessary -- "and therefore not 'lose.' "

While many leakers do their thing for policy reasons, they may also act out of pettiness, revenge or the ego trip of manipulating the media. Since the Times offered no clues about the sources' motivation, we can only speculate. But leaks, at least those that don't truly jeopardize national security, can be an important safety valve in a system where public pronouncements are carefully calibrated to reveal almost nothing. And journalists, of course, lap them up.

If this gusher of leaks shows that the Bush team is staunchly defending policies about which it harbors severe doubts, that has probably been true of every administration. But when the issue is a long, drawn-out, bloody war in which Americans are dying every week, the contrast between public and private comments seems more dramatic.Beyond Pajamas

Roger L. Simon has 90 bloggers affiliated with his Pajamas Media site, but now he's come up with a new wrinkle: "We're actually getting them to go report stuff."

Toward that end, the playwright and screenwriter was pleased when his servers crashed a week ago -- because a hot story was attracting a big crowd. Simon's new Washington editor, conservative journalist Richard Miniter, obtained a police report charging that six imams who had been removed from a US Airways flight in Minneapolis had been acting suspiciously.

"They were coming to us because we broke stories, not because someone said 'I don't like Don Rumsfeld,' " says Simon, who has written movies for the likes of Woody Allen, Ron Silver and Anjelica Huston. "The challenge for us is to fact-check. We're learning how to do this by the seat of our pants. I'm scared a lot of the time. . . . If you put something on a blog that's inaccurate, you will hear back in five minutes. No institution could afford that kind of fact-checking."

This thing called "reporting" could be the new cyberflavor of the month. The liberal Huffington Post also plans to get into original reporting and has hired Melinda Henneberger, formerly of Newsweek and the New York Times, as political editor. Josh Marshall, who runs the liberal Talking Points Memo, has hired two reporters for his TPM Muckraker spinoff.

The year-old Pajamas Media, which compensates its bloggers by placing ads on their Web sites, has leaned heavily to the right. Its stars include Fox News commentator Michelle Malkin and Instapundit's Glenn Reynolds, along with a few liberals such as the Nation's David Corn. But Simon, who describes himself as conservative on foreign affairs but socially liberal, says he plans more balance on the site.

His most "idiotic" move? Briefly changing the name from Pajamas to Open Source Media on grounds that the image of bloggers in their PJs was insufficiently serious.

Switching Sides

DOJ_NMG_0104257

Less than four weeks ago, Joseph Cannon was chairman of the Utah Republican Party. On Friday, he was named editor of the Deseret Morning News.

How could this be? Well, it didn't hurt that Cannon's grandfather and great-grandfather had edited the Salt Lake City paper, which is owned by the Mormon Church. But doesn't the naming of Cannon, a former Reagan administration official and Republican Senate candidate, make the paper look like a subsidiary of the GOP? Cannon told the Salt Lake Tribune that he would initially avoid handling local political stories and is "pretty comfortable being nonpartisan."

Only Fairness Will Assuage The Anxious Middle (FT)

By Lawrence Summers

Financial Times, December 11, 2006

A recent meeting with the incoming freshmen of the 110th House of Representatives made clear to me some of the forces that will shape American economic policy in the next few years. Coming from very different parts of the country and very different political perspectives, the new members of Congress have in common that they have all heard from the anxious middle class. They feel under enormous pressure to respond not just to the economic insecurity that middle-class voters feel, but also to voters' resentment at what they see as disproportionately prospering corporate elites. If the new Congress sees itself as having a mandate for anything in the economic area, it is for policies that "stand up" for ordinary Americans against the threat they perceive from corporate and moneyed interests.

These populist impulses have roots much deeper than campaign rhetoric. In the past, real wages and corporate profitability have moved together – increasing during economic expansions and when the US became more competitive, declining in recessions and when it encountered significant competitive threats. The unique feature of the current expansion is the divergence between the fortunes of capital and the fortunes of labour. While workers normally receive about three-quarters of corporate income, with the remainder going to profits and interest, the Economic Policy Institute has calculated that, since 2001, labour has received only about one-quarter of the increase in corporate income, as real wages have failed to keep pace with productivity growth.

Indeed, for most groups of workers, wages have not kept pace with inflation over the past several years. College graduates have been particularly hard hit, with their wages struggling to keep pace with inflation over the past five years. At the same time, profits per share for companies in the Standard & Poor's 500 index have increased at an annual rate of more than 10 per cent, even after taking into account inflation over the past four years.

This is not a trend that can be blamed on companies' earning more abroad: the US national income accounts, which include only profits earned at home, reveal that corporate profits as a share of gross domestic product are at their highest level in two generations and still rising.

With this kind of cleavage between the economic fortunes of companies and their workers, it should not be surprising that ordinary American families do not feel they are in the same boat as US corporations and their chief executives. Charles Wilson, Eisenhower's defence secretary, famously observed: "What's good for the country is good for General Motors and vice versa." Today, an increasing fraction of Americans see corporate leaders as part of Davos's team rather than America's.

These economic and political trends are and should be of great concern to the business community as well as to policymakers. They have led to populist policy proposals that cut against the grain of the market system by, for example, limiting free trade agreements, restricting outsourcing or limiting the ability of successful companies to expand.

The track record of such populist proposals is dismal. They rarely achieve their objectives and come with huge collateral costs. Policymakers forget at their peril that it is globalisation that has enabled the US economy to enjoy the favourable combination of low unemployment and low inflation of recent years – and that without open markets, product prices would be rising much faster, further attenuating living standards for middle-class families.

Yet it would not be a sufficient response for business or government simply to explain why populist policies would be counterproductive and to suggest – to borrow a term from a different debate – a "stay the course" strategy, perhaps with increased attention to the displaced. If the anxious middle's concerns about fairness are this serious when the unemployment rate is 4.4 per cent, they will be far greater whenever the economy next turns down.

This puts a premium on finding measures that go with the grain of the market system while also responding to concerns about fairness. The place to start is by restoring the progressivity of the tax system – an area where much can be accomplished before considering changes to the rate structure.

It is neither fair nor efficient to audit disproportionately the tax returns of those in the bottom half of the income distribution at a time when most of the $500bn tax gap comes from those with high incomes. There is no policy justification for allowing the erosion of corporate income tax through pervasive use of corporate tax shelters and manipulation of transfer price rules. Not only does this cost the government revenue, it also puts undue competitive pressure on companies that want to meet obligations to their workers.

Much more can done in a range of areas, from disclosure of executive compensation, to ensuring that the government leverages the volume of its purchases, to making financing of education at every level more equitable, to making sure that businesses continue to take responsibility for their workers' healthcare costs.

When, as now, concerns become sufficiently serious, those with bad ideas always win out over those with no ideas.

John Kennedy famously challenged Americans: "Ask not what your country can do for you. Ask what you can do for your country." In the years ahead, this question will be put with increasing force to US corporations. A great deal depends on the vigour with which it is answered.

Calming An Anxious Middle Class (LAT)

By Lawrence H. Summers, Lawrence H. Summers Is A Contributing Editor To Opinion.

The Los Angeles Times, December 11, 2006

The incoming Congress will need to pursue policies that promote more economic fairness without hindering globalization.

A RECENT MEETING with the incoming freshmen of the 110th House of Representatives made clear to me some of the forces that will shape American economic policy in the next few years. Coming from very different parts of the country and very different political perspectives, each of the new members of Congress has one thing in common: They have all heard from an anxious middle class.

The freshman class is under enormous pressure to respond not just to the economic insecurity that middle-class voters feel but to their resentment toward the disproportionately prospering corporate elite. If the new Congress sees itself as having any kind of economic mandate, it is for policies that "stand up" for ordinary Americans against the perceived threat from corporate and moneyed interests.

These populist impulses have roots much deeper than campaign rhetoric. In the past, real wages and corporate profitability moved together — increasing during economic expansions and when the United States became more competitive, declining in recessions and when we encountered significant competitive threats. The unique feature of the current expansion is the divergence between the fortunes of capital and the fortunes of labor.

Although workers have normally received about three-quarters of corporate income, with the remainder going to profits and interest, labor has received only about one-quarter of the increase in corporate income since 2001, the Economic Policy Institute has calculated. Real wages have failed to keep pace with productivity growth.

For most groups of workers, wages have not even kept pace with inflation over the last several years. College graduates have been particularly hard-hit. Meanwhile, profits per share for firms in the Standard & Poor's 500 index have increased at an annual rate of more than 10%, even after taking into account inflation over the last four years.

With this kind of cleavage between the economic fortunes of companies and their workers, it should not be surprising that ordinary American families do not feel like they are in the same boat as corporations and their chief executives, or even able to benefit from the same rising tides.

These economic and political trends should be of great concern to the business community as well as to policymakers in Washington. They will continue to lead to any number of populist proposals that cut against the grain of the market system, such as limiting free-trade agreements, restricting outsourcing or blocking the ability of successful companies to expand.

But the track record of populist economic policies has been dismal — they rarely achieve their objectives but incur huge collateral costs. Policymakers forget at their peril that globalization has enabled the U.S. economy to enjoy the very favorable combination of low unemployment and low inflation, and that without open markets, product prices would be rising much faster than they are, making living standards even worse for middle-class families.

Yet it is not sufficient for business or government to simply explain that populism would be counterproductive, and to recommend (to borrow a term from a different debate) a "stay the course" strategy, perhaps with some increased attention to those who have been displaced. If the anxious middle's concerns about fairness are this serious when the unemployment rate is 4.4%, they will be far greater whenever the economy next turns down.

This puts a premium on finding policies that complement the market system while responding to fairness concerns. The place to start is by restoring the progressivity of the tax system — where much can be accomplished without changing the rate structure.

It is neither fair nor efficient to audit disproportionately the tax returns of those in the bottom half of the income scale at a time when most of the $500-billion tax gap comes from those with high incomes. There is no policy justification for allowing the corporate income tax to be eroded through the pervasive use of tax shelters and the manipulation of transfer-price rules. Not only does this cost the government revenue, it puts unfair competitive pressure on firms that try to meet their obligations to their workers and their country.

There is much more that can be done: disclosing executive compensation, leveraging the volume of government purchases, making the financing of education more equitable, finding ways to assure that businesses continue to take responsibility for the healthcare costs of their workers and so on.

When, as now, concerns about economic fairness become sufficiently serious, those with bad ideas always win out over those with no ideas. President Kennedy famously challenged Americans: "Ask not what your country can do for you. Ask what you can do for your country." In the years ahead, this question will be put with increasing force to American corporations. A great deal depends on the vigor of their answer.

US Economy Chugs Ahead Despite Auto And Housing Slumps (CSM)

By Ron Scherer

The Christian Science Monitor, December 11, 2006

It's a spunky economy.

Evidence is accumulating that America is weathering the downturns in the housing and auto markets.

The economy does have a little wobble, and some economists believe the US is entering a period of subpar growth. But as a whole, it appears to be avoiding dire predictions of a sharp rise in unemployment and a loss of business confidence. In fact, when the Federal Reserve meets Tuesday, the central bankers - who aren't expected to change interest rates - are more likely to be talking about the economy's resilience than any future recession.

One sign of the life left in the economy came Friday when the Labor Department reported the creation of 132,000 new jobs in November. It also revised upward - by 42,000 jobs - its reports for September and October. The last major economic report of 2006 also showed a small uptick in the jobless rate, from 4.4 to 4.5 percent.

"The employment numbers show the economy is sturdy," says Mark Zandi, chief economist at Moody's Economy.com. "The problems in housing and autos have not infected the economy."

The economy's resilience has been a theme of several years' standing - one that predates the 9/11 attacks. The US output of goods and services has survived the damage of hurricanes Katrina and Rita, a run-up in oil prices, and the bursting of the high-tech balloon in early 2001.

One reason for its capacity to take hits is its growing diversity. Indeed, last month's new jobs came in health and financial services, travel, government hiring, and professional services - all helping to offset a struggling manufacturing sector. Even in manufacturing, the picture is not as bleak as it could be, in part because vigorous economies abroad are buying American-made goods.

DOJ_NMG_0104260

"It takes a lot to get the economy down," says Ethan Harris, chief economist at Lehman Brothers in New York. "It does have some natural resilience in the face of shocks."

The most recent shock, of course, is the downturn in the US housing market. Last month, the economy shed some 29,000 construction jobs, as builders either completed projects or abandoned them. It was the third consecutive decline in housing-related jobs.

Mr. Zandi expects the housing crunch to continue for another three to six months because housing starts are still falling. "But housing will be less of a drag into the spring and summer," he predicts.

The automotive sector is also acting as a brake on the economy. November saw the loss of 15,000 manufacturing jobs, most of them related to the auto industry. But the industry is no longer the powerful force on the economy it once was. The auto sector is about 10 percent of manufacturing, and manufacturing is about 12 percent of the nation's gross domestic product, estimates David Huether, chief economist for the National Association of Manufacturers. "My forecast is no growth in the auto business for the next couple of years," he says.

But as Friday's report showed, the economy is also busy creating new jobs.

"The demand for executives and managers is very strong," reports John Challenger of the Chicago outplacement firm Challenger, Gray & Christmas. "A significant number of companies are going out to find the top talent and not waiting for it to come to them."

In fact, the Fed, which has been worried about the inflationary effects of a tight labor market, is likely to remain worried, says former Fed economist Ann Owen, now a professor at Hamilton College in Clinton, N.Y. "This strong employment report validates what they have been saying," she says.

In November, wages rose by 0.2 percent, not as much as the 0.4 percent increase in October. On a year-over-year basis, wages are growing at a 4.1 percent rate, or relatively close to the increase in productivity.

"This employment report does not scream high inflation, but I think it's indicating consistent inflationary pressures," says Ms. Owen. "But there is not enough indication of inflation to have them increase interest rates."

Though the economy continued to create jobs, some economic reports last week painted a less rosy picture. In November, the Institute for Supply Management's manufacturing index fell below the level that indicates a growing economy. But its gauge of the nonmanufacturing sector rose to its highest level since May.

There was also mixed news about consumers. Consumer confidence waned in early December, according to a University of Michigan report. But other reports indicate that holiday sales are solid. The government will report this week on November retail sales and consumer prices.

"This holiday period is an important test for the economy," says Lehman Brothers' Mr. Harris. "When you step back and look at how the consumer is doing, you see a solid job market, lower gasoline prices, which help low-income people, and a strong stock market, which is good for the upper income. The only dark cloud is housing."

Slumping consumer confidence may be tied to noneconomic factors, such as the situation in Iraq, says Mr. Huether. Consumer confidence tumbled in advance of the Iraq war and then soared after major combat operations appeared to be over, he recalls. "People were concerned there would be a larger regional war," he says, "and once the uncertainty was squashed, confidence rebounded."

Investors' Hopes For Interest Rates Ignore Fed Stance (WSJ)

By E.S. Browning

The Wall Street Journal, December 11, 2006

Investors are widely expecting an investor-friendly announcement from the Federal Reserve interest-rate meeting tomorrow.

The Fed is expected to leave target interest rates unchanged, fueling hopes that it will start cutting rates some time next year, which would be good news for stocks and bonds.

But worries are spreading that, longer-term, investor hopes for interest rates may have gotten a little out of hand. If so, stocks and bonds both could be in for some rough waters in the coming months.

DOJ_NMG_0104261

"The stock market has come a long way quickly," with the Dow Jones Industrial Average up more than 14% since July 14, notes Marc Stern, chief investment officer at Bessemer Investment Management in New York. "Investor expectations may have gone a bit farther than they should have."

To prepare for the rough patch he fears may lie ahead, Mr. Stern has cashed in about 7% of his clients' funds, and is holding the money in short-term Treasury bills, just in case the stock market pulls back.

A big part of the underlying problem is that financial markets and Fed Chairman Ben Bernanke seem to be at odds about the longer-term interest-rate outlook. Mr. Bernanke has been remarkably open about his plans for interest rates, and he isn't talking about the kinds of rate cuts that many investors are banking on.

Fed interest-rate policy is one of the main determinants of both stock and bond prices. A cut in Fed rates tends to push down other market rates, including bond yields. And lower market rates are good news for stocks, because they make it less costly for companies to do business and for consumers to buy products.

Right now, investors are betting on lower rates in the months to come, and that is one reason that stocks have done so well since the summer. The strong payroll data that came in on Friday made futures traders pull in their horns a little. They were betting the Fed might start cutting rates at its March meeting. Now they are thinking it might wait until its following meeting, in May.

By June, futures trading indicates, the market thinks the Fed will have cut rates at least once, maybe twice. Traders are betting that the cuts will continue as the year wears on.

Trouble is, that isn't what Mr. Bernanke has been suggesting. He said in a speech two weeks ago that the question facing the Fed isn't whether to cut rates, it is whether to raise them to fight inflation. "Core" inflation, not counting volatile food and energy prices, still is higher than the 2% a year that the Fed has said it is willing to tolerate.

If inflation keeps moderating over the next few months and pulls back toward the 2% level, all well and good. But if inflation proves sticky, and stops pulling back, the Fed could be forced to cool it off by raising rates further. That is the message Mr. Bernanke is trying to send, and it is a message that the markets are having trouble receiving.

"Inflation is the key here," says Ethan Harris, chief U.S. economist at Lehman Brothers. "Inflation is the enemy of all markets. If you get serious inflation, if the Fed's fears materialize, then you will have the Fed hiking instead of cutting, pushing growth weaker. That is a lousy environment for both" the stock and bond markets.

Mr. Harris isn't forecasting a resurgence in inflation. He thinks it could remain more or less steady.

But, like the Fed, he doesn't think that is a sure thing, and he thinks investors could be making a mistake to assume that inflation is dying. Energy prices, for example, seemed a month ago to be pulling back from a peak. But lately, oil futures have pushed back above $60 a barrel. Commodity prices in general could prove more resilient than more-bullish investors expect, Mr. Harris worries.

If so, inflation could prove harder to vanquish than markets are assuming, requiring higher rates.

Beyond about three months, futures markets aren't very good predictors of future interest-rate policy, says Jim Bianco of Bianco Research in Chicago. They have 97% or 98% accuracy a day before a Fed decision, and 70% accuracy six weeks ahead. More than three months ahead, accuracy is no better than 50-50, he says. Like Mr. Stern and Mr. Harris, Mr. Bianco thinks the Fed may prove slower to cut rates than many investors expect.

None of this means that the Fed is fated to raise rates, or that it won't start cutting them at some point next year. But it could mean that market hopes for a cut in the first half of the year could be dashed. And that, at some point, could send stocks lower.

That concern is part of the reason that Mr. Stern, of Bessemer, decided to sell some of his clients' more volatile, pricier stocks and other investments and build up his cash reserve.

"Investors have bid up various assets to levels that appear to be unsustainable," Mr. Stern says. He says that the stocks of big multinational companies in general are still reasonably priced. But some smaller stocks, stocks in developing countries, some riskier bonds, some more speculative commodities and some real-estate investments "seem to be too highly priced," he says.

"We are increasingly priced for very good news and any disappointment could lead to some short-term pressures. Come spring of '07, investors could be getting antsy, saying, 'Where is the rate cut we had been counting on?' " he says.

DOJ_NMG_0104262

One irony, Mr. Bianco says, is that when Mr. Bernanke was nominated to lead the Fed around a year ago, critics worried that he would be soft on inflation. They nicknamed him "Helicopter Ben," because of a reference he made to an economic theory that called, figuratively, for dumping money into the economy from helicopters to prevent a depression.

Now, Mr. Bianco notes, "the guy that is holding the Fed back from easing is Helicopter Ben. We got him all wrong, at least for his first 10 months" in office.

Future Bright For Ex-members Of Congress (AP)

By Darlene Superville

AP, December 11, 2006

They lost their House and Senate seats, in some cases after keeping them warm for three decades. Others up and left on their own. But do not feel too sorry for some of these soon-to-be former lawmakers.

The future is bright for ex-members of Congress. No welfare cheese for them and little if any time among the ranks of the unemployed.

Some already have settled on new careers. Or old ones, as the case may be.

"I'll probably go home and drive a truck for a couple of weeks to get centered again," Rep. Mike Sodrel, R-Ind., a 60-year-old freshman who was defeated, said in an interview.

During the campaign that got him elected in 2004, Sodrel, a millionaire who owns three trucking and bus companies, cruised around southeastern Indiana in his own 18-wheeler.

Last month, he lost to Baron Hill, the Democratic congressman he beat two years ago.

Rep. Sherwood Boehlert, the House Science Committee chairman, is joining the Woodrow Wilson International Center for Scholars in Washington. The longest-serving New York Republican in Congress, Boehlert quit after 24 years.

Rep. Jim Leach, R-Iowa, sent packing after 30 years, is sifting through offers from prestigious East Coast universities — Georgetown, Harvard and Princeton among them — as well as schools in his Midwestern home state.

Defeated GOP Sen. Mike DeWine of Ohio is talking to universities about teaching and law firms about legal work as he prepares to re-enter private life for the first time in 30 years.

Some departing lawmakers insist they will go back home when they are sitting congressmen no more, after their successors are sworn in Jan. 4. This, despite the lucrative lure of joining the influence industry in the capital as a lobbyist or consultant.

"This has been a nasty and brutish place for some time," said Norman Ornstein, a congressional analyst at the American Enterprise Institute. "I think for many people, they're tired of it, even if they've been a part of it, and they'd like to get at least a breather away from it."

Lawmakers are more inclined to leave families home these days and sink fewer roots here than in the past. Beyond that, most of the departing members are Republican, and job prospects in the capital may be less-than-stellar, with Democrats taking control of both houses of the new Congress.

"The ability of Republicans to make money in the short run is less than it is for Democrats right now," said L. Sandy Maisel, director of the Goldfarb Center for Public Affairs at Colby College in Waterville, Maine. "I don't think the doors are as wide open."

Few ex-lawmakers go begging in the capital. Those who become lobbyists cannot approach their former colleagues for a year, under current rules, or two years if a Democratic proposal takes effect, but can lobby the administration right away.

Another option is to relax.

"Congress provides handsome retirements for itself," said former Rep. Bill Frenzel, R-Minn., who joined the Brookings Institution think tank after retiring in 1991. "So if you've been in Congress as some of these folks have been, 20, 25 years, it isn't necessary for them to find gainful employment."

That is what Rep. Henry Hyde, R-Ill., has decided to do, after 32 years of service.

At age 82, with failing ears and back and other problems that make getting around difficult, Hyde said he would fully retire — not even write his memoirs.

DOJ_NMG_0104263

Sen. Conrad Burns, denied a fourth term, said he will return to Montana to work on behalf of farmers, lawsuit reform and lower taxes — and on something closer to home.

"I'm to the age where I'd like to enjoy my granddaughter," said Burns, 71.

Sen. Bill Frist, the surgeon-turned-senator, is going back to Tennessee, having ruled out a run for the presidency, and said that for the near future, he will join missions overseas once more, as a doctor ministering to the poor.

"I'm going to live in the very same house that I was born in 54 years ago," he said in a Senate farewell speech.

Obama Takes First Steps In N.H. (WP)

By Dan Balz

The Washington Post, December 11, 2006

MANCHESTER, N.H., Dec. 10 -- The political phenomenon known as Sen. Barack Obama (D-Ill.) descended Sunday on the state with the nation's first presidential primary, drawing enthusiastic crowds and trailed by a huge media horde as he continued to stoke interest in a possible bid for the White House in 2008.

It was standing-room-only at a book signing Sunday morning in the seacoast town of Portsmouth, where the 750 available tickets were snapped up within hours of being made available to the public early last week. Here in Manchester, 1,500 people paid $25 apiece to hear him speak at a celebration of the New Hampshire Democratic Party's historic victories in last month's midterm elections.

To the question everyone wanted answered -- Is he going to run? -- Obama was noncommittal. "I haven't made that determination. I'm still running things through the traps," he said. He added, "I want to take my time on it, not only to make sure the politics makes sense but that I feel I have something unique to offer that would help move the country forward."

But he closed his speech here early Sunday night with words that seemed to signal growing interest in a campaign. "America is ready to turn the page," he said. "America is ready for a new set of challenges. This is our time. A new generation is prepared to lead."

Aides said a final decision will come in January, while in the meantime the Obama team continues to prepare the machinery for a campaign if the senator concludes that the time is right. Pronouncing himself "suspicious of hype," Obama said he would not be driven into the race "simply because of the opportunity but because I think I will serve the country well by that."

For those who came to see Obama, comparisons with Sen. Hillary Rodham Clinton (D-N.Y.), who leads the early national polls testing possible candidates for the Democratic nomination, were inevitable.

Clinton has been making calls into New Hampshire for the past week in anticipation of a possible 2008 campaign, but is not expected to appear in the state until next year. A number of Democrats who came to hear Obama said that, as much as they admire Clinton, they think she cannot win and see the senator from Illinois as a potentially attractive alternative.

All through the day, veterans of New Hampshire politics marveled at the swelling interest in a possible candidacy by a first-term African American senator who has had a book atop the New York Times bestseller list for the past month but who still has produced little in terms of a record as a national politician.

"In all my history, nobody's ever had a crowd this big, this early," said Charles Campion, a veteran party strategist based in Boston, as he watched Democrats assemble Sunday afternoon in Manchester.

This being New Hampshire, where citizens wait to see a candidate several times before declaring their allegiance, curiosity as much as real support attracted many of the people who came to see Obama. They wanted to know more who Obama is, what he believes and whether after two years in the Senate he is ready to be president.

"I need to know a little bit more about him, his stance on some serious issues," said Marilyn Johnson of Kittery, Maine, who was in the front row in Portsmouth. She worried that he is too inexperienced to be president, saying, "I think it would be a mistake for him to run in 2008."

Others were already ready to commit to an Obama candidacy. "He had the true spirit we're looking for," said Kathryn Frieden, a physician from Manchester. "I do hope he runs. I haven't been so excited by someone since JFK, when he was campaigning when I was 10 years old."

DOJ_NMG_0104264

Obama's day in New Hampshire was remarkable as much for the scene and speculation he generated than for anything specific he had to say. Wearing a black jacket, gray slacks and an open-collar white shirt, Obama delivered low-key remarks, speaking personally about his background and the origins of his belief in a more hopeful politics, as well as giving general views on issues such as energy, health care and Iraq.

He promised a new politics, to replace the "24-hour, slash-and-burn, negative-ad bickering, small-minded politics that doesn't move us forward."

Asked what he believes is different about his politics than those of other candidates, he said, "I think what's worked for me has been the capacity to stay true to a set of progressive values but to be eclectic in terms of the tools to achieve those progressive values. To not be orthodox. To be willing to get good ideas from all quarters."

As for the question of his readiness, Obama hinted he would have more to say about that if he enters the race, but he told reporters: "If I decide to run, at the end of the process, people will know me pretty well and they'll have a pretty good sense of whether I'm qualified to run."

The media contingent was estimated by organizers at 125 to 150 people. Obama's news conference attracted the kind of attention normally reserved for a winner of the New Hampshire primary, not a relative novice who has not even declared for president.

His presidential planning has not quite caught up with the hype and speculation that now follows him wherever he goes. Nor does he appear to be as far along as Clinton or a number of other Democrats, who have been tramping through this and other states for more than a year.

Obama has been meeting regularly with a small team of advisers and with his wife, Michelle, since last month's midterm elections. They have been assembling information about the cost of running in 2008, Obama's fundraising potential, overall strategy, the primary and caucus calendar, and the strength of the competition.

They also have been trying to identify potential staff at a time when Clinton and other Democratic candidates are moving to lock up the most experienced fundraisers, strategists, organizers, advance people and communications experts.

Obama's core team of advisers includes Chicago-based media consultant David Axelrod, Senate chief of staff Pete Rouse, communications director Robert Gibbs, strategist David Plouffe and pollster Paul Harstad. He has also recruited Steve Hildebrand, who ran the Iowa caucuses for former vice president Al Gore in 2000.

Family issues remain a potentially significant obstacle to Obama. He arrived in New Hampshire close to midnight Saturday because he was attending a ballet recital for one of his two young daughters, and the demands of a presidential campaign would keep him away from his family for much of the next two years.

Asked whether his wife is enthusiastic or resistant to a presidential campaign, he said he would keep private discussions private, but added, "She is the smartest, toughest, funniest best friend that I could ever hope for, and she's always had my back. Whatever decision we make, we'll make together."

New Hampshire Democrats had much to celebrate with Obama after their most successful election in a century. Last month, voters in the state tossed out two House incumbents, reelected Gov. John Lynch (D) with 74 percent of the vote, gave Democrats a majority on the powerful Executive Council and turned over control of the state legislature to Democrats for the first time since 1874.

But many in the crowds Sunday were there primarily to take the measure of Obama. Jeff Hughes, who came to Portsmouth with his wife, Barbara, best captured the moment as he summed up the opportunity and the risk for Obama as he weighs whether to run.

"Right now it's his opportunity, his time," Hughes said. "We'll see what he does with it."

Obama Draws Crowds As He Tours New Hampshire (USAT)

By Jill Lawrence

USA Today, December 11, 2006

MANCHESTER, N.H. — Illinois Sen. Barack Obama surveyed the 160 journalists and 22 TV camera crews documenting his first visit Sunday to the state that holds the first presidential primary. "I am suspicious of hype," he said.

DOJ_NMG_0104265

The half-Kansan, half-Kenyan author and politician, who electrified the 2004 Democratic convention with his keynote speech, says it is "a little surprising" to him and "completely baffling" to his wife that his 15 minutes of fame have extended well beyond 15 minutes.

But there's no doubt they have.

The large crowds and pop-star response Obama drew here underscored the new reality for Democrats seeking their party's nomination: New York Sen. Hillary Rodham Clinton is no longer alone at the top.

"Clearly, the dynamic has changed. You have a top tier of two," says Iowa activist Bonnie Campbell, a former state attorney general and party chairwoman who is a Clinton fan but calls Obama "impressive."

Obama, 45, has roiled the field since he said seven weeks ago that he is weighing a run for president. He assumed the No. 2 spot among Democratic prospects in a USA TODAY/Gallup Poll last month, with 19% to 31% for Clinton. His latest book, The Audacity of Hope, is the No. 2 seller on Amazon.com.

"I'm still running things through the traps," Obama said Sunday when asked if he'll take the leap.

There are many signs pointing to yes. One was the trip to New Hampshire. Obama has also been contacting labor leaders and congressmen in Iowa, which holds the first caucuses. His advisers have been informally seeking recommendations for key senior positions in a national campaign.

For months, Clinton was the runaway leader of the field in national polls. As Obama surged, her normally tight-lipped aides started confirming a series of people in line to be campaign manager, communications director and the like in a Clinton presidential campaign.

"This is the Barack Obama moment. You can't allow him to dominate the news cycle. So you're getting a much more open, talkative — for them — operation," said Doug Muzzio, a political scientist at Baruch College in New York City.

Howard Wolfson, a Clinton adviser, said Obama has had no impact on Clinton's plans or process. Asked whether Clinton would visit New Hampshire, Wolfson said, "There are no trips planned."

New Hampshire Democrats last month won majorities in the state House and Senate, ousted the state's two Republican congressmen, and helped re-elect a governor. Other Democratic presidential prospects, such as Indiana Sen. Evan Bayh and Iowa Gov. Tom Vilsack, helped achieve those victories here by donating time, money, advice and — in Bayh's case — 15 trained, funded campaign aides.

Bayh was in New Hampshire last weekend, too, on his seventh trip since July 2005. His events were the traditional kind — small and intimate — in a state where people expect to personally meet and question candidates. If Obama runs, he plans to do the same.

But first, the celebrity whirlwind tour. In Portsmouth, a small bookstore gave out 750 free tickets to a talk in one day. In Manchester, the state party sold 1,500 tickets to a victory party and could have sold scores more, party Chairwoman Kathy Sullivan said.

Obama offered both groups a personal, soothing style and pleas for civility, common sense and boldness in politics. He "confessed" to stealing his book's name from his pastor, because he loved it "as a personal motto" and also because it described "an essential part of the American character." In the face of big problems, Obama said, "what's hard, what's risky, what's truly audacious, is to hope."

In a preview of a possible campaign message, he said challenges such as energy independence, terrorism, Iraq and health care coverage for all can be overcome but will "require us to renew, reinvigorate that sense of possibility that we sometimes lose."

Obama's race and résumé— he has served eight years in the Illinois Senate and two years in the U.S. Senate — came up repeatedly Sunday. In Portsmouth, he described a tour of southern Illinois during his 2004 Senate campaign: "It's the South. It's closer to Little Rock and Memphis than it is to Chicago." Even in Cairo, site of "some of the worst racial violence in the nation" in the late 1960s and early 1970s, he was greeted by a supportive mixed-race crowd of 300.

Later, Obama said minority candidates "confront a higher threshold" in overcoming stereotypes. Once voters get to know you, he said, "people will judge you on the merits."

DOJ_NMG_0104266

Obama said some people would never vote for a black candidate, but they probably wouldn't vote for him anyway because of his politics. He also said he is not worried about his middle name, Hussein, because he's already managed to overcome "Barack Obama."

On the question of experience, Obama said he'd prove his mettle by answering tough questions. "If I decide to run, at the end of the process, people will know me pretty well," he said.

Bruce Buchanan, a presidential expert at the University of Texas, says experience does not necessarily correlate with success. James Buchanan had "a résumé to knock your socks off," but let the South secede and the nation slide toward civil war, the scholar said, while Abraham Lincoln was "one of the most inexperienced people ever to become president."

Jeff Bolster of Portsmouth, a historian at the University of New Hampshire, called Obama "a colossal rookie" but said people like the way he talks about "what is honorable and noble about our country." Newly elected state Sen. Deb Reynolds of Plymouth called Obama inspiring and visionary. Then she added, "At this point I'm evaluating everybody."

Obama Extends 15 Minutes Of Fame In N.H. (AP)

By Nedra Pickler

AP, December 10, 2006

MANCHESTER, N.H. -- Sen. Barack Obama sparked an early frenzy Sunday during his initial visit to the nation's first presidential primary state, but said he still hasn't decided whether to run and questioned whether all the hype was just part of his "15 minutes of fame."

The Illinois senator said he is still "running things through the traps" as he considers whether to join a field of Democrats that's expected to include front-runner Sen. Hillary Clinton and several other more experienced political hands.

"This is an office you can't run for just on the basis of ambition," Obama told reporters at a news conference between packed events. "You have to feel deep in your gut that you have a vision for the country that is sufficiently important that it needs to be out there."

At every turn in New Hampshire, Obama got encouragement to enter the race. Gov. John Lynch joked that the Rolling Stones were originally the headliners at a state party fundraiser where the $25 tickets quickly sold out. "But we canceled them when we realized Senator Obama would sell more tickets," Lynch said.

He drew 1,500 Democrats to a the fundraiser and several hundred more at a book signing in Portsmouth. Organizers of both events had to turn away many others who wanted to get in. The media contingent was so large it crowded into a Portsmouth coffee shop with the senator and knocked into tables and chairs as he tried to shake hands with the customers.

History teacher and Democrat Mark Bingham of Alton, N.H., met Obama and said that despite his inexperience, he could rank among presidents named Lincoln and Kennedy. "It's good to see politics going in another direction," Bingham told the senator.

Obama said he thinks the excitement reflects voters' desire for a new, positive direction in politics that is not about him as an individual.

"I am suspicious of hype," Obama told reporters. "The fact that my 15 minutes of fame has extended a little longer than 15 minutes is somewhat surprising to me and completely baffling to my wife."

Obama's appearance before the state party was to celebrate last month's election, where Lynch won by a record margin and the party took control of both houses of the legislature and New Hampshire's two U.S. House seats. As he took the stage, supporters handed Obama a petition signed by 12,000 people encouraging him to run, said Todd Webster, who started the RunObama.com Web site.

"I think to some degree I've become a shorthand or a symbol or a stand-in for now of a spirit that the last election in New Hampshire represents," Obama said. "It's a spirit that says we are looking for different. We want something new."

Obama's newness could be one of his biggest liabilities -- he's served just two years in the Senate after seven years in the Illinois Legislature. But Obama tried to turn his inexperience into an asset compared with other candidates who have been governing for much longer, although he didn't mention any rivals by name.

Clinton has not yet begun campaigning in New Hampshire, but she did host a dinner at her Washington home Sunday night for Terry Schumacher, a prominent New Hampshire Democrat who worked on Bill Clinton's 1992 and 1996 presidential campaigns. Sen. Clinton has made several calls this week to Democratic activists in New Hampshire and around the country, sounding out her presidential prospects.

Several other potential candidates have been making trips to New Hampshire for the last year and a half. Among the most frequent visitors is Indiana Sen. Evan Bayh, who filled a small room at a Manchester conference center Friday night but wasn't near the draw as Obama on his first trip. Anticipating the inevitable comparison to their visits on the same weekend, Bayh's aides joked that 1,000 more people were in an overflow room.

Bayh said he wasn't intimidated by the Obama mania as he talked to voters one-on-one. "I'm doing the things that matter in New Hampshire," Bayh said.

Because of their pivotal role, New Hampshire voters are accustomed to individual attention from presidential candidates. Obama tried to accommodate them despite the large turnout, staying for over an hour after his speech ended to sign a book for every person who wanted one. He also chartered an $11,000 flight to Chicago late Sunday night so he could greet attendees after his speech without having to worry about catching a plane.

State party officials said 150 members of the media signed up to cover Obama's speech, representing news organizations as far off as Australia and Japan. He answered questions about how his young children, his inexperience, his race and even whether his troublesome middle name -- "Hussein" -- could affect his candidacy.

He said his family is a major concern because his daughters are 8 and 5 years old. He said questions about his inexperience are valid. He said Americans are not concerned with middle names, but that all women and minority candidates have to overcome stereotypes so people will judge them on their merits.

"Are some voters not going to vote for me because I'm African-American? Those are the same voters who probably wouldn't vote for me because of my politics," he said.

Obama's advisers said he would consider his choice over the holidays, after his annual Christmas trip to his native Hawaii to visit his grandmother.

Obama, Visiting New Hampshire, Offers Flavor Of A Campaign That Might Be (NYT)

By Adam Nagourney

The New York Times, December 11, 2006

MANCHESTER, N.H., Dec. 10 — Senator Barack Obama came to New Hampshire for the first time in his life on Sunday, selling a message of hope while proclaiming himself wary of the wave of hype that surrounded his visit.

His visit gave Democrats in two sold-out halls a chance to inspect the man who has emerged as their party's strongest alternative to Senator Hillary Rodham Clinton as a presidential contender.

"It is flattering to get a lot of attention, although I must say it is baffling," Mr. Obama said here late Sunday afternoon.

"I think to some degree I've become a shorthand or symbol or stand-in for a spirit that the last election in New Hampshire represented," he said, referring to the losses of two incumbent congressmen here in November. "It's a spirit that says we are looking for something different — we want something new."

What New Hampshire saw was a first-term senator from Illinois who offered a strong condemnation of the way politics have been conducted in Washington and who positioned himself as someone who could strongly appeal to the more liberal Democrats who tend to dominate primaries. In two speeches and a news conference, Mr. Obama called for universal health care — the issue with which Mrs. Clinton, the New York Democrat, was once closely identified — a battle on global warming and a timed redeployment of troops from Iraq.

But most of all, Mr. Obama — tieless and grinning broadly as he encountered the kind of reception typically afforded a movie star — talked about what he decried as a toxically partisan atmosphere in Washington, clearly signaling a central theme of a presidential campaign by this newcomer to the national political stage.

"We've come to be consumed by a 24-hour, slash-and-burn, negative ad, bickering, small-minded politics that doesn't move us forward," he said in Portsmouth, emphasizing that both parties were at fault. "Sometimes one side is up and the other side is down. But there's no sense that they are coming together in a common-sense, practical, nonideological way to solve the problems that we face."

Mr. Obama, 45, said he had not decided if he would actually run for president, saying he was running it "through the traps." But his appearance here — two years before the 2008 presidential election, in the state with the nation's first primary — was nothing short of a spectacle.

His two public events — a book signing in Portsmouth and a victory rally for the New Hampshire Democratic Party here — sold out days ago. A total of 2,500 people turned out to see him, including 1,500 who paid $25 each to attend the rally.

"We originally scheduled the Rolling Stones, but we canceled them when we figured out that Senator Obama would sell more tickets," Gov. John Lynch said.

In Portsmouth, he walked into the room to an explosion of camera flashes and a prolonged standing ovation. After his speech, hundreds of people waited more than an hour for Mr. Obama to sign a copy of his latest book, "The Audacity of Hope." And 150 members of the news media received credentials to cover his visit, as Mr. Obama realized when he loped before a wall of reporters and cameras for a news conference.

"Hey everybody, my name is Barack Obama," he said. "And it must be a slow news day."

Turning serious, he said: "I will say this: I am suspicious of hype. The fact that I've become, that my 15 minutes of fame has extended a little longer than 15 minutes, is somewhat surprising to me."

Mr. Obama said he believed he had become a symbol of the voters' desire for new faces and a new tone in Washington. "Whether it's me or someone else, what is most important — and over the long-term most newsworthy — is that desire on the part of the voters."

Whatever the reason, Democrats long acquainted with New Hampshire politics were stunned to walk into a ballroom at the Center of New Hampshire here and see signs proclaiming the event sold out. "I've never seen anything like this before this early," said Mike Ballantine, a computer programmer from Nashua, as across the room Mr. Obama was surrounded by more than 100 people, many holding up his book and hoping for an autograph. "I mean it's amazing. Really amazing."

And the reality of Mr. Obama — as opposed to what people had read or seen in weeks of extraordinarily favorable coverage — struck a chord with some. "I was very impressed with the fact that he wants to bring people together," said Betsy Shultis, a former state representative. "I was very taken with him."

Elizabeth Fairchild, 37, of Rye, N.H., said: "I thought he was fantastic. He exceeded my expectations."

But other Democrats said they thought that someone with Mr. Obama's experience had little chance of winning a national election.

"I've looked through his book, and he barely touches issues," said Robert Padian, 59, an unemployed database administrator. "I think he's a serious candidate, but I don't think he has great potential. No track record, and there are too many guys ahead of him in line."

Mr. Obama told reporters that he expected questions about his experience and qualifications. If he did run, he said, "at the end of the process people will know me pretty well, and they'll have a pretty good sense of whether I am qualified or not."

Crowds Adore Obama (LAT)

By Terry McDermott, Mark Z. Barabak

The Los Angeles Times, December 11, 2006

MANCHESTER, N.H. — Illinois freshman Sen. Barack Obama, borne aloft by a popularity bubble that seems to float higher by the day, did nothing to deflate it Sunday on his first trip to New Hampshire.

Neither did he move any closer to a declaration of candidacy for the 2008 Democratic presidential nomination, for which the New Hampshire primary will be a key early test. In appearances here and in Portsmouth, he was content to play with the notion and tease the expectations of overflow, adoring crowds.

Obama said he was flattered and humbled, but also wary.

"I am suspicious of hype. The fact that my 15 minutes of fame has extended a little longer than 15 minutes is somewhat surprising to me and completely baffling to my wife," he said at a news conference between events. "And I think what's going on is people are very hungry for something new. I think they are interested in being called to be a part of something larger than the sort of small, petty, slash-and-burn politics that we have been seeing over the last several years. To some degree, I think I'm a stand-in for that desire on the part of the country."

The Portsmouth appearance was a promotional event for Obama's bestselling new book, "The Audacity of Hope."

Obama says the book reflects what he thinks of as a fundamental American optimism that problems can be overcome and society can be made better and more fair.

"I think what's been happening over the last several months is that people have realized that kind of spirit has been lost over the last decade," Obama said. "It's a spirit that says we are looking for something different. We want something new."

Hundreds of people stood in line for up to an hour for autographs. He stayed until the last book was signed. He stayed for an hour after the state party event as well, besieged by party activists. He seemed to revel in the crowds' enthusiasm.

Obama has said he is contemplating running for president and intends to decide by early next month. He said Sunday he was still consulting with his family about it.

Sunday's reception could not have dissuaded him. He was the sole potential presidential contender invited to participate in the state Democratic Party's commemoration of the 2006 midterm election, in which they gained more control of the state's political machinery than at any time since the 19th century. He was greeted upon arrival in the state by a column in a local newspaper comparing him to Robert F. Kennedy.

Gov. John Lynch said the state party originally planned to invite the Rolling Stones, "but we canceled them when we realized Sen. Obama would sell more tickets."

People from 13 states purchased the 1,500 $25 tickets, and hundreds more were turned away. The day was marked by a friendly, almost giddy, festive mood. There was a lot of hugging going on. And cheering. It was a strange turn for New Hampshire voters, who are often characterized — and, in fact, characterize themselves — as tough nuts to crack.

Obama's speech to the party activists, emphasizing the same themes as his book, was interrupted several times by spontaneous applause. Several members of the audience said afterward they were applauding as much because of what Obama represented as for what he said.

"He seems like just a regular guy. He talks, uses language like we would use," said Nell Conkright, who owns a bookstore in Peterborough. There is a freshness about Obama that she said was compelling.

Obama, just the third African American senator since Reconstruction, was asked if the country was ready for a black president.

"Race is still a powerful force in this country," he said. "Any African American candidate, or any Latino candidate, or Asian candidate or woman candidate confronts a higher threshold in establishing himself to the voters…. Are some voters not going to vote for me because I'm African American? Those are the same voters who probably wouldn't vote for me because of my politics."

Although only two candidates, Iowa Gov. Tom Vilsack and Indiana Sen. Evan Bayh, have formally announced campaigns for the 2008 Democratic nomination, many are considering the race. They include the 2004 ticket, Sen. John F. Kerry of Massachusetts and John Edwards of North Carolina; former Vice President Al Gore; Sens. Joseph R. Biden Jr. of Delaware, Hillary Rodham Clinton of New York and Christopher J. Dodd of Connecticut; retired Gen. Wesley K. Clark; and Gov. Bill Richardson of New Mexico.

To some extent, political professionals say, the outline of the contest has already emerged: Clinton versus everyone else, with the rest struggling to emerge as her main opponent. If Obama enters the race, the professionals generally agree that he would immediately become the principal challenger.

David Doak, a veteran Democratic consultant, said Obama "points out the shortcomings of what is otherwise a pretty good field of candidates. He's clearly a guy who excites people…. He soaks up a lot of the energy [other candidates] would need to harness to break out of the pack. You assume Hillary's going to have the money, she's got the name identification, she's got the organization, she's got a group of people who've been through this before.

The degree to which Obama outshines potential competitors was illustrated by an appearance made by Bayh two nights earlier. He drew perhaps one-tenth as many people.

DOJ_NMG_0104270

Although Doak's comments were echoed by other consultants, many cautioned it was very early. Steve Elmendorf, who worked for Kerry's 2004 campaign, said, "People will have a chance to prove themselves and get noticed. [Obama] may stumble. Others may stumble, others may shine. There's a long way yet to go."

Flurry In New Hampshire (BSUN)

By Paul West

The Baltimore Sun, December 11, 2006

MANCHESTER, N.H. -- Politics-mad New Hampshire, jaded beyond reason by never-ending presidential campaigns, hadn't seen anything quite like this before.

Democratic Sen. Barack Obama made his debut in the kickoff primary state to adoring responses yesterday from large crowds of voters seemingly convinced that they were witnessing the next big thing on the national scene.

"I see him as very messianic," said Kelsey Woodward, a 64-year- old artist, at Obama's first stop, in Portsmouth. "People are craving a fresh voice, a fresh face, a fresh outlook."

The 45-year-old Illinois senator, who is tapping into the public's desire for an end to the bitter partisanship in Washington, might not make it all the way to the White House. But he appears to have put his party under a spell that has veteran politicians reaching back to the Kennedy era for comparisons.

His emergence could pose a problem for less charismatic rivals who have spent years laying the groundwork for their own bids. Analysts say there is only so much attention, money and endorsements to go around, and with Obama and Sen. Hillary Rodham Clinton likely to head the field, there may not be much room for other contenders.

"We've got a lot of 800-pound gorillas this time seriously looking at it," said Raymond Buckley, vice chairman of the state Democratic Party, referring to the collection of senators and governors gearing up to run.

Only one or two may be able to compete successfully in the shadow of Clinton and Obama, some analysts say. Money is a major hurdle. A candidate will have to raise $25 million to $40 million over the next 12 months to be competitive, according to campaign aides.

Nevertheless, a candidate other than Clinton or Obama could certainly become the nominee. "New Hampshire's been known to give a little oxygen to somebody that other people aren't looking at," said Buckley.

That didn't seem to be the case this weekend, however, for one Democratic hopeful. Indiana Sen. Evan Bayh, making at least his seventh trip to the Granite State in the past 18 months, attracted scant attention. About 75 activists turned out to greet him Saturday night at a banquet hall in Manchester, the state's largest city.

Bayh said he felt "fine" about the Obama invasion, insisting that "we're not competing with one another." Bayh said he was doing what presidential candidates always do here - "seeing people in coffee shops and living rooms" - and said was unworried about getting crowded out of the '08 picture.

Kathy Sullivan, the state party chairman, was on hand to thank Bayh for his help in the midterm campaign. Bayh dispatched a cadre of young organizers into New Hampshire to help local candidates in last month's midterm election, which resulted in a surprise sweep of congressional seats and a Democratic takeover of the state legislature.

But when she looked for a speaker to headline a celebration of that triumph, the culmination of a decade-long Democratic surge in the state, Sullivan turned to Obama, and the event quickly became more about the next election than the last one.

Demand for tickets forced organizers to move the rally to a larger venue, where it quickly sold out at $25 a head. "We've never had a standing crowd of 1,500 people," said party spokeswoman Kathleen Strand.

Democratic Gov. John Lynch, re-elected last month by a record margin, joked, "We originally scheduled the Rolling Stones for this party. But we canceled them when we realized Sen. Obama would sell more tickets."

Obama, greeted by an enthusiastic roar, said he was flattered by the excitement surrounding his prospective candidacy. He is expected to announce his plans next month, aides said.

"I actually think that the reason that I'm getting so much attention has less to do with me and more to do with you," he told the crowd. "I think to some degree I've become a shorthand or a symbol or a stand-in, for now, of a spirit ... that says that we are looking for something different. We want something new."

DOJ_NMG_0104271

"America is ready to turn the page," said Obama, who was born when John F. Kennedy was president and was elected to the Senate last year. "This is our time, a new generation that is prepared to lead."

Campaign veterans, including supporters of rival candidates, praised Obama's performance. They said they had never seen such a large crowd so early in the campaign, particularly for someone just setting out on the White House trail - in this case, a freshman senator still seemingly wet behind his jug ears.

At a news conference, surrounded by many of the 150 journalists who had credentials for the event, Obama acknowledged that, as an African-American, he would face "a higher threshold" in a presidential election, as would a woman or an Hispanic candidate.

But by the end of the campaign, he said, "people will know me pretty well [and] whether I'm qualified to serve or not."

Asked whether his middle name, Hussein, would hurt his chances, Obama replied, "It would be one thing if my name was John Hussein Smith." But, he said, "the American people are not concerned about middle names."

Party activists said they are looking for a candidate who could lead Democrats back to the White House in 2008.

Holly Roche, a 42-year-old massage therapist from Rollinsford, said she "wanted to experience the purported mystique" of the junior senator from Illinois.

"I appreciate his message of non-negative politics," she added.

Retired municipal worker Edward Solomon, 63, was part of the crowd that had snapped up the 750 tickets in Portsmouth for a book-signing and a chance to catch Obama's stump speech, built in part around the title of his latest work, The Audacity of Hope.

Afterward, as he stepped from the hall into an unusually mild December day, Solomon said that when he listened to the tall, thin senator's upbeat message, "I could hear a sign of hope, that hope was there for all of us."

Democratic "Rock Star" Obama Tests Presidential Waters (AFP)

AFP, December 10, 2006

Democratic star Senator Barack Obama is on his first trip to the important political testing ground of New Hampshire as he lays the foundation for a possible 2008 presidential run.

Obama, who was speaking Sunday at celebrations to mark his party's success in last month's elections, also reportedly planned to use the visit to introduce himself to the political establishment in New Hampshire, which holds America's first presidential primary in little more than a year.

Considered a relative newcomer on the national political stage, Obama has not said he is certain to run for the White House. But he is expected to make a decision in the next few weeks.

There is no shortage of supporters pressing the photogenic African-American lawmaker to toss his hat into the ring however. Among them are longtime booster, Senate colleague Dick Durbin, who has begun an online petition drive urging Obama to run.

Another new website boosting Obama's presidential candidacy is www.runobama.com.

Meanwhile, Senator Hillary Clinton, tipped by polls and pundits as the early favorite for the 2008 Democratic nomination, also has been holding talks with party officials on joining the race, according to news reports. Newsweek magazine reported that Democratic insiders say it is "99 percent certain" that the former first lady will run.

So far only one Democrat has formally announced he will challenge for the nomination, Iowa governor Tom Vilsack.

Big Crowds For Obama Signal That 2008 Contest Is Wide Open (MCT)

By Steven Thomma

McClatchy, December 11, 2006

MANCHESTER, N.H. - Sen. Barack Obama shook up the embryonic 2008 presidential campaign Sunday, igniting a tumultuous response in his first visit to the state that will kick off primary voting for the 2008 Democratic nomination in about a year.

More than 1,500 Democrats crowded into a Manchester armory to see and hear the freshman senator, a turnout local organizers called unprecedented this long before the voting.

DOJ_NMG_0104272

The armory crowd roared its approval when Gov. John Lynch speculated that Obama might run, and they interrupted the senator's half-hour speech several times with ovations. His speech focused on forging a bipartisan civil approach to solving problems in education, healthcare and national security. That amounts to "an American agenda," he said, not a partisan one.

Earlier Sunday, more than 700 showed up to see him at a Portsmouth book signing, forcing the event to be moved from a bookstore to a conference center.

The Illinois senator hasn't even decided yet whether to run. And not all who showed up to hear him would necessarily vote for him. But the intense curiosity and enthusiasm about him among Democrats suggests that the party is looking for new leadership - and that the presumed frontrunner, Sen. Hillary Rodham of New York, is anything but a certain winner.

"We've never had an event like this," said New Hampshire Democratic Party Chairwoman Kathy Sullivan.

The $25 tickets sold out in a blur of advance demand, and party officials posted signs warning people there wasn't room for anyone else.

More than 150 members of the news media, including foreign press, covered Obama's arrival. Candidates at this stage of a campaign normally consider themselves lucky to draw four or five reporters.

By comparison, another potential 2008 Democratic candidate who's been visiting New Hampshire frequently went largely unnoticed at a simultaneous visit. Sen. Evan Bayh of Indiana ate breakfast all but anonymously with two other people Sunday in a restaurant next door to the Obama event. The evening before, he hosted a reception that drew about 50 Democrats.

For his part, Obama claimed humility.

"I'm suspicious of hype," Obama said upon arriving in Manchester. "That my 15 minutes of fame has extended somewhat is surprising to me and baffling to my wife."

But he said his civil approach, which he calls "a hopeful politics," might be striking a chord with Americans weary of partisan sniping and gridlock in Washington.

"People are very hungry for something new," he said. "To some degree, I am a stand-in for that desire."

Indeed, many Democrats noted that they like the fact that he's a newcomer to national politics, with just two years in the Senate.

"We're looking for somebody new," said Carol Williams of Manchester. "People are tired of the same old stuff, the same old politics. All the rest of them are part of the old boy, old girl network.

"Barack is eloquent and charismatic. He has the same charisma as John Kennedy," she said. "I know; I worked for him here in 1960."

She wasn't the only one who likened Obama to President Kennedy.

"He's passionate and he's young. It's a Jack Kennedy thing," said Carol Backus of Manchester.

If Obama exudes a JFK-like charisma for some, he doesn't share Kennedy's 14 years of pre-presidential experience in Congress. Some Democrats said they didn't mind his lack of experience; others said it would be a significant hurdle.

"The pedigree is important, but the ability to connect to people is more important," said state Sen. Lou D'allesandro of Manchester. "He's a very attractive candidate."

"He may be a little light on experience," said Rolf Bremer, the party chairman in the town of Brookline. But he said he was willing to look at Obama largely because he doesn't think Clinton can win.

A new national poll last week showed Clinton ahead in the early jockeying for the Democratic nomination, but trailing either Republican Rudy Giuliani or John McCain in a hypothetical general election.

Clinton had the support of 33 percent of Democrats for their party's nomination, according to the Marist College-WNBC poll. Former Sen. John Edwards of North Carolina had 14 percent, former Vice President Al Gore had 13 percent, Obama had 12 percent, and Sen. John Kerry of Massachusetts had 5 percent.

An X factor is Obama's race - he would be the first African-American presidential nominee of either major party.

"Race is still a powerful force," he acknowledged Sunday, adding that minorities and women "confront a higher threshold" with voters.

DOJ_NMG_0104273

But he said he was optimistic, thanks to his own election and the fact that Democrat Harold Ford, an African-American who ran unsuccessfully for the Senate this year in Tennessee, actually got more votes from whites than pre-election polls had indicated and almost won.

Obama also said he didn't think his middle name, Hussein, would be a problem. If names were a problem, he said with a smile, voters would never get past his first name.

"When you're already starting with Barack ..." he said with a laugh.

10 Years Later, It Still "Takes A Village," Hillary Sez (NYDN/AP)

By The Associated Press

New York Daily News, December 11, 2006

WASHINGTON - Sen. Hillary Rodham Clinton is polishing up her most famous phrase as she edges closer to a presidential run, writing in a new introduction to her book "It Takes a Village" that Sept. 11 and the Internet make her tome on child-rearing even more relevant today.

"The five years since 9/11 have reinforced one of my main points: How children are raised anywhere can impact our lives and our children's futures," Clinton writes in the introduction to the 10th anniversary edition of the book, which goes on sale Dec. 12. An early copy was obtained by the Associated Press.

The New York senator is the early frontrunner for the Democrats' 2008 presidential nomination, and the new version of the book features a smiling Clinton surrounded by children. Clinton did not appear on the cover of the 1996 book.

In recent weeks, she lined up support among other New York officials for a presidential bid, leaving many convinced she has already decided to run but is waiting to make an official announcement.

In the new introduction, the senator acknowledges the book's title provided plenty of comic opportunities for headline writers, adding that her favorite was "It Takes a Village to Raise a Pig."

Many conservatives scoffed that the book was little more than liberal claptrap, and Sen. Rick Santorum, R-Penn., even wrote a counter-book in 2005, "It Takes a Family."

The introduction by Clinton argues that the core points she made as First Lady are if anything more important now that the Internet and electronic devices like MP3 players have such large roles in children's lives.

"Today's electronic village has certainly complicated the always difficult challenge of parenting and raising the next generation," Clinton writes, noting that in 1996 few were on the Internet and cell phones "weighed as much as bricks."

"Media saturates our kids' lives as never before," she warns, repeating concerns she has raised as a senator that violent video games may be harming children's psychological development. As if the prove the point, the book now comes with its own Web site.

Clinton's new introduction avoids taking many direct shots at Republicans, but she does decry the $3 trillion rise in federal debt over the past five years, arguing it amounts to a $28,000 "birth tax" on the "tiny shoulders" of each American child.

Since leaving the White House and entering the Senate, Clinton has used her sideline in book-writing to advance her politics and grow her bank account. She sold millions of copies of her 2003 memoirs "Living History," which at the time boosted speculation she might run for president in 2004.

"It Takes a Village" has 700,000 copies in print and the audiobook, narrated by Clinton, won a Grammy in 1997 for best spoken word album. Continuing the arrangement with publisher Simon & Schuster, proceeds from the book will still go to charity.

To promote the new version, Clinton will appear at a bookstore in Manhattan's Lincoln Center on Monday, Dec. 18, and two days later at a bookstore in New York's Westchester County, where she lives with her husband, former president Bill Clinton. She will also make national television appearances that week on a morning show and a talk show promoting the book.

The book appearances will likely only amplify the interest in if and when she will formally declare a bid for president. Through 2006, she was considered the early favorite among Democrats, but now that the November election has past others are stepping forward to express interest and test the waters.

DOJ_NMG_0104274

Sen. Barack Obama has begun reaching out to Democrats about a possible bid, and Iowa governor Tom Vilsack has launched an exploratory committee. Also in the mix are New Mexico governor Bill Richardson, 2004 nominee John Kerry, and former vice president Al Gore.

Road To The White House Starts In NY (NSDY)

By Emerson Clarridge, Craig Gordon, Glenn Thrush, Bryan Virasami

Newsday, December 11, 2006

New York City Mayor John Lindsay and Gov. Nelson Rockefeller unsuccessfully sought the nomination in the 1960s.

Several candidates who were born or were in politics in the Empire State did make it to the White House. They include Martin Van Buren, who took office in 1837; Millard Fillmore, who became president in 1850; Chester A. Arthur, who took office in 1881; Grover Cleveland, who was elected in 1884 and 1892; Teddy Roosevelt, who became president in 1901; and his fifth cousin Franklin D. Roosevelt, who was elected to four terms beginning in 1932.

As the 2008 presidential cycle gets under way, it is unusual, though, that the state has four prospective candidates. And it would be unprecedented if, in the end, all of them remain in the race until the nominating conventions. Many political observers think it's a long shot. -- Emerson Clarridge

Rudy Giuliani

Can a thrice-married New Yorker on the wrong side of his party on the Big Three -- gays, guns and God -- really get elected to the White House?

Rudolph Giuliani wants to find out.

By all accounts, "America's mayor" is looking at becoming America's president, and he's taking carefully calculated steps to set up a campaign.

Giuliani has been scooping up sorely needed national talent to bolster his City Hall brain-trust, including a Bush-Cheney campaign honcho.

He held one confab with Republican money-types and is planning another to crack open the checkbooks Dec. 19. And he visited a California think-tank for foreign-policy tutoring.

Even without lifting a finger this summer, Giuliani consistently polled even with or ahead of John McCain, the Arizona senator. But while Giuliani is just now moving to run, McCain has been working for months on a 50-state organization.

Giuliani also risks being outpaced by new conservative heartthrob Mitt Romney, the Massachusetts governor.

Giuliani is riding high on 9/11 name recognition, and some believe that alone can take him far into the race -- perhaps if only as McCain's running mate.

If Giuliani did get the GOP nod, it could set up a Rudy-vs.-Hillary matchup that would be like the Subway Series of presidential politics.

But count on Giuliani foes to point out other parts of his record that won't sit well with hard-right and evangelical Christian voters in places like South Carolina.

He will have to explain support for gay rights, abortion rights and gun control, as well as what some may see as a less-than-godly personal life, with a messy divorce marked by allegations of an extramarital affair. -- Craig Gordon

Sen. Hillary Rodham Clinton

If she's not running, she's walking as fast as she can.

Sen. Hillary Rodham Clinton was supposed to engage in a slow rollout of her presidential campaign this month, but the New York Democrat seems to have speeded things up, possibly to deal with the looming threat posed by emerging star Barack Obama.

Technically, she's not committed to a run. But like her beloved Chicago Cubs in baseball's winter meetings, Clinton has gone on a hiring spree, tapping a national fundraising director, a sharp-elbowed spokesman to go with her coterie of other sharp-elbowed spokesmen, a national field director, and a campaign manager.

Clinton aides claim she hasn't been flustered by Obama's flirtation with a run, but some supporters have privately taken to slipping some salt into the sugar when it comes to the freshman Illinois senator.

DOJ_NMG_0104275

"Do you know what his middle name is?" one booster asked recently. (Answer: "Hussein!")

A nationwide Fox poll shows Obama trailing Clinton 33 percent to 12 percent among registered Democrats. Al Gore and John Edwards poll 12 percent and 11 percent, respectively.

But those numbers are meaningless if Clinton can't win some early primaries. She began courting officials for 2008 about 10 days ago when she met with New York politicians. By the middle of last week, she'd gone national, letting slip that she was bringing to Washington key Democrats from New Hampshire and Iowa to discuss a possible bid.

The next step for Clinton would be to create a presidential exploratory committee. Curiously, the only organization Clinton has created recently is a Senate committee for 2012, according to federal filings. -- Glenn Thrush

Gov. George Pataki

That outgoing Gov. George Pataki is merely considering a presidential bid didn't stop him from making yet another trip last week to New Hampshire, site of the first presidential primary.

Pataki is expected to make his decision in the next few weeks, spokeswoman Alicia Preston said Friday. "He's been spending time weighing the options with his family," she said.

Pataki hosted a lunch Wednesday for Republican lawmakers in New Hampshire on his 12th trip this year to that state.

Bad weather forced him to cancel a trip to Iowa, which he has visited nine times this year.

Although Pataki lost three key Republican advisers in Iowa last month, he opened a campaign office in a suburb of Des Moines and named a new leader for his political action committee, a former political director for Vice President Dick Cheney.

A moderate Republican who supports abortion rights and gay marriage, Pataki has been criticized by conservatives for state spending increases. But he has said his "vision and a proven record of leadership" could help him win.

According to a WNBC/Marist Poll last week, Pataki had 1 percent support among Republicans and Republican-leaning independents. Former New York Mayor Rudolph Giuliani led the poll with 24 percent, and Arizona Sen. John McCain was a close second with 23 percent.

Michael Dawidziak, a Bohemia political consultant who works mostly with Republicans, agreed Pataki would be a long shot. But he added, "He's run against the odds before. He was elected governor of a blue state that's got 2 million more Democrats than Republicans."

Some observers speculate that Pataki is keeping his name in circulation to be considered as a vice presidential running mate. -- Emi Endo

Mayor Michael Bloomberg

Mayor Michael Bloomberg insists he's not a candidate for the White House but is confident he would make a good president. He plans to focus on philantrophy after City Hall, he has said, and yet he has declined to rule out a run for president.

Often described as a firm and decisive executive, Bloomberg prefers to ride the wave of speculation about whether he will run.

While he has denied he would change his mind about running, Bloomberg's contradictory comments in a New York magazine cover story last week suggested his staff members aren't the only ones dreaming of Washington.

"The answer is yes," he said when asked if he would be a good president. He also criticized the partisan environment in Washington, suggesting that someone with middle-of-the-road views would be an asset.

Political observers say he could free up $500 million of his own funds to run as an independent.

"He's not running for president," spokesman Stu Loeser said Friday. But on Thursday night, at a staff party at Gracie Mansion, there was food, drink and presidential fantasy.

Dressed as Bruce Springsteen with a white T-shirt and blue jeans, Bloomberg reportedly was joined by costumed deputy mayors and aides singing a takeoff on "Born to Run."

"Baby we were born to run! We'll win, you'll see -- and beat the GOP and Democrats. Unite the country -- make more jobs. And banish all trans fat! Fix the schools -- make profits grow. Get the White House painted saffron by Christo."

Loeser said the song was "an inside joke intended only for the mayor's staff." -- Bryan Virasami

GOP Hopeful McCain Visits Clinton, Giuliani Territory (NSDY/AP)

DOJ_NMG_0104276

By Richard Pyle

Newsday, December 11, 2006

NEW YORK -- Paying a visit to the home turf of Sen. Hillary Rodham Clinton and ex-Mayor Rudy Giuliani, potential rivals in the 2008 presidential race, Arizona Republican Sen. John McCain told a Jewish audience that Israel and the world are threatened by a "possibly deranged and surely dangerous regime" in Iran.

As the world's "chief state sponsor of international terrorism," Iran defines itself by its hostility to the Jewish state and its chief ally, the United States, McCain said in a speech prepared for a Hanukkah dinner at Yeshiva University on Sunday.

He noted that Iranian President Mahmoud Ahmadinejad has called the Holocaust a "myth," urged that Israel be "wiped off the map" and defied international demands and incentives to end a drive to gain nuclear weapons capability.

"It is simply tragic that millennia of proud Persian history have culminated in a government that today cannot be counted among the world's most civilized nations," McCain said.

The former Vietnam prisoner of war, who tried and failed to gain the GOP presidential nomination in 1998, is considered the probable front-runner for his party's nomination in two years. His stiffest challenge could come first from Giuliani in a Republican primary, while Clinton has unofficially made clear her interest in leading the Democratic ticket.

Ahmadinejad has denied that Iran seeks to build weapons, saying its nuclear program is for peaceful purposes and the country will not give up its right under the Nuclear Nonproliferation Treaty to enrich uranium and produce nuclear fuel. The United States and many European nations believe Iran's enrichment process is aimed at producing weapons.

McCain said Tehran's pursuit of nuclear weapons posed "an unacceptable risk" in that it would increase the threat of Iran-sponsored terrorist activities, render the nonproliferation treaty obsolete and cause non-nuclear nations such as Egypt, Turkey and Saudi Arabia to "reassess" their own nuclear potential.

Iran, McCain said, "must understand that it cannot win a showdown with the world."

He said the U.N. Security Council must act immediately to impose multilateral political and economic sanctions on Iran while every other option, including military, is preserved.

"We have a long way to go diplomatically before we need to contemplate other measures, but it is a simple observation of reality that there is only one thing worse than a military solution, and that is a nuclear-armed Iran," McCain said.

In Vienna, U.S. government officials said on Sunday that Washington, D.C., and its closest Western allies, Britain and France, may soon ask the U.N. Security Council to vote on sanctions against Iran, even though China and Russia might veto the measure or abstain.

McCain, who has urged President Bush to increase rather than reduce the size of American forces in Iraq, said that despite the "many serious mistakes we have made" and the ongoing violence there, the United States cannot simply "wash our hands of a messy situation."

Because Iraqi security forces are not capable of operating on their own, he said, a "precipitous" pullout of U.S. forces would "risk all-out civil war and the emergence of a failed state in the heart of the Middle East."

2008 Hopefuls Woo Bush Clan Donors, Aides (LAT)

By Peter Wallsten

The Los Angeles Times, December 11, 2006

WASHINGTON — With the Bushes preparing to stand down from a quarter century in top elected offices, a frenzied competition has erupted in the Republican Party over who will inherit a fundraising and vote-getting machine built by the family over the years into one of the most valuable assets in modern politics.

At stake is access to an elaborate national network of corporate givers, campaign strategists and grass-roots volunteers who have repeatedly propelled the Bushes to victory — a network that could now give a new contender the inside track to winning the GOP's 2008 presidential nomination.

The leading potential heirs to that political fortune so far are Sen. John McCain (R-Ariz.), a onetime rival to the current President Bush and presumed front-runner for the nomination, and, a bit surprisingly, Massachusetts Gov. Mitt Romney, who has emerged as a top-tier contender by wooing social conservatives considered crucial in the early primary contests.

DOJ_NMG_0104277

Adding to the drama, a sibling divide appears to be emerging among aides closest to President Bush and his brother, outgoing Florida Gov. Jeb Bush. Some key members of Gov. Bush's tight-knit inner circle have signed up to help Romney, while several of President Bush's senior strategists have gone to McCain. They include the media advisor and political director for the president's 2004 campaign.

The fight for the Bush family mantle demonstrates that, even after the plunge in the president's popularity and the GOP's thumping in the midterm election, the family network remains the single most powerful force in Republican Party politics.

It is a machine born four decades ago, when Barbara and George H.W. Bush moved to Texas and began to build a political life — meticulously filling index cards with names of possible supporters and dutifully sending out Christmas greetings each year. Far from that simple, mid-20th century approach, today's GOP relies on a broad database of backers across the country whose relationships have been nurtured by generations of Bushes.

From the family's West Texas oil fortunes and Wall Street connections half a century ago, the network has grown to include the big-money fundraisers, dubbed "pioneers" and "rangers," who helped George W. Bush raise more than $500 million for his two presidential campaigns.

It also includes Bush family loyalists such as Karl Rove, who have, over the last six years, presided over the GOP's creation of the most exhaustive voter-targeting operation available, an infrastructure that relies on databases of voter names and the enthusiasm of ground-level workers and volunteers.

"The Bush name is the gold standard in Republican primaries," said Mark McKinnon, former media advisor to President Bush, who is now working with McCain. Hiring staffers viewed as close to the family, he said, "helps confer some credibility and experience or acceptability."

While the 2008 hopefuls are vying for the Bush family's fundraising and field organizing network, a more complex question is whether they want to be seen as inheriting the Bush political ideology. Widely criticized for starting the Iraq war and running large budget deficits, President Bush's brand of conservatism is in disfavor.

Jeb Bush, on the other hand, is adored by religious conservatives for his role in the Terri Schiavo right-to-die case and for his support for school choice in Florida. He is praised by economic conservatives for cutting millions in taxes and backing efforts to privatize some government services. While the president's approval ratings hover in the 30s or low 40s, Florida polls show that Gov. Bush's ratings are into the 60s, and several party strategists have put Jeb Bush's name forward as a potential nominee for vice president in 2008.

Officially, both Jeb and George W. Bush are neutral in the presidential race. As the leader of his political party, the president traditionally sits out the primary contests. Gov. Bush so far is following suit — though he has told former aides that he and Romney are similar in ideology and governing style.

Rove, President Bush's senior political advisor, also has not taken sides in the 2008 race, though he may be eager to get involved in order to show that the GOP defeats this year do not signal the end of his vision of long-term Republican dominance.

The overt indicators of jockeying for the Bush political assets have come in a series of announcements from the McCain and Romney camps, boasting of support from national- and state-level supporters with a variety of Bush family ties.

Other signs have been more subtle. A ceremony last week in the Florida State House, honoring Jeb Bush's service as governor, included a 15-minute presentation featuring images of the governor with Romney and another potential 2008 contender, former New York Mayor Rudolph W. Giuliani. One photo depicted Romney and Jeb Bush with broad grins, standing together in Romney's Boston office.

But the presentation was most notable for what it lacked: There was no photo of Jeb Bush with McCain. The absence of a McCain photo seemed to carry meaning. The presentation, with its implied signal of Jeb Bush's preferences among the GOP presidential field, was played last week for the governor's staffers and state lawmakers, many of whom are being courted by the 2008 contenders.

The presentation was produced by one of the governor's longtime advisors, Sally Bradshaw, who is now a Romney strategist. Bradshaw is so close to Jeb Bush that it is unlikely she would work for any of the 2008 candidates without his blessing. In an interview, Bradshaw said that Jeb Bush only "encouraged me" to meet with Romney, insisting that the Florida governor is not trying to indicate a favorite in the race.

Besides Bradshaw, Romney has enlisted Ann Herberger, the keeper of Jeb Bush's fundraising Rolodex. Also with Romney are Bush's lieutenant governor, Toni Jennings, and the man Bush once hand-picked to lead the state GOP, Miami lawyer Al Cardenas. Romney's decision to focus so heavily on Jeb Bush's team points to a key factor in explaining how the Massachusetts governor has emerged as a leading GOP contender, despite having run for office in the past as a moderate in a liberal state.

Romney has presented himself as the strongest conservative in the race and the most viable alternative to McCain, who is distrusted by many conservative voters for his breaks from the party line and past opposition to Bush. By aligning with Jeb Bush, Romney is associating himself with a popular brand of conservatism.

Romney aides insist that they have drawn support from both the Jeb and George sides of the Bush family, signing on two former White House economists as domestic policy advisors and a former speechwriter for President Bush as an outside advisor. McCain has sought to broaden his reach into the extended Bush family, as well, and his aides dismiss the idea of a sibling divide in advance of the 2008 race. He recently enlisted support from Florida businessman Phil Handy, a close Jeb Bush friend, and has secured help from Robert Mosbacher, a longtime friend of George H. W. Bush and chief fundraiser in his successful 1988 campaign for president. Mosbacher is the honorary Texas chairman of McCain's presidential exploratory committee.

One could read that as a sign that the first President Bush supports McCain, said John Weaver, a top McCain advisor. "But I'm not doing that," he quickly added. The Bush family has dominated Republican politics for so many years that it is often hard to tell where the family ties end and the party machinery begins. Some strategists argue that the "Bush family primary" is merely a reflection of the family's broad reach in party politics, and that any competent strategist has at one time or another worked for a Bush.

"It's difficult to conceive a candidate with a winning team that's not integrated by a significant number of Bush family loyalists," Cardenas said.

Some of the most prominent Bush-aligned campaign aides may sit out the 2008 race.

Outgoing Republican National Committee chairman Ken Mehlman is said to be pursuing more lucrative corporate jobs. Another top advisor to President Bush, lobbyist and former Republican National Committee Chairman Ed Gillespie, has already decided to focus more locally. He is preparing to become chairman of the Virginia GOP and, associates say, plot his own possible Senate bid in that state.

To associates of both Jeb and George W. Bush, Romney's success in moving into their network has been a surprise.

One former campaign staff member to President Bush said that Romney has been the buzz of the elaborate network of Bush helpers who are being rewarded with White House receptions and other get-togethers during the holiday season.

"It seems like about 50-50," said the former staffer, referring to the split among these Bush supporters between McCain and Romney.

This is no surprise to anyone who has been on the receiving end of Romney's entreaties.

Earlier this month, after a meeting of GOP governors in Orlando, Fla., Romney traveled north to Panama City in Florida's panhandle for a meeting with local businessman Allan G. Bense, who recently ended a two-year tenure as speaker of the state House.

Bense, a Jeb Bush ally, is no stranger to high-level courtship, having rejected personal appeals by Rove and Gov. Bush to run for the Senate this year in place of the controversial Rep. Katherine Harris (R-Fla.).

But when Romney made the effort to come to his house, Bense said he could not say no.

"He had called and called back and called back, and finally he came to the house," Bense said. "I have all the respect in the world for Sen. McCain, who is a hero. But it's just that Gov. Romney pushed and worked. And like in sales, he asked me for my business. And the product he was selling was one that I liked."

Why It's Dangerous For The Maverick To Be The...Front Runner (TIME)

By Karen Tumulty

Time, December 11, 2006

As a rallying cry. "Common sense conservatism" doesn't have quiteÂ the ring of "Straight Talk Express." But the new slogan on the website of John McCain's presidential exploratory committee--a slogan he manages to repeat at least three times in every speech he gives these days--tells you all you need to know about how different this presidential campaign will be from his last one. McCain '08 will be a bigger, more conventional operation--a tank, not a slingshot. The prevailing wisdom about McCain used to be that his bipartisan appeal would make him a sure bet in a presidential race--if only he could get past the Republican primary. But as more and more of the party establishment climb aboard a campaign that McCain has not yet even formally launched, it's starting to look as if the opposite may be true. By trying to become the perfect candidate for the primaries, McCain could be creating difficulties for himself in a general election.

His hard-line position on Iraq is a perfect case in point. McCain has continued to press for more troops there, and spent last week dismissing the Iraq Study Group recommendation to bring them home as nothing short of a recipe for defeat. That's the kind of strong, consistent hawkishness that G.O.P. primary voters look for. "Besides," says McCain strategist Mark Salter, "it's what he believes." The problem is that exit polls in last month's election said only 17% of voters overall share that view, which could leave the other 83% wondering whether McCain's famous independent streak, so appealing on most issues, would be such a good thing to have in a Commander in Chief who has the power to take the country to war. Already there are signs that his image is taking a hit. In the CBS/New York Times poll, McCain's favorability rating slid 6 points, to 28%, between January and September.

McCain insists that he has always been more conservative than many of his fans believe him to be. But the most important perception people have about McCain is not about ideology; it's about integrity. After staking his reputation on the moral high ground by speaking truth to power on issues ranging from deficits to torture, McCain is uniquely vulnerable to anything that hints of hypocrisy--even on questions that ordinary politicians would get a pass on. To have a shot at winning a presidential election these days, for instance, it is nearly a requirement that candidates opt out of the federal finance system, forgoing its matching funds because it's too difficult to mount a credible campaign within the law's spending caps. But that move, however pragmatic, would look bad coming from an author of the McCain-Feingold campaign-finance-reform law.

Also, it's harder for McCain than most to explain away inconsistencies. How, for example, could a deficit hawk vote to make President Bush's tax credits permanent after opposing their passage in the first place as fiscally irresponsible? Or why, after declaring Jerry Falwell to be an agent of intolerance during the brutal 2000 primary campaign, did McCain deliver the commencement speech last May at Falwell's Liberty University in Virginia?

Such overtures might make inroads in a skeptical Republican base, but these shifts make some of his longtime allies worry. "A profile in courage can become a profile in unrestrained ambition," says former Reagan White House chief of staff Ken Duberstein, who was one of the few G.O.P. establishment figures to support McCain's 2000 presidential campaign. "He has to remember who his friends are and not spend his integrity on one-night stands with those who will never fully trust him."

Critics pounced last week when McCain let it be known that he has lined up a top G.O.P. operative to run his campaign--Terry Nelson, who was national political director for President Bush's 2004 campaign. "Terry's a great get," says Salter. "He's a good, savvy, very disciplined, smart guy with a lot of experience." Nelson is yet another recruit from the once antagonistic Bush operation, and more evidence that the party establishment is falling into place behind McCain. But Nelson is known for hardball tactics that don't exactly square with the Arizona Senator's white-knight image.

Most recently, Nelson oversaw the Republican National Committee's independent expenditure operation, which produced the most notorious ad of the 2006 campaign. In it, a bare-shouldered white actress claimed that she had met the black Senate candidate Harold Ford at a Playboy party. The ad ended with the blond cooing, "Harold, call me." The resulting protest by black leaders and union groups was enough to force Wal-Mart to sever its ties with Nelson, who had been a consultant for the company's campaign to improve its image. Ford lost the election.

McCain strategists say they will all be taking their lead from the candidate, not the other way around. "Any campaign has to be a reflection of who the candidate is," Nelson says. In 2000, McCain ran his insurgent operation out of a dilapidated headquarters just outside D.C. that had previously been occupied by homeless people. Now, as the front runner, he faces a different set of expectations. Nearly from Day One, he will have to have full-fledged operations up and running in 15 or 20 states. Last time around he could skip Iowa to focus on staging an upset in New Hampshire, but this time McCain will have to compete--and avoid losing his balance--on every battleground. Says an aide: "We will go wherever one vote is available."

While the Republican Party has a history of anointing its candidates early, this rarely happens without a fight. "It's easy to throw the bombs," says G.O.P. pollster Tony Fabrizio. "It's tough to be the front runner every day." For McCain, the biggest potential threats at the moment appear to be Massachusetts Governor Mitt Romney, who is getting good buzz on the right but is largely unknown even to Republicans, and former New York City Mayor Rudy Giuliani, who comes out ahead of McCain in many polls but has yet to begin building much of a campaign operation.

McCain's forces say they are preparing for all challengers. But what will it cost him? That's a question that McCain himself has struggled with. There was a time just a few years back when he would tell people he didn't think he wanted to run for President again. Not because he was getting too old. And not because he didn't think he could win. McCain thought it just couldn't possibly be as much fun as it was the first time around. He would say wistfully, "You can't bottle lightning." But while he may be in a better position to win now, he'll still need some of that old electrical charge to do it.

Exploratory Committees Build Buzz (WP)

By Zachary A. Goldfarb

The Washington Post, December 11, 2006

It is the season of exploration.

Everywhere you look, prospective 2008 presidential candidates are forming exploratory committees. Three leading Republicans and one prominent Democrat who have long been pursuing the presidency announced such committees in recent days, saying they are not ready to announce a real presidential committee, and so are taking an intermediate step to raise money and put together a campaign operation just in case they decide to run.

What's the deal?

According to the Federal Election Commission (FEC), there is no difference between an exploratory committee and a presidential campaign committee. The ideas behind creating an exploratory committee, strategists and experts say, are to create buzz -- and to do what everybody expects you to do.

"You get two press releases, one when you form the exploratory committee, and one when you say you're actually running," said Kenneth A. Gross, a lawyer specializing in politics and elections.

Dorothy James, a Connecticut College government professor who specializes in presidential elections, said creating an exploratory committee has become a routine campaign ploy. "A lot of people have to do it because it's done," she said. "There's no proof that bumper stickers and posters turn out more voters. But if everybody does it, then you do it."

Massachusetts Sen. John F. Kerry, the 2004 Democratic nominee, and then-Gov. George W. Bush of Texas in 2000 created exploratory committees before announcing their candidacies. But the number of candidates creating such committees at this point in the election cycle, a month after the midterm elections, is unusual.

Scott Reed, who managed Robert J. Dole's 1996 presidential candidacy, said, "It appears the entire timetable has moved up two to three months as these candidates struggle to get out there and define their piece of the pie." Reed said it does not make sense for candidates to declare officially this early. "It's too soon for the voters to take seriously a formal announcement before the end of the year. Everyone is still dealing with 2006 fatigue."

Already, Sens. John McCain (R-Ariz.), Sam Brownback (R-Kan.) and Evan Bayh (D-Ind.) have registered exploratory committees with the FEC. Former New York mayor Rudolph W. Giuliani (R) has created a "testing the waters" committee in his home state that allows him to raise money but not disclose contributors unless he formally declares. Other prominent candidates are expected to create exploratory committees in coming weeks.

Last week, New Mexico Gov. Bill Richardson (D), apparently trying to get three bites out of the apple, announced that he would announce next month whether he would form an exploratory committee.

Outgoing Gov. Tom Vilsack (D-Iowa), meanwhile, bypassed the exploratory stage, a move that departing Gov. Mitt Romney (R-Mass.) is reportedly considering. "There is no reason to be coy or cute with the interim step," said Jeff Link, Vilsack's spokesman. "I don't know the advantage unless you want to appear to be courted in some way by people."

DOJ_NMG_0104281

Candidates who form exploratory committees often say it is the next reasonable thing they can do to prepare for a White House bid without officially getting into the race. They say they need to talk it over with their families and assess their odds, though in many cases they have been evaluating a race for months or years.

Bayh, for example, had made almost 20 trips to early-primary states when he announced on ABC's "This Week" that he would form an exploratory committee. But Bayh suggested to host George Stephanopoulos that he still had serious thinking to do.

"I will be forming an exploratory committee to take the next practical step," Bayh said in a deadly serious tone. "I'll make a final decision over the holidays with my family and have some final decision to announce early next year."

Dan Pfeiffer, Bayh's spokesman, said it was important to get certain processes underway even before the senator made a final decision. "In a primary this competitive and compact, there is no excuse for doing things next year that you could have done this year."

According to FEC Chairman Michael E. Toner, the exploratory committees are in fact plain old committees used to raise money and run campaigns in presidential primaries. The only change, once a candidate decides to run, is the name of the committee. "If they file with the FEC, it's a full-blown primary campaign," Toner said.

Giving California A Voice In Presidential Contests (LAT)

The Los Angeles Times, December 11, 2006

Sacramento — What's sure to be a hot presidential contest is warming up and once again California is likely to be a mere spectator in a lousy seat.

Starting to get excited about watching Sen. Hillary Rodham Clinton of New York and Sen. Barack Obama of Illinois compete here, then helping to select one as the Democratic nominee? Not a chance.

Intrigued about weighing in on Arizona Sen. John McCain versus former New York Mayor Rudolph W. Giuliani for the Republican nomination? Sorry, you can only root from the bleachers.

California's 2008 presidential primary won't be held until June, long after the nominations already have been locked up. Our votes will be meaningless.

Maybe it's time for California to become an early caucus state, voicing its candidate preferences and choosing national convention delegates through community meetings of party activists and interested citizens, as Iowans long have done to great ballyhoo. But more about that later.

First, the horrid, humbling background:

California experimented with "early" primaries for three presidential elections, beginning in 1996. The goal was to exert our rightful clout in the nominating process and force candidates to pay attention to our special issues: water, environment, illegal immigration, getting shortchanged by the feds…. After all, we are the most populous state.

It flopped. New Hampshire, Iowa and other pampered pipsqueaks leapfrogged ahead of us. Our votes still didn't matter.

Moreover, California moved not only its presidential primary, but also its regular state primary up to March. Very bad idea. That added three months to the campaign season for state candidates, taxing donors' pocketbooks and voters' attention spans.

So the Legislature and Gov. Arnold Schwarzenegger did the right thing. They gave up and moved the joint primary back to June, where it had resided for 52 years.

But now we're really going to be ignored by the presidential candidates — all of us, that is, except for the richest folks. California is the nation's biggest ATM for candidates, who slip in to pick up money and then quickly leave to spend it in other states.

In 2004, says California Democratic Chairman Art Torres, "$184 million left the state for presidential and other campaigns and none of it came back."

One obvious remedy for the voters' irrelevance is being mulled in the Capitol, talked up especially by Assembly Speaker Fabian Nuñez (D-Los Angeles): Split the primaries. Move up the presidential primary again, to perhaps February, but leave the state contests in June.

DOJ_NMG_0104282

Nuñez has a personal motivation. He'd like an early 2008 election of some kind to place before voters a proposed change in legislative term limits — not adding more total years, but allowing all of them to be spent in one house. Unless that's done, Nuñez won't be able to run for reelection in 2008, because he'll be termed out.

The term limits proposal would be packaged with redistricting reform — the Legislature surrendering the power to draw its own districts.

Both reforms — term limits and redistricting — are badly needed. But the public just might regard this whole political maneuver as too convoluted, cynical and self-serving.

There's an even bigger hurdle for primary-splitters: cost. The state would be out $50 million to hold a separate presidential primary. Fiscal conservatives undoubtedly would balk.

So a separate, early presidential primary may be beyond California's grasp. If it is, here's a bold alternative: a caucus system. Most caucus states are peewees, but let's not be haughty. What we're doing now isn't working.

Caucuses work for Iowa, which is smothered in candidate attention. Nevada also now has stepped into the limelight by moving its Democratic caucuses to Jan. 19, four days after Iowa. Then come the trumpeted New Hampshire and South Carolina primaries, both in January.

California could hold caucuses in early February and produce a political earthquake.

And there'd be one huge advantage for state taxpayers: They wouldn't have to foot the bill. The political parties would be stuck.

"A lot of us have toyed with the caucus idea," Torres says, "but then we looked at the numbers and almost got heart attacks."

Collect it from the big donors who feed the ATM.

Republican state Chairman Duf Sundheim has a more common reason for opposing caucuses: "It's best when people vote. It puts the emphasis on what people want rather than political organizations."

But pollster Mark Baldassare of the Public Policy Institute of California notes: "Primary elections are on life support. In concept, people like having a direct say. But in reality, we're seeing lower and lower turnouts in primary elections."

Baldassare thinks "many people could be convinced" that caucuses are worth trying.

Caucuses — held in school auditoriums, lodge halls, even living rooms — create a sense of community. They inspire democratic participation and open up the process of political activism.

"There's more reliance on the grass roots and less on advertising, which is a good thing for the democratic system," says Matthew Dowd, a caucus advocate who was Schwarzenegger's main reelection strategist and also a top advisor to President Bush in 2004.

Which candidates would benefit from caucuses? "Candidates who can motivate people," Dowd says. "Candidates who come less manufactured, who are more real."

Candidates like Obama. Like McCain.

Veteran Democratic consultant Bill Carrick also says he'd prefer early caucuses to no state influence at all.

But would many Californians get off their couches and venture out on a winter night to spend three hours deliberating politics and choosing up sides? "No question about it," Carrick says. "It would be exciting, a big deal."

A lot more exciting than watching TV reports of coddled New Hampshire voters flexing their muscles. More meaningful than casting a vote that no candidate really cares about.

Jefferson Win Poses Dilemma For Party (WP)

By Peter Whoriskey

The Washington Post, December 10, 2006

NEW ORLEANS, Dec. 10 -- Rep. William J. Jefferson may be a pariah in some Washington political circles, but voters in this storm-battered city weighed in over the weekend with their own verdict regarding their scandal-plagued congressman: He's still our guy.

Voters gave the Louisiana Democrat an emphatic reelection victory over state Rep. Karen Carter, even though his campaign had been weighted with revelations that federal authorities had videotaped him taking $100,000 in alleged bribe money, and that $90,000 of it had been found inside a freezer in his apartment in the District. The investigation led his House colleagues to dump him from a key committee, donors abandoned him and the state Democratic Party switched its allegiance to his opponent.

But before cheering supporters at a hotel room on election night, Jefferson called his win "a great moment" and said, "I thank almighty God for making it possible."

He declined to discuss the probe.

Divinely inspired or not, his victory now poses a quandary for Democrats, some of whom have shunned him politically, and possibly also for the city, as leaders here seek to project an image of civic probity as they lobby for more federal money for recovery from Hurricane Katrina.

"This has to be seen as troubling," said Brian Brox, a political science professor at Tulane University. "I don't think his victory does any good for New Orleans as it presses its claims on the national government."

The federal corruption investigation, now 21 months old, was front and center in the campaign.

Carter pushed the corruption issue in television ads, saying that the cloud of suspicion alone would make him an ineffective representative, and Jefferson responded with some of his own ads in which he attacked Carter and looked evenly into the camera to tell voters: "I have never taken a bribe from anyone."

But while the allegations were widely discussed here, exactly what people made of them seems to have depended at least partly on race.

Though both candidates in the runoff are African American, voters generally split along racial lines.

Jefferson won 57 percent of the vote to Carter's 43 percent. He won 79 percent of votes in largely black precincts, while she won 76 percent of votes in largely white precincts, according to a post-election analysis by Greg Rigamer, a consultant for the Carter campaign.

For some of Jefferson's core black constituency, "they've heard the news" about the allegations. "They just don't believe it," Brox said.

Moreover, while Jefferson lost some key Democratic endorsements, he did pick up those of two others who are particularly influential in the black community, Mayor C. Ray Nagin and Bishop Paul Morton, often named as the city's most influential black minister. Jefferson appears to have won votes by attacking Carter for supporting same-sex marriage.

In conversations with voters here on Sunday, the racial divide was apparent. "I just wish we could one day elect someone who wouldn't look ridiculous to the rest of the country," said Betty Holahan-Smith, 45, a white voter from the Lower Garden District. "First, we had 'Chocolate City' Nagin. Now we have 'Dollar Bill' Jefferson."

"If the federal government really wanted to help New Orleans, they would have indicted him and taken him out of the game," said Tom Gault, 50, who is white and a Democrat, outside his townhouse in the Garden District. "It amazes me that people would vote for someone who may be indicted soon."

But after Sunday services at the First Pilgrim Baptist Church in the Bywater neighborhood, a group of three friends, all African American, concurred in their support for Jefferson and dismissed the allegations as unproved. Though two of Jefferson's associates -- a business partner and a former staff member -- have pleaded guilty in the bribery scheme, they cautioned against a rush to judgment.

"I just kind of felt if they had something on him why haven't they indicted him?" said Tyra Bryant, 34, of Jefferson Parish. "I'm not even sure it's really true."

"He hasn't done anything the rest of the folks up in Washington haven't done -- he just got caught," said Sharon Williams of Mid-City.

She said Carter seems to have forgotten who she is, Williams said.

"Sometimes when you are an African American and you get too high on yourself, well, Karen Carter thought she was a Caucasian," she said. "You have to always remember where you came from."

While the racial divide formed the basic demographic framework of the election, however, what played a critical role in the outcome was Jefferson's curious ability to appeal to white voters in suburban Jefferson Parish. A campaign led there by Sheriff

Harry Lee blasted Carter for appearing in Spike Lee's Katrina documentary, in which she criticized the parish's law enforcement for turning back fleeing residents.

In a concession speech on Saturday night, Carter pledged to work with Jefferson, especially on post-Katrina rebuilding.

"I guess the people are happy with the status quo," she said.

Scandal-Tainted Rep. Jefferson Wins Congressional Runoff In Louisiana (WSJ)

By Erika Lovley

The Wall Street Journal, December 11, 2006

Despite an continuing federal probe that turned up $90,000 in cash in his freezer last year, embattled Democratic Rep. William J. Jefferson was re-elected Saturday in Louisiana's 2nd District.

The victory leaves the state frozen in the scandal, which could cramp the flow of rebuilding funds from Washington, experts warn. The Big Easy has had a long history of political corruption. Former state governor Edwin Edwards was sentenced to 10 years in prison in 2001 on charges of racketeering.

Jefferson supporters contended that the Big Easy would suffer if it lost his 16 years of seniority in Congress and pointed out that the congressman has yet to be charged, despite more than a year of investigation.

Mr. Jefferson won the support of 57% of the electorate, while the runner-up, State Rep. Karen Carter, received 43% of the vote. Ms. Carter struggled to take advantage of her opponent's legal woes, despite guilty pleas from both a Kentucky businessman and a former Jefferson aide for various bribery charges.

No charges have been brought against Mr. Jefferson, but he is already being punished in Washington. Nancy Pelosi, now the incoming House speaker, voted with Democrats last June to unseat the congressman from the powerful House Ways and Means Committee. In another upset, the state Democratic Party chose to bypass the incumbent and endorse the 37-year-old Ms. Carter several weeks before the primary.

The House Democratic leadership isn't expected to make a final decision on any committee assignment for Mr. Jefferson until this week. Ms. Pelosi's office had no comment Sunday but she is expected to use this week to consult with the Congressional Black Caucus on the matter.

Mr. Jefferson, 59, is the state's first African-American congressman since Reconstruction and is in his eighth term.

The white community largely supported Ms. Carter as the face of change, while Mr. Jefferson retained his longtime supporters -- the black majority. Although Ms. Carter raised almost five times more cash during the campaign, Mr. Jefferson secured more prominent endorsements; among his supporters: Mayor Ray Nagin and several other black politicians.

Much of Mr. Jefferson's campaign focused on painting his opponent as corrupt, claiming that Ms. Carter has not accurately reported earnings from her bond work as a private attorney. She has not been under any type of investigation.

New Orleans Voters Support Their Man Over F.B.I. (NYT)

By Adam Nossiter

The New York Times, December 11, 2006

NEW ORLEANS, Dec. 10 — Outside the Greater St. Stephen Full Gospel Baptist Church, there was no surprise on Sunday at the re-election of Representative William J. Jefferson, only satisfaction.

The late-night comedians could joke all they wanted about the $90,000 that the Federal Bureau of Investigation said it found in Mr. Jefferson's freezer and that the agency said was bribe money. White New Orleans could tut-tut at the seamy portrait outlined by the F.B.I. in its investigation of him, and at the guilty pleas of two associates of Mr. Jefferson, who is a black Democrat.

Supporters in the broken-down, crime-plagued Central City neighborhood here saw another picture: of a godly man persecuted by a racially biased government.

"There's been no indictment; how can you say he's guilty?" asked Brenda Dumas, clutching her Bible.

"Some call him a crook," Ms. Dumas added. They say he's corrupt. They have to prove that. To give up on somebody after all he's done for us, that would be wrong."

To the crowd streaming from Sunday services, the months of harsh headlines proved only Mr. Jefferson's sanctity. His dignified mien, his church-going habits and omnipresent family entourage set the seal.

DOJ_NMG_0104285

"I wouldn't have voted for anybody else," Johnnie Mae Patterson said. "He's a God-sent man."

Mr. Jefferson crushed his opponent, State Representative Karen R. Carter, also a Democrat, in a runoff election on Saturday, gaining 57 percent of the vote. How he did so may speak to strikingly different views of government here.

"The background to this is the cultural divide between blacks and whites, and their different attitude to law enforcement," said Susan E. Howell, a political scientist at the University of New Orleans.

In the eyes of some, those differences have been accentuated by the legacy of Hurricane Katrina, and Washington's failure to get New Orleans back on its feet. Mr. Jefferson is not blamed for the ruined black neighborhoods, but the United States government — his prosecutor — is.

Though Jefferson Parish voted overwhelmingly for him, the contest was decided in New Orleans, where the racial divide was stark. His opponent, Ms. Carter, won about 90 percent of the white vote; Mr. Jefferson won about 80 percent of the black vote. Mr. Jefferson played up this difference in support, suggesting that Ms. Carter, who is also black, was the preferred candidate of well-to-do white Republicans.

His constituents "wanted to believe him, they wanted to believe the big bad guys in Washington were picking on him," said Cynthia Hedge-Morrell, a black member of the City Council who supported Ms. Carter. "There's such a distrust toward Washington now, after Katrina."

Mr. Jefferson also appeared to have benefited from adroit maneuvering by one of his former political rivals, State Senator Derrick Shepherd, who is from Jefferson Parish and trailed in the primary, but later endorsed the congressman. Mr. Shepherd has not hidden his hope to wind up in Washington someday — perhaps a likelier prospect under a Jefferson re-election, given the congressman's legal problems.

"I endorsed Congressman Jefferson for a totality of reasons," Mr. Shepherd said, adding: "Of course, my desire to be a congressperson was one factor."

Ethics and lawfulness was the mantle assumed by Ms. Carter in the race, but it appeared to have wound up working for Mr. Jefferson instead.

"I voted for him," P. V. Weber said as he arrived at church on Sunday. "I didn't like the fact that they were trying all that to destroy his character."

Runoff In Tex. 23rd May Show Impact Of 2006 Redistricting (WP)

By Sylvia Moreno

The Washington Post, December 11, 2006

SAN ANTONIO, Dec. 10 -- Almost everywhere nationwide, the midterm elections are but a distant memory, supplanted by Christmas shopping and holiday parties. But here, candidates are still battling to determine the makeup of the House and the fate of Texas's first Hispanic Republican elected to Congress.

The election for the state's 23rd Congressional District -- the largest in the country, with 52,621 square miles and 20 counties -- is what GOP and Democratic strategists are calling a "tossup" under new boundaries ordered this summer by the U.S. Supreme Court. Republican incumbent Henry Bonilla, seeking an eighth term, and Democrat Ciro Rodriguez, a former congressman, are in a runoff set for Tuesday.

The short campaign began with Rodriguez, 60, challenging Bonilla, 52, to defend his support of Bush administration policies and the war in Iraq mano a mano. Both agreed to two debates sponsored by civic groups, but Rodriguez canceled, citing scheduling conflicts. Rodriguez then challenged Bonilla to a bilingual debate, in Spanish and English. Bonilla didn't bite, later calling the request "a stunt."

Instead, the candidates have attacked each other's patriotism and posture on terrorism in television ads, news conferences and "robo-calls."

Rodriguez accused Bonilla of voting to cut veterans' benefits and to deny health-care coverage for National Guardsmen returning from Iraq. Bonilla countered by saying that Rodriguez showed "dangerous judgment" in Congress by opposing a law that allowed secret evidence to be used in immigration proceedings against suspected terrorists and by accepting a $250 contribution from a man later convicted of conducting illegal business transactions with Libya. The donation was made in 1998, years before the man was convicted, Rodriguez said.

The Supreme Court ordered the boundaries of the 23rd District redrawn after determining that the old map -- created under a 2003 redistricting by the Texas Legislature but orchestrated by then-House majority leader Tom DeLay (R-Tex.) -- discriminated against Latino voters and did not comply with the Voting Rights Act. The new district is now more Hispanic (61 percent as opposed to about 50) and less Republican (54 percent instead of 62).

Because the new map was not finalized until August, five months after the state's primary election, a special election was held Nov. 7. State election law required a runoff if no candidate broke 50 percent. Bonilla won 48.6 percent of the vote; Rodriguez led a field of six Democrats with 19.9 percent.

Buoyed by the Democrats' midterm election wins and banking on the 23rd District's new demographics and Bonilla's weakness among Hispanics -- he won only 8 percent of the Hispanic vote in 2002 before the 2003 redistricting replaced 100,000 Hispanics with white voters -- national Democrats have infused the race with staff support and media buys. Former president Bill Clinton campaigned for Rodriguez on Sunday in San Antonio while Sen. John Cornyn (R-Tex.) stumped with Bonilla in nearby Hondo.

Since Nov. 7, the Democratic Congressional Campaign Committee has spent almost $900,000, more than two-thirds of it toward television and direct-mail advertising, for the cash-strapped Rodriguez campaign to counter Bonilla's runoff war chest of $1.6 million.

"We're committed to seeing Ciro cross the finish line to victory," said Adrienne Elrod, a spokeswoman for the DCCC. "This is a very competitive race."

State Democrats are running an aggressive Spanish-language media campaign and have raised more than $100,000 to beef up voter-turnout efforts.

"Let's give the GOP one more surprise by taking out another Tom DeLay Republican," wrote Texas Democratic Chairman Boyd L. Richie in a letter to party activists.

Bonilla said he is not concerned. He emphasizes he has run and won previously in 19 of the 20 counties that comprise the new district and that much of the area, which stretches from San Antonio 700 miles west to El Paso County, is largely conservative. Bonilla was endorsed by the San Antonio Express-News, which cited his seniority and his seat on the House Appropriations Committee.

Bonilla has focused his campaign on friendly audiences, such as at a recent high school football playoff game in San Antonio's Alamodome. The team from Hondo, a Bonilla stronghold in Republican-leaning Medina County, played and won, and Bonilla took advantage of halftime to work some of the crowd, hot dog and soda in hand. "Runoffs are all about getting your people out one more time. It's not a time to convert voters," Bonilla said.

The Supreme Court added to the district the heavily Democratic south side of San Antonio, which Rodriguez represented until he lost his seat after the 2003 redistricting. He has focused efforts on meeting voters in the sprawling district, espousing support for Democratic positions on raising the minimum wage, universal health care and a cheaper Medicare prescription plan.

"We saw in November that people have had enough, and Bonilla has been part of the leadership supporting the [Bush] administration on Iraq and other issues," Rodriguez said following a recent neighborhood forum in northwest San Antonio.

Runoff In Redrawn Texas District Could Be A Tight Race (LAT)

By Lianne Hart

The Los Angeles Times, December 11, 2006

HOUSTON — One of the nation's last unresolved House races will be decided Tuesday when seven-term Republican Rep. Henry Bonilla faces former congressman Ciro Rodriguez in an unusual runoff in a newly redrawn district.

In a special election Nov. 7, a well-financed Bonilla won 49% of the vote, just shy of the majority he needed to win outright.

Rodriguez, 59, who represented a neighboring district in the House from 1997 to 2005, finished second with about 20% of the vote.

DOJ_NMG_0104287

Bonilla, 52, was at one time strongly favored to win without a runoff. Though his conservative stands on issues such as immigration had eroded Latino support, a 2003 redistricting plan engineered by former House Majority Leader Tom DeLay minimized the problem by cutting the number of Latino precincts in Bonilla's district. In 2004, Bonilla won with 69% of the vote.

However, the U.S. Supreme Court ruled in June that the new district lines unconstitutionally diluted minority votes. A panel of three federal judges reconfigured the district in August.

In its current form, the 23rd congressional district — the largest in Texas — stretches from San Antonio to the Texas-Mexico border and out to far West Texas. Sixty-one percent of the district's voting-age population is Latino, compared with 51% in 2004.

Now that Democrats have taken over Congress, there's a new dynamic in play, said Andy Hernandez, a political scientist at the University of Texas at San Antonio.

"I think ordinary Democratic voters are hepped up and there's a growing energy to beat Bonilla and finish the job in Texas," Hernandez said. "I don't think his conservative Anglo base has enough enthusiasm to save him."

Larry Hufford, a political scientist at St. Mary's University in San Antonio, disagreed, saying voter turnout in runoff elections is notoriously low in the south Bexar County precincts that are Rodriguez's strength.

"If early voting and turnout in this election parallels past elections, Republicans will turn out in higher numbers and Bonilla should win," Hufford said.

The latest public poll shows Bonilla leading Rodriguez 53% to 46%, but the race could be much tighter, Hernandez said.

"If Henry Bonilla couldn't win outright in the special election with his money and name recognition, he's in deep trouble," Hernandez said.

Campaign finance reports show that as of Nov. 22, Bonilla, with $955,000, had almost 10 times the cash on hand as Rodriguez, with $94,000. But the Democratic Congressional Campaign Committee has reportedly spent about $871,000 on Rodriguez's behalf.

The candidates have spent much of the money on attack ads but, in a district largely bordered to the south by Mexico, have avoided the topic of immigration. Bonilla voted in favor of a 700-mile border fence; Rodriguez has said he would not have. The topic isn't listed as an issue on either candidate's campaign website.

"They're scared" to talk about it, Hufford said, perhaps because missteps could alienate one or more groups in a diverse district voting population: West Texas ranchers, Latinos in border towns, Republicans on the north side of San Antonio and Democrats in the south.

Chad Foster, president of the Texas Border Coalition, a group of border mayors and judges, said Bonilla's vote in favor of the fence angered many in the area. "I don't think the fence is realistic. It's an 18th century solution to a 21st century problem," said Foster, who also is mayor of the Texas border town Eagle Pass.

However, Bonilla spokesman Phil Ricks said border sheriffs believed the fence would curb drug smuggling and human trafficking. "People are in favor of the fence," he said.

Bonilla won the majority of the west Texas counties in his district during the special election.

Tuesday's runoff falls on a holy day for many Roman Catholic Latinos — the Feast of the Virgin of Guadalupe.

Latino groups protested when Texas Gov. Rick Perry set the date, saying it was an attempt to help Bonilla by suppressing the Latino vote. But after early voting was extended, the Justice Department approved the runoff date.

Negative Campaigning Marks Texas Runoff (AP)

By Elizabeth White

AP, December 10, 2006

It's been a month since control of Congress was decided, but Republican Rep. Henry Bonilla and Democrat Ciro Rodriguez are still campaigning as if the balance hangs on the outcome of their runoff.

For incumbent Bonilla, a victory at the polls Tuesday would give him an eighth term representing Texas' largest congressional district, the 23rd.

DOJ_NMG_0104288

For Rodriguez, it would mean a return trip to Washington after a two-year absence. He served in Congress during 1997-2005 but was ousted in the 2004 by Rep. Henry Cuellar.

Neither Bonilla nor Rodriguez received 50 percent of the vote in a crowded field Nov. 7.

Bonilla has been airing TV commercials criticizing Rodriguez for past votes, including one against establishing the Homeland Security Department. The Democratic Congressional Campaign Committee is airing ads for Rodriguez that attack Bonilla for what it says are cuts in veterans and military benefits.

Rodriguez resurrected reports that Bonilla employed an illegal immigrant British nanny for almost seven years, a small scandal that erupted in 1994. The Justice Department investigated but declined to charge anyone.

Rodriguez said he's relying on voters' dissatisfaction with Bonilla.

"They'll vote for you because they like you, but they'll also vote for you because they dislike the other guy," Rodriguez said. "You get them whichever way you can."

In a campaign this short, turnout from the base will be the key to a victory for either candidate, said Jason Casellas, assistant professor in government at the University of Texas at Austin.

"The people who are going to turn out in a special election are going to be the partisans," Casellas said.

A Rodriguez victory would be an additional blow to the Texas redistricting plan engineered by former House Majority Leader Tom DeLay in 2003, which allowed the GOP to pick up several congressional seats, said Gary Keith, a senior lecturer in government at UT Austin.

The DeLay plan moved 100,000 predominantly Democratic Laredo Hispanics out of the 23rd and into another district. However, the Supreme Court ruled in June that the new district unconstitutionally diluted Hispanic voting strength, and a new map was drawn in August by a three-judge panel.

Rodriguez lost to Cuellar in this year's District 28 primary. The redistricting put his San Antonio home in the redrawn District 23, allowing him to enter the race against Bonilla — with the endorsement of Cuellar.

The 23rd stretches along the Mexican border from San Antonio to the eastern edge of El Paso, yet immigration isn't listed on either of the Hispanic candidates' Web sites. Bonilla voted to build a border fence to fight illegal immigration; Rodriguez said he would not have.

"Because (immigration) is so divisive, which of the candidates could use the issue to really boost their turnout without really angering the opposition and boosting their turnout?" Keith said. "It may be an issue that's too radioactive. ... Because it could blow up on you as much as it could help you."

Clinton Makes S.A. Stop To Stir Rodriguez Crowd (SAEN)

By Greg Jefferson

San Antonio Express News, December 11, 2006

In a hot, crowded gymnasium Sunday, former President Clinton sought to wind up supporters of Democrat Ciro Rodriguez enough to unseat Rep. Henry Bonilla and strengthen the Democratic Party's hold on Congress.

Rodriguez's campaign stop at Palo Alto College came less than two days before the runoff in Congressional District 23 between the former congressman and the Republican incumbent.

"You couldn't have a clearer choice. You couldn't have a better candidate," Clinton told a throng of cheering supporters. "And you've got just about 48 hours to bring it home."

Democrats picked up 29 congressional seats this year, Clinton noted, but they also lost 10 races by slim margins.

"You have to decide whether this House seat is going to be with the 29 or the 10," Clinton said.

"On Nov. 7, voters across the country voted for change," Rodriguez said. "This Tuesday, voters across this district are going to vote one more time for change."

Clinton, meanwhile, laced his nearly 20-minute stump speech with shots at congressional Republican leadership and Bonilla. At one point, he highlighted the seven-term congressman's votes against increasing the minimum wage.

Later, Bonilla spokesman Phil Ricks defended his boss' minimum-wage votes.

DOJ_NMG_0104289

"All of the small-business owners ... tell him that if they had to pay a higher minimum wage, they would have to lay off workers in order to do that," he said. "Funny that they didn't mention that during the rally."

Bonilla spent Sunday afternoon campaigning in Hondo with Republican Sen. John Cornyn. Ricks said President Bush's nephew George P. Bush, a Dallas attorney, would make an appearance today at Bonilla's campaign headquarters at 1:30 p.m.

Bonilla emerged from the Nov. 7 seven-way special election just shy of the majority he needed to avoid a runoff. Rodriguez followed with 20 percent.

Ricks said Clinton's San Antonio stop would only help fire up Bonilla's base because of Clinton administration policies and the Monica Lewinsky scandal.

"This is someone who committed a despicable act in the Oval Office, lied about it and then got impeached," Ricks said. "And now he's campaigning side-by-side with Ciro Rodriguez."

On Friday, after learning of Clinton's plan to stop in San Antonio, Ricks said the former president was out of touch with District 23 voters.

Clinton mocked that contention at Sunday's rally, saying his administration had overseen high job growth, expansion of the middle-class and reduction in poverty.

"America is about empowerment," he said. "This election will be determined by whether people understand that."

The race is expected go to the candidate who can best fire up his base of supporters to get to the polls Tuesday — a theme Clinton and several other speakers hammered on Sunday.

"We need more people to be there on Tuesday than ever before, or we will lose," said U.S. Rep. Charlie Gonzalez, a San Antonio Democrat.

Former Mayor Henry Cisneros, who served as secretary of housing and urban development under Clinton, called last month's election results "a political earthquake." He urged the crowd to keep the Democratic momentum going.

Together, Va.'s Elite Democrats Target GOP (WP)

By Tim Craig

The Washington Post, December 11, 2006

It was Virginia Gov. Timothy M. Kaine's party, but two other Democratic stars seemed to dominate a reception in Tysons Corner last week to raise money to help unseat Republicans in the General Assembly.

Former governor Mark R. Warner and Sen.-elect James Webb arrived early and stayed late as they greeted contributors to Kaine's political action committee, which plans to help finance Democratic candidates next year.

What was unthinkable in Virginia six months ago is now the political reality: With Webb's election last month, the state has three prominent Democrats who say they are working as a team to build the party in a historically Republican state. Their first mission is trying to defeat Republicans in next year's legislative races.

"I want to use my personal energies and the energies of my office in the right sense of the word to help Tim Kaine have the right kind of majority next year," Webb told the donors, adding that he will help recruit candidates and campaign extensively for them.

Warner, one of the state's most popular politicians who recently said he will not run for president in 2008, was also schmoozing as if his own campaign were on the line.

"I clearly intend to be active in the Virginia General Assembly races," said Warner, whom political insiders mention as a possible candidate for governor or U.S. senator.

Six years ago, it appeared as if the state's Democratic Party was on the verge of irrelevancy, with Republicans having won two successive governor's races and holding both U.S. Senate seats and majorities in the Virginia House and Senate.

But today, Democrats are the ones who can point to two straight victories for governor -- Warner in 2001 and Kaine last year -- as well as Webb's narrow win over Sen. George Allen (R).

Virginia Republicans claimed some wins last month, keeping a majority of the state's congressional seats and holding on to the top Prince William County government job. But Republicans say they are worried about gains Democrats have made in recent elections.

DOJ_NMG_0104290

Despite competing in General Assembly districts whose boundaries were drawn by the GOP, Democrats have picked up seats, giving Kaine hope that the party can reclaim the Senate and make inroads in the House in 2007.

Democrats need to win four seats to reclaim the Senate and nine to 11 seats to retake the House, depending on which party three independents align with.

Legislative races are traditionally decided on local issues. But Kaine, who is frustrated by Republican efforts to stymie his plans to raise money for transportation projects, is hoping to turn next year's elections into a referendum on the GOP's priorities.

Kaine raised about $1 million at two events last week for his political action committee, Move Virginia Forward, and said he plans to campaign next year "as if my own name is on the ballot."

His political action committee has one goal, he said: "to find partners" in the General Assembly.

Republican Del. L. Scott Lingamfelter of Prince William, one of the lawmakers Democrats are targeting, said Kaine is "always focused on campaigning as opposed to governance."

"The governor has chosen the path of starting the November 2007 campaign in November 2006," Lingamfelter said. "The people want us to stop the bickering and do the people's work. All I hear from the other side is campaign, campaign, campaign."

Kaine has said he will have several initiatives in the coming year, including pushing for additional funding for health care, pre-kindergarten programs and open-space acquisition.

Virginia GOP Chairman Ed Gillespie acknowledged the strength of the Democrats.

"There is no doubt they are going to wage a very aggressive effort to retake the Senate and make gains in the House, and they are in a position to raise significant resources to fund efforts to do that, and we have to do everything we can to counter that," Gillespie said.

The Democrats plan to focus on unseating Republican lawmakers in Northern Virginia and Hampton Roads, two traffic-clogged areas where Webb and Kaine did well in their races.

In Northern Virginia, Republican Dels. Vincent F. Callahan Jr. and Timothy D. Hugo of Fairfax, Lingamfelter and Jeffrey M. Frederick, also of Prince William, can expect stiff challenges, Democratic leaders say. Senate Democrats hope to unseat Sen. Jeannemarie Devolites Davis (R-Fairfax), among others.

"We are organized and hungry," said Del. Brian J. Moran (D-Alexandria), chairman of the House Democratic Caucus. "We've had enough wins. We feel confident."

Despite recent successes, there are plenty of signs that Virginia remains anything but a Democratic-leaning state.

Although Webb beat gaffe-prone Allen by about 9,000 votes, Democrats didn't pick up any congressional seats. Voters also overwhelmingly approved a constitutional amendment banning same-sex marriage, which Kaine had campaigned against.

In Prince William, where Democrats are hoping to make gains, Republican Corey A. Stewart easily won the chairmanship of the Board of County Supervisors. Jackson H. Miller, a conservative Republican, also won a special election in Manassas to succeed the late moderate Republican Harry J. Parrish in the House.

"You had a Republican win on a positive message of low taxes and controlling growth in Prince William County," Lingamfelter said.

"We are still a right-of-center state," said Sen. R. Creigh Deeds (D-Bath), who narrowly lost his bid for attorney general last year. "While parts of Northern Virginia are blue . . . we still have a lot of work to do."

Some Democratic activists and political bloggers have been critical of the Virginia Democratic Party for not doing more to win lower-profile races by rallying the grass roots of the party.

During Webb's campaign, they noted, large parts of the party structure didn't become fully engaged until the fall, when it became clear that Allen could lose.

"Obviously, we have to do better," said Lowell Feld, founder of RaisingKaine, a blog that served as a focal point for grass-roots efforts to elect Kaine last year and Webb this year. "Webb won, but we didn't win any of the [congressional] races. . . . We are really going to have to crank it up."

Political analysts say Webb, who brought several thousand activists into the party for the first time, Kaine and Warner may prove a formidable team.

DOJ_NMG_0104291

"It's becoming almost a perfect storm for Democrats in Virginia," said Sean O'Brien, executive director of the Sorenson Institute for Political Leadership at the University of Virginia. "You got a recipe for a Democratic Party that is going to be united like you have never seen before in Virginia."

Although they have a common goal, the three might have separate motivations for becoming involved next year:

Kaine needs more Democrats in the General Assembly to further his agenda. Warner needs to continue to maintain his goodwill with Democratic activists in case he runs for governor in 2009. Webb, a former Republican, wants to test his brand of populism as well as repay Kaine for helping get him elected.

But it remains to be seen what, if any, impact Kaine, Warner and Webb will have on local races, especially in districts where voters are prone to split their tickets.

Last year, Del. David B. Albo (R-Fairfax) and Frederick won their races even though Kaine swamped Republican challenger Jerry Kilgore in their districts.

And despite pledges of unity, some Democrats say that with so many high-profile politicians on the same stage, it's only a matter of time before ego-driven divisions start to emerge.

"We'll just have to buy a bigger tent," Moran said. "It's a nice problem to have."

Washington Whispers (USNEWS)

By Paul Bedard

U.S. News and World Report, December 11, 2006

To tell the truth and shame the devil, newly minted presidential candidate Tom Vilsack's top issue of energy independence is a snoozer. Yes, yes, of course conservation, energy usage, and fuel supplies are superimportant, but it's a tough opener for the outgoing Iowa governor, who's expected to face Sens. Hillary Rodham Clinton, Barack Obama, and other Democratic superstars in 2008. That is, until he cites God's endorsement. It's right there in his church bulletin.

In two interviews, he says energy security trumps partisanship. For proof, he pulls out a tattered copy of the October 7-8 bulletin from Des Moines's St. Catherine of Siena that lists several conservation tips. "My God," he says, "this has the opportunity to unite the country." A little homework found that even local evangelical ministers were preaching energy security. "People take this notion very seriously that God has given us this gift and we have this responsibility to extend that gift," he says.

He can thank Al Gore and Sister JoAnne Talarico, the church's office manager, for the endorsement. She tells us that after St. Catherine's showed Gore's global warming movie An Inconvenient Truth, she started putting tips in the bulletin. "It would be nice," says Sister JoAnne, "if it would become a real issue." How can Vilsack thank her? Send the church some energy-saving tips of his own. "I think I've run out of all I had," she says.

A Second Act in Cyberspace

Tom DeLay's back, this time on the Internet. Friends tell us that the powerful former House majority leader, dubbed the "Hammer" for his tough persuasion tactics, this week unveils TomDeLay.com, where he'll blog-DeLay's Daily-on newsy issues and build a coalition he's calling Grassroots, Action, and Information Network. Sources said the right-leaning Texan will give GAIN members insider information on the conservative movement and urge them to step in on key issues. And Democrats need not apply: His site will have a way to filter them out.

Getting Mushy in His Fine Old Age

Those weren't tears of pain former President Bush shed last week during a tribute to his son Jeb, Florida's outgoing governor. Just the opposite. Family friends say the old guy is getting more emotional and has been prone to joyful crying jags when bragging on his kids. And-bless his heart-he doesn't try to stop it; he just lets the tears pour out. His buddies tell us that Bush, 82, also gets weepy when discussing the importance of his family and the blessings he has enjoyed throughout his life. "He has always been an emotional guy," says a pal.

What's Wrong? Don't You Trust Us?

"Oh, no you won't" is the reaction of cops and other first responders to an almost rude FBI decision to ask its Joint Terrorism Task Force members to take a lie detector test. To the FBI, it's a smart move: Since 9/11, the task force of federal and local officials has expanded to some 1,500 in over a hundred offices nationwide. But to some members it's a slap, and something that could hurt their careers if the polygraph-whose accuracy is widely questioned by scientists-burps out an error. Joining local cops in opposition are agents with the Homeland Security Department's Immigration and Customs Enforcement.

Wash. State Sees Results From 'Plain Talk' Initiative (USAT/AP)

By Rachel La Corte

USA Today, December 11, 2006

OLYMPIA, Wash. — Washington state officials want to deploy changes to alleviate state personnel's employment of acronyms, jargon and legalese that routinely pervade interfaces with constituents. Or, in plain speak: Talk to the public as you would talk to any other person — simply, and in clear language.

In the 20 months since Gov. Chris Gregoire ordered all state agencies to adopt "plain talk" principles, more than 2,000 state employees have attended classes on writing letters, announcements and documents in everyday language.

Words such as abeyance, cease and utilize are out, replaced by suspension, stop and use.

"If people are able to apply for an environmental permit and get it right the first time because they were able to understand it, that's success," said Larisa Benson, director of the Government Management Accountability and Performance program.

When people know what the government asks of them, there's a better chance they'll comply, officials have found.

For example, by rewriting one letter, the Department of Revenue tripled the number of businesses paying the "use tax," the widely ignored equivalent of sales tax on products purchased out of state. That meant an extra $800,000 collected over two years by the department, which had started its own plain-talk initiative before the governor's order.

"Simple changes can have profound results," said Janet Shimabukuro, manager of the department's taxpayer services program. "Plain talk isn't only rewriting, it's rethinking your approach and really personalizing your message to the audience and to the reader."

Though other states have done similar work, Washington state is believed to be the first to have a full-scale effort, said Thom Haller, executive director of the Center for Plain Language in Washington, D.C.

The non-profit center urges government and business officials to use clear, understandable language in laws and other public communication.

In 1997, newly elected Gov. Gary Locke issued an executive order requiring the Washington Administrative Code to be written and organized in a more simple way.

Around that time, some state agencies started using plain-language rules for training, on websites and in letters to the public.

The government of the District of Columbia started a plain-language initiative in 2004, and many federal agencies have such programs as well, Haller said.

"We're seeing them embrace it because they're recognizing that clarity in structure and language is important," he said. "It enables people to get their jobs done more efficiently."

How did state workers start speaking bureaucratic gobbledygook?

"It's almost as if we have hundreds of different tribes out there with different languages," said Dana Howard Botka, the plain-language program coordinator for Gregoire. "Knowing the language of that tribe is essential to belonging to it. There's pride in knowing the language of your profession."

Writing consultant Sharon Bridwell, who teaches up to three classes a month for state employees, said her students need help breaking old habits.

At a recent class in Olympia, Bridwell used slides and easels to write out pointers such as keeping sentences short.

Rich Coleman, a project manager with the state Employment Security Department, said he would try to be more concise in his letters to the public.

"I'm more wordy than I would like to be," said Coleman, who corresponds with prisoners or their families to help them rejoin the workforce. "It's an opportunity to see that the less I write, the more effective I am in getting the information across."

Botka said the heart of the plain-talk initiative is to get state workers to think about the person who is reading the document or the Web page before they write it.

DOJ_NMG_0104293

"We're talking about people's rights and benefits," she said. "If they can't understand them, then they really don't have access to their government."

Sponsorship Pulls Arena Into Nuclear Debate (NYT)

By Martin Stolz

New York Times, December 11, 2006

SALT LAKE CITY, Dec. 8 — Utah officials hope that the state's image can be best defined by its vast public lands and unspoiled forests, lakes and mountains.

But some here fear that a recent change in the name of the city's professional basketball arena may create for Utah new and far less savory associations with corruption and nuclear waste.

Since the arena's opening in 1991 as the home of the Utah Jazz, it was called the Delta Center, for Delta Air Lines, which struck the original deal for naming rights with Larry H. Miller, the team's owner. But in November, a hazardous waste services company based here, EnergySolutions, outbid bankrupt Delta to win a 10-year naming-rights contract.

The winning bid, the price of which neither side would disclose, has created the EnergySolutions Arena.

Steve Creamer, the company's president, is looking to overcome the negative publicity that the company, known until 10 months ago as Envirocare of Utah, has received over its operation of a large nuclear waste facility in the Utah desert.

EnergySolutions was formed in February by the merger of three companies, including Envirocare, which set up the nuclear waste facility on public land in 1988 with the approval of Larry F. Anderson, then director of the Utah Division of Radiation Control.

Mr. Anderson was later convicted on federal bribery charges of taking cash and a condominium in the resort town of Park City from Envirocare's founder and former owner, Khosrow B. Semnani. Mr. Semnani pleaded guilty to a charge of tax evasion.

The state has granted EnergySolutions a license to double the size of the low-level nuclear waste site, to about two square miles, though the approval is not final, in part because the Legislature and the governor also must have a say. But an antinuclear group, the Healthy Environment Alliance of Utah, or Heal Utah, has sued the state to revoke the license, and that is also delaying the expansion. The alliance also opposes the company's plan to expand the nuclear waste facility to a height of about eight stories.

On her way into a recent Jazz game, Leslie Birkett, a 42-year-old advertising executive from Kearns, said she had heard the nicknames for the arena: HazzMat Center, Half-Life Arena, Radium Stadium, the Tox Box.

"Utah already has enough strikes against it," Ms. Birkett said. "This is the last thing we need."

More disgusted was Tom Kessler, 66, a hard-core fan wearing a leather Jazz jacket. "Utah's always been the 'stick-it' state; whatever you don't want in your state, stick it here," said Mr. Kessler, an executive with a medical device company. "We're not tree huggers, but these guys lend credence to bringing all this stuff to Utah. It's bogus."

But another Jazz fan, Weston Anderson, 21, of West Valley City, felt differently. He first learned about the company when he passed people carrying signs at a pregame protest sponsored by Heal Utah, Mr. Anderson said. The arena's new name does not roll off the tongue, he said, "but I don't have a problem with that line of business because I believe in the free market."

The alliance has called on Mr. Miller to rescind the naming-rights deal, and on consumers to boycott his other businesses, which include car dealerships, movie theaters, a television station and an auto racetrack.

Mr. Miller issued a statement saying he was proud of his association with EnergySolutions.

Mr. Creamer has said his company is vital to Utah's future, has brought dozens of talented scientists and engineers to the state, and hopes to become a worldwide business for transporting, processing, storing and disposing of radioactive materials.

The company recently won a federal grant to study sites that might be used for reprocessing nuclear fuel, a recycling process in which plutonium is extracted from spent fuel and mixed with uranium to make new fuel.

But this year, the company had a setback with the Utah government. Gov. Jon Huntsman Jr. vetoed legislation that would have made it easier for the state to approve proposals for new or expanded nuclear waste sites.

In a letter to state legislators, Mr. Huntsman said the bill would have weakened the governor's authority "to protect Utah's image and environment." His administration has invested in strengthening Utah's image as a welcoming place for tourists, especially those attracted to outdoor activities in the state's mountains and forests. Part of that push has been a multimillion-dollar advertising campaign, "Utah: Life Elevated," featuring the state's landmarks and landscapes.

EnergySolutions also has embarked on a media campaign, emphasizing the company's environmental cleanups nationwide and the safety of its operations.

Kedrick Black, a 26-year-old electrical engineer and Jazz fan, said he learned about the company from its advertisements. "It's a good company," Mr. Black said. "Yes, they handle nuclear waste, but they're making it safer."

Vanessa Pierce, executive director of Heal Utah, does not see it quite that way. EnergySolutions' advertisements "make it look like they're curing cancer and building golf courses" and solving global warming, Ms. Pierce said. She accused the company of trying to mislead the public by promoting a wholesome image to gain support for the waste site expansion.

At the protest outside the arena, Louis Borgenicht, 64, a Salt Lake City pediatrician, told those gathered that EnergySolutions officials "are part of the problem, not, as they claim, part of the solution."

How To Bring Our Schools Out Of The 20th Century (TIME)

By Claudia Wallis, Sonja Steptoe

Time, December 11, 2006

There's a dark little joke exchanged by educators with a dissident streak: Rip Van Winkle awakens in the 21st century after a hundred-year snooze and is, of course, utterly bewildered by what he sees. Men and women dash about, talking to small metal devices pinned to their ears. Young people sit at home on sofas, moving miniature athletes around on electronic screens. Older folk defy death and disability with metronomes in their chests and with hips made of metal and plastic. Airports, hospitals, shopping malls--every place Rip goes just baffles him. But when he finally walks into a schoolroom, the old man knows exactly where he is. "This is a school," he declares. "We used to have these back in 1906. Only now the blackboards are green."

American schools aren't exactly frozen in time, but considering the pace of change in other areas of life, our public schools tend to feel like throwbacks. Kids spend much of the day as their great-grandparents once did: sitting in rows, listening to teachers lecture, scribbling notes by hand, reading from textbooks that are out of date by the time they are printed. A yawning chasm (with an emphasis on yawning) separates the world inside the schoolhouse from the world outside.

For the past five years, the national conversation on education has focused on reading scores, math tests and closing the "achievement gap" between social classes. This is not a story about that conversation. This is a story about the big public conversation the nation is not having about education, the one that will ultimately determine not merely whether some fraction of our children get "left behind" but also whether an entire generation of kids will fail to make the grade in the global economy because they can't think their way through abstract problems, work in teams, distinguish good information from bad or speak a language other than English.

This week the conversation will burst onto the front page, when the New Commission on the Skills of the American Workforce, a high-powered, bipartisan assembly of Education Secretaries and business, government and other education leaders releases a blueprint for rethinking American education from pre-K to 12 and beyond to better prepare students to thrive in the global economy. While that report includes some controversial proposals, there is nonetheless a remarkable consensus among educators and business and policy leaders on one key conclusion: we need to bring what we teach and how we teach into the 21st century.

Right now we're aiming too low. Competency in reading and math--the focus of so much No Child Left Behind (NCLB) testing--is the meager minimum. Scientific and technical skills are, likewise, utterly necessary but insufficient. Today's economy demands not only a high-level competence in the traditional academic disciplines but also what might be called 21st century skills. Here's what they are:

Knowing more about the world. Kids are global citizens now, even in small-town America, and they must learn to act that way. Mike Eskew, CEO of UPS, talks about needing workers who are "global trade literate, sensitive to foreign cultures, conversant in different languages"--not exactly strong points in the U.S., where fewer than half of high school students are enrolled in a foreign-language class and where the social-studies curriculum tends to fixate on U.S. history.

Thinking outside the box. Jobs in the new economy--the ones that won't get outsourced or automated--"put an enormous premium on creative and innovative skills, seeing patterns where other people see only chaos," says Marc Tucker, an author of the skills-commission report and president of the National Center on Education and the Economy. Traditionally that's been an American strength, but schools have become less daring in the back-to-basics climate of NCLB. Kids also must learn to think across disciplines, since that's where most new breakthroughs are made. It's interdisciplinary combinations--design and technology, mathematics and art--"that produce YouTube and Google," says Thomas Friedman, the best-selling author of The World Is Flat.

Becoming smarter about new sources of information. In an age of overflowing information and proliferating media, kids need to rapidly process what's coming at them and distinguish between what's reliable and what isn't. "It's important that students know how to manage it, interpret it, validate it, and how to act on it," says Dell executive Karen Bruett, who serves on the board of the Partnership for 21st Century Skills, a group of corporate and education leaders focused on upgrading American education.

Developing good people skills. EQ, or emotional intelligence, is as important as IQ for success in today's workplace. "Most innovations today involve large teams of people," says former Lockheed Martin CEO Norman Augustine. "We have to emphasize communication skills, the ability to work in teams and with people from different cultures."

Can our public schools, originally designed to educate workers for agrarian life and industrial-age factories, make the necessary shifts? The Skills commission will argue that it's possible only if we add new depth and rigor to our curriculum and standardized exams, redeploy the dollars we spend on education, reshape the teaching force and reorganize who runs the schools. But without waiting for such a revolution, enterprising administrators around the country have begun to update their schools, often with ideas and support from local businesses. The state of Michigan, conceding that it can no longer count on the ailing auto industry to absorb its poorly educated and low-skilled workers, is retooling its high schools, instituting what are among the most rigorous graduation requirements in the nation. Elsewhere, organizations like the Bill and Melinda Gates Foundation, the Carnegie Foundation for the Advancement of Teaching and the Asia Society are pouring money and expertise into model programs to show the way.

What It Means to Be a Global Student

Quick! How many ways can you combine nickels, dimes and pennies to get 20¢? That's the challenge for students in a second-grade math class at Seattle's John Stanford International School, and hands are flying up with answers. The students sit at tables of four manipulating play money. One boy shouts "10 plus 10"; a girl offers "10 plus 5 plus 5," only it sounds like this: "Ju, tasu, go, tasu, go." Down the hall, third-graders are learning to interpret charts and graphs showing how many hours of sleep people need at different ages. "¿Cuantas horas duerme un bebé?" asks the teacher Sabrina Storlie.

This public elementary school has taken the idea of global education and run with it. All students take some classes in either Japanese or Spanish. Other subjects are taught in English, but the content has an international flavor. The school pulls its 393 students from the surrounding highly diverse neighborhood and by lottery from other parts of the city. Generally, its scores on state tests are at or above average, although those exams barely scratch the surface of what Stanford students learn.

Before opening the school seven years ago, principal Karen Kodama surveyed 1,500 business leaders on which languages to teach (plans for Mandarin were dropped for lack of classroom space) and which skills and disciplines. "No. 1 was technology," she recalls. Even first-graders at Stanford begin to use PowerPoint and Internet tools. "Exposure to world cultures was also an important trait cited by the executives," says Kodama, so that instead of circling back to the Pilgrims and Indians every autumn, children at Stanford do social-studies units on Asia, Africa, Australia, Mexico and South America. Students actively apply the lessons in foreign language and culture by video-conferencing with sister schools in Japan, Africa and Mexico, by exchanging messages, gifts and joining in charity projects.

Stanford International shows what's possible for a public elementary school, although it has the rare advantage of support from corporations like Nintendo and Starbucks, which contribute to its $1.7 million-a-year budget. Still, dozens of U.S. school districts have found ways to orient some of their students toward the global economy. Many have opened schools that offer the international baccalaureate (I.B.) program, a rigorous, off-the-shelf curriculum recognized by universities around the world and first introduced in 1968--well before globalization became a buzzword.

DOJ_NMG_0104296

To earn an I.B. diploma, students must prove written and spoken proficiency in a second language, write a 4,000-word college-level research paper, complete a real-world service project and pass rigorous oral and written subject exams. Courses offer an international perspective, so even a lesson on the American Revolution will interweave sources from Britain and France with views from the Founding Fathers. "We try to build something we call international mindedness," says Jeffrey Beard, director general of the International Baccalaureate Organization in Geneva, Switzerland. "These are students who can grasp issues across national borders. They have an understanding of nuances and complexity and a balanced approach to problem solving." Despite stringent certification requirements, I.B. schools are growing in the U.S.--from about 350 in 2000 to 682 today. The U.S. Department of Education has a pilot effort to bring the program to more low-income students.

Real Knowledge in the Google Era

Learn the names of all the rivers in South America. That was the assignment given to Deborah Stipek's daughter Meredith in school, and her mom, who's dean of the Stanford University School of Education, was not impressed. "That's silly," Stipek told her daughter. "Tell your teacher that if you need to know anything besides the Amazon, you can look it up on Google." Any number of old-school assignments--memorizing the battles of the Civil War or the periodic table of the elements--now seem faintly absurd. That kind of information, which is poorly retained unless you routinely use it, is available at a keystroke. Still, few would argue that an American child shouldn't learn the causes of the Civil War or understand how the periodic table reflects the atomic structure and properties of the elements. As school critic E.D. Hirsch Jr. points out in his book, The Knowledge Deficit, kids need a substantial fund of information just to make sense of reading materials beyond the grade-school level. Without mastering the fundamental building blocks of math, science or history, complex concepts are impossible.

Many analysts believe that to achieve the right balance between such core knowledge and what educators call "portable skills"--critical thinking, making connections between ideas and knowing how to keep on learning--the U.S. curriculum needs to become more like that of Singapore, Belgium and Sweden, whose students outperform American students on math and science tests. Classes in these countries dwell on key concepts that are taught in depth and in careful sequence, as opposed to a succession of forgettable details so often served in U.S. classrooms. Textbooks and tests support this approach. "Countries from Germany to Singapore have extremely small textbooks that focus on the most powerful and generative ideas," says Roy Pea, co-director of the Stanford Center for Innovations in Learning. These might be the key theorems in math, the laws of thermodynamics in science or the relationship between supply and demand in economics. America's bloated textbooks, by contrast, tend to gallop through a mind-numbing stream of topics and subtopics in an attempt to address a vast range of state standards.

Depth over breadth and the ability to leap across disciplines are exactly what teachers aim for at the Henry Ford Academy, a public charter school in Dearborn, Mich. This fall, 10th-graders in Charles Dershimer's science class began a project that combines concepts from earth science, chemistry, business and design. After reading about Nike's efforts to develop a more environmentally friendly sneaker, students had to choose a consumer product, analyze and explain its environmental impact and then develop a plan for re-engineering it to reduce pollution costs without sacrificing its commercial appeal. Says Dershimer: "It's a challenge for them and for me."

A New Kind of Literacy

The juniors in Bill Stroud's class are riveted by a documentary called Loose Change unspooling on a small TV screen at the Baccalaureate School for Global Education, in urban Astoria, N.Y. The film uses 9/11 footage and interviews with building engineers and Twin Towers survivors to make an oddly compelling if paranoid case that interior explosions unrelated to the impact of the airplanes brought down the World Trade Center on that fateful day. Afterward, the students--an ethnic mix of New Yorkers with their own 9/11 memories--dive into a discussion about the elusive nature of truth.

Raya Harris finds the video more convincing than the official version of the facts. Marisa Reichel objects. "Because of a movie, you are going to change your beliefs?" she demands. "Just because people heard explosions doesn't mean there were explosions. You can say you feel the room spinning, but it isn't." This kind of discussion about what we know and how we know it is typical of a theory of knowledge class, a required element for an international-baccalaureate diploma. Stroud has posed this question to his class on the blackboard: "If truth is difficult to prove in history, does it follow that all versions are equally acceptable?"

Throughout the year, the class will examine news reports, websites, propaganda, history books, blogs, even pop songs. The goal is to teach kids to be discerning consumers of information and to research, formulate and defend their own views, says Stroud, who is founder and principal of the four-year-old public school, which is located in a repurposed handbag factory.

Classes like this, which teach key aspects of information literacy, remain rare in public education, but more and more universities and employers say they are needed as the world grows ever more deluged with information of variable quality. Last year, in response to demand from colleges, the Educational Testing Service unveiled a new, computer-based exam designed to measure information-and-communication-technology literacy. A pilot study of the test with 6,200 high school seniors and college freshmen found that only half could correctly judge the objectivity of a website. "Kids tend to go to Google and cut and paste a research report together," says Terry Egan, who led the team that developed the new test. "We kind of assumed this generation was so comfortable with technology that they know how to use it for research and deeper thinking," says Egan. "But if they're not taught these skills, they don't necessarily pick them up."

Learning 2.0

The chairman of Sun Microsystems was up against one of the most vexing challenges of modern life: a third-grade science project. Scott McNealy had spent hours searching the Web for a lively explanation of electricity that his son could understand. "Finally I found a very nice, animated, educational website showing electrons zooming around and tests after each section. We did this for about an hour and a half and had a ball--a great father-son moment of learning. All of a sudden we ran out of runway because it was a site to help welders, and it then got into welding." For McNealy the experience, three years ago, provided one of life's aha! moments: "It made me wonder why there isn't a website where I can just go and have anything I want to learn, K to 12, online, browser based and free."

Stub It Out (WP)

The Washington Post, December 11, 2006

STATE LAWMAKERS in Maryland and Virginia may have heard later than most, but the debate over the health effects of secondhand smoke is over. A landmark report by the surgeon general in the summer confirmed that breathing in smoky bars, restaurants or waiting rooms causes lung cancer and heart disease, not to mention chronic coughs, irritated nostrils and, for pregnant women who wait on tables or tend bars in smoke-filled establishments, babies with lower birth weights. The report also poured cold water on complaints from restaurant and bar owners: There is growing evidence that more people will frequent restaurants and bars when a smoking ban is in place.

Sixteen states and more than 2,000 localities have prohibited smoking in bars and restaurants; in the Maryland suburbs, they include Howard, Montgomery and Prince George's counties. But so far the Maryland General Assembly has failed to follow suit, letting bills to ban smoking in such workplaces statewide die the last four years -- lately in cliffhanger votes. An attempt planned for the legislative session starting in January should stand the best chance yet of enactment -- especially if Gov.-elect Martin O'Malley (D) throws his weight behind it.

As mayor of Baltimore, Mr. O'Malley opposed citywide smoking prohibitions, saying a statewide ban makes more sense. But now, as he prepares to move into the governor's office, he's being coy; after all, say his aides, Mr. O'Malley never committed himself to any statewide smoking ban as a candidate. That sort of caution worked well for Mr. O'Malley on the campaign trail, but as governor he will need to be more resolute. The outgoing governor, Robert L. Ehrlich Jr. (R), opposed a ban, thereby dissuading fence-sitting lawmakers from taking a chance on the bill. By backing a ban, Mr. O'Malley could tip the scales toward enactment and have a tangible, near-term impact on public health in Maryland. If, as he is fond of saying, Mr. O'Malley has no higher priority than to save lives, this is one sure way to do it.

In Virginia, the nation's third-leading tobacco-growing state, prospects for a smoking ban are cloudier. Although the state Senate passed such a prohibition last year for the first time, the measure was opposed by Gov. Timothy M. Kaine (D) as overly broad -- it included a wide range of public places, plus most hotel rooms -- and it died in the House of Delegates. Mr. Kaine understands that secondhand smoke can kill you; in October he ordered a ban on smoking in most state government office buildings. And he says that he would be willing to consider a bill that reaches his desk, depending on its scope. But that, unfortunately, is as far as he'll go.

DOJ_NMG_0104298

More forthright leadership is needed. Restaurants are prohibited from serving poisonous food, so why should they be able to subject customers to toxic air? Moreover, smoking no longer has the constituency it once did as the number of smokers nationally, and in Maryland and Virginia, has fallen in recent years, thanks to the higher cost of cigarettes and aggressive publicity campaigns. And the hospitality industry's arguments about the economic peril posed by smoking bans have crumpled like a used pack of Winstons.

Perhaps a careful reading of the surgeon general's report will help convince Maryland and Virginia governors and other officeholders that the time is right to get serious about secondhand smoke. Then-Surgeon General Richard H. Carmona said in June: "Smoke-free environments are the only approach that effectively protects nonsmokers from the dangers of secondhand smoke."

Life-or-death Data (LAT)

The Los Angeles Times, December 11, 2006

YOUR MEDICAL RECORDS can save your life, or they can almost kill you. So the prospect of making them more easily accessible is at once comforting and scary — and a new effort to convert them into digital form will raise the stakes on both counts.

It's not hard to understand why. Suppose you're on vacation and become so ill you have to go to the hospital. Without your medical records, you could be given a drug that interacts badly with one you're already taking. Now imagine the same scenario, only this time you have access to all your medical and insurance records electronically. The physician examines them and gives you an appropriate drug. You recover nicely.

Now imagine a third possibility: You have your medical records — and they're not completely accurate. You get a drug you're allergic to, become even more sick and have to be admitted. Before long, lawyers become involved, subpoenaing everyone from your insurer to the datamanagement company that keeps your records.

Technology giveth, and technology taketh away. This country's medical recordkeeping system is undoubtedly outdated and inefficient, and bringing it into the 21st century will be a huge improvement. But it will create new problems as it solves old ones, and some problems it simply will port over to the digital age.

Five major U.S. corporations — Applied Materials, BP America, Intel, Pitney Bowes and Wal-Mart — who provide health benefits to 2.5 million people announced plans last week to gather employees' records from medical groups, hospitals, insurers and laboratories, then store them online. Employees can add or delete information to correct errors and fill in blanks. The main objective of the program, called Dossia and run by the nonprofit Omnimedix Institute, is to help them give complete, accurate information to their healthcare providers.

The most immediate benefit of this program, and others like it, may be to show how complex the problem is. For starters, the entire healthcare industry has to digitize its records and put them in a standard format that any doctor or hospital can use — a gargantuan task. Then there has to be a way for individuals to correct errors in the records without rendering them unreliable. The error rate is particularly high for insurance records — from 7% to 15%, according to various estimates.

Protecting health records from hackers and identity thieves is another challenge. Information brokers pay top dollar for health information — reportedly $50 per record, compared to less than $2 for a Social Security number — because they are so valuable to so many entities: drug companies, insurers, medical underwriters, health researchers and employers, to name a few.

There are scores of new initiatives such as Dossia, and all of them have weaknesses. Some appear to be good-faith efforts to give people more control over their own records and doctors access to better information. Others seem like thinly veiled marketing vehicles for drug makers and others in the healthcare industry.

To its credit, Dossia got two important things right. It won't collect employees' records without their permission. And it says it won't supply those records to anyone but the employee (or authorized family member), sacrificing some efficiency for security. Eventually, perhaps, the program will show the way to have both. The most important contribution Dossia is likely to make, though, is that it will show how much more work needs to be done throughout the industry to solve the medical records morass in a way that works for doctors and patients alike.

Two Mommies Is One Too Many (TIME)

By James C. Dobson

Time, December 11, 2006

A number of social conservatives, myself included, have recently been asked to respond to the news that Mary Cheney, the Vice President's daughter, is pregnant with a child she intends to raise with her lesbian partner. Implicit in this issue is an effort to get us to criticize the Bush Administration or the Cheney family. But the concern here has nothing to do with politics. It is about what kind of family environment is best for the health and development of children, and, by extension, the nation at large.

With all due respect to Cheney and her partner, Heather Poe, the majority of more than 30 years of social-science evidence indicates that children do best on every measure of well-being when raised by their married mother and father. That is not to say Cheney and Poe will not love their child. But love alone is not enough to guarantee healthy growth and development. The two most loving women in the world cannot provide a daddy for a little boy--any more than the two most loving men can be complete role models for a little girl.

The voices that argue otherwise tell us more about our politically correct culture than they do about what children really need. The fact remains that gender matters--perhaps nowhere more than in regard to child rearing. The unique value of fathers has been explained by Dr. Kyle Pruett of Yale Medical School in his book Fatherneed: Why Father Care Is as Essential as Mother Care for Your Child. Pruett says dads are critically important simply because "fathers do not mother." Psychology Today explained in 1996 that "fatherhood turns out to be a complex and unique phenomenon with huge consequences for the emotional and intellectual growth of children." A father, as a male parent, makes unique contributions to the task of parenting that a mother cannot emulate, and vice versa.

According to educational psychologist Carol Gilligan, mothers tend to stress sympathy, grace and care to their children, while fathers accent justice, fairness and duty. Moms give a child a sense of hopefulness; dads provide a sense of right and wrong and its consequences. Other researchers have determined that boys are not born with an understanding of "maleness." They have to learn it, ideally from their fathers.

But set aside the scientific findings for a minute. Isn't there something in our hearts that tells us, intuitively, that children need a mother and a father? Admittedly, that ideal is not always possible. Divorce, death, abandonment and unwed pregnancy have resulted in an ever growing number of single-parent families in this culture. We admire the millions of men and women who have risen to the challenge of parenting alone and are meeting their difficult responsibilities with courage and determination. Still, most of them, if asked, would say that raising children is a two-person job best accomplished by a mother and father.

In raising these issues, Focus on the Family does not desire to harm or insult women such as Cheney and Poe. Rather, our conviction is that birth and adoption are the purview of married heterosexual couples. Traditional marriage is God's design for the family and is rooted in biblical truth. When that divine plan is implemented, children have the best opportunity to thrive. That's why public policy as it relates to families must be based not solely on the desires of adults but rather on the needs of children and what is best for society at large.

This is a lesson we should have learned from no-fault divorce. Because adults wanted to dissolve difficult marriages with fewer strings attached, reformers made it easier in the late 1960s to dissolve nuclear families. Though there are exceptions, the legacy of no-fault divorce is countless shattered lives within three generations, adversely affecting children's behavior, academic performance and mental and physical health. No-fault divorce reflected our selfish determination to do what was convenient for adults, and it has been, on balance, a disaster.

We should not enter into yet another untested and far-reaching social experiment, this one driven by the desires of same-sex couples to bear and raise children. The traditional family, supported by more than 5,000 years of human experience, is still the foundation on which the well-being of future generations depends. Name That Source (NYT)

By Murray Fromson

The New York Times, December 11, 2006

Los Angeles

DOJ_NMG_0104300

THE article was headlined "Vietnam: The Signs of Stalemate," and it appeared on the front page of this paper on Aug. 7, 1967. Written by R. W. Apple Jr., it was a bombshell that resonated in both Washington and Saigon, caused consternation in the United States Army and the intelligence community and gradually altered perceptions of American success or failure for the remainder of the Vietnam War.

Over nearly four decades, dozens of historians and journalists asked Johnny (as he was known) and me, because I did a similar story for CBS, to identify our source for that report, and we steadfastly declined to name him. But now, the source has come forward to release us from our pledge of confidentiality.

In 1967, when I was a CBS News correspondent in Vietnam, I met an American general at a cocktail party in Saigon. He whispered to me: "Westy just doesn't get it. The war is unwinnable. We've reached a stalemate and we should find a dignified way out." He was referring to Gen. William Westmoreland, the commander of United States forces in Vietnam.

The reception was crowded and noisy, and I asked whether I could meet with him at another time. "O.K., but no cameras," he replied. Might I bring another reporter with me? "O.K., but one only." I had advised CBS News in New York that I probably had an important story to report but that it would be what we used to call a standupper on camera with no film. The reaction was decidedly cool. Had Walter Cronkite or Mike Wallace been available, such a report might have led "The CBS Evening News." On the other hand, I guessed — correctly — that once it appeared in The Times, the universal scream would be for me to match it.

So I ambled up Tu Do Street to Johnny's office and invited him to come along. We took a helicopter ride into the Mekong Delta and then spent two hours with one of the more erudite general officers either of us had ever met in Vietnam.

The general pledged us to absolute confidentiality. Later, when Johnny and I compared notes to ensure we had understood him correctly, both of us were stunned. His article was published 24 hours later. Mine, in the era before satellites, reached CBS News in New York days later. Here, in essence, is how we quoted the general for our reports:

" 'I've destroyed a single division three times,' a senior American general said the other day. 'I've chased main-force units all over the country and the impact was zilch. It meant nothing to the people. Unless a more positive and more stirring theme than simple anti-communism can be found, the war appears likely to go on until someone gets tired and quits, which could take generations.' " The report enraged President Lyndon Johnson, General Westmoreland and, as I recall it, Gen. Earle Wheeler, the chairman of the Joint Chiefs of Staff. Johnson then initiated action to call up an additional 205,000 troops for the coming war against the North Vietnamese. But the action was negated by the misleading perception many of us had that the Communists achieved a major victory in the Tet offensive, which began on Jan. 30, 1968.

The "stalemate" story re-surfaced in 1984, when Westmoreland filed a multibillion-dollar libel suit against CBS News for a report that said the general had knowingly understated the strength of North Vietnamese and Vietcong forces to make it appear that victory was in sight. David Boies, CBS's lead lawyer, remembers asking Westmoreland: "General, I want to read you an excerpt from a story reported by R. W. Apple in The New York Times on Aug. 7, 1967. In it, Mr. Apple refers to an American general who said the war is unwinnable. What about that, General Westmoreland?"

The normally composed Westmoreland, then retired, was shaking as he replied, "No general of mine would ever have said that." I called Mr. Boies's office the following day and told one of his associates that the general in question had said it not once, but twice — the first time in my conversation with him in Saigon.

In 1995, on the 20th anniversary of the war's end, I was invited to participate in a Freedom Forum discussion in Oakland, Calif. With Johnny's knowledge, I called our source to ask whether he might release us from our pledge of confidentiality so that we could set the record straight. He was hesitant. "Westy is an old friend," he said, "and I would not want to hurt or embarrass him. Let's wait until he's no longer with us."

Westmoreland died in 2005. The officer in question, then a three-star general, now 90 years old and retired and living in Hawaii, is Frederick Weyand. General Weyand was a distinguished combat officer and commander of III Corps in the Mekong Delta who later supervised the American withdrawal from Vietnam and then became United States Army Chief of Staff. Last week, in the interest of historical accuracy, I called to tell him about the coming memorial service for Johnny. I told him Johnny had described the "stalemate" piece as the most important story he'd ever done, and I was renewing my request for a release from the pledge of confidentiality we had given him 40 years ago. He agreed.

I believe both Johnny and I were struck, in 1967, by General Weyand's sober, intellectual analysis of the problems facing both the Americans and the Vietnamese. So many years later, I suspect there may be other officers of his caliber who are thinking about the contradictions in yet another war.

There is, of course, no way of determining how much of an impact the "stalemate" story had on Lyndon Johnson's decision to abandon plans to seek re-election in 1968. The daring of the Communists' Tet offensive undoubtedly swung American public opinion irreversibly. But to me, writ larger, our reports demonstrated how important it was and is for journalists to offer pledges of confidentiality to credible sources in order to report the kind of stories officials normally are reluctant to discuss. It was essential during the Vietnam War, as it is essential today in Iraq.

The Media Is In Need Of Some Mending (WSJ)

By Peter R. Kann

The Wall Street Journal, December 11, 2006

Thomas Jefferson, a better president than we've had in a very long time, penned a line back in 1787: "Were it left to me to decide whether we should have a government without newspapers or newspapers without government, I would not hesitate a moment to prefer the latter." By 1807, in his seventh year as president and after seven years of being subjected to severe press criticism, he wrote: "I deplore the putrid state into which our newspapers have passed, and the malignity, the vulgarity and the mendacious spirit of those who write them."

You'll be relieved to know that Jefferson did remain true to his primary principle: "The press," he concluded, "is an evil for which there is no remedy. Liberty depends upon freedom of the press and that cannot be limited without being lost." He was right then, and we are right now, to prefer a free press, however flawed, to any controlled alternative. Still, as we watched CNN flashing its pre-election logos each day -- "Broken Borders," "Broken Government," "Broken Politics," Broken Everything -- I can't help thinking the media, too, is in need of some mending.

At its best news informs and enlightens the citizens of a free society and thereby safeguards and strengthens our democracy. At its worst -- dishonest, unfair, irresponsible -- the media has potential to erode the public trust on which its own success depends and to corrode the democratic system of which it is so indispensably a part. So, let me touch on 10 current trends in the mass media that ought to disturb us.

The blurring of the lines between journalism and entertainment. Journalism that puts too high a priority on entertaining is almost destined to distort and mislead. Compounding this confusion is a diffusing definition of "journalist." When political operatives moonlight at moderating news shows, when people alternate between being political editors and political consultants, when celebrity newspeople pocket $20,000 fees speaking at corporate conventions while criticizing congressman for conflicts of interest -- we jumble public perceptions of newspeople as well as news.

The blurring of lines between news and opinion. Newspapers have a format that helps maintain the distinction. The Internet, TV and most magazines have neither that format nor that tradition. The result is a blending of news and views. The two are not ingredients to mix together for a tastier meal, they are different courses. Part of the problem here lies in fashionable new philosophies that argue there are no basic values of right and wrong, that news is merely a matter of views. It's a dangerous philosophy for our society and a dagger at the heart of genuine journalism.

The blending of news and advertising, sponsorships or other commercial relationships. The resulting porridges may be called "advertorials" or "infomercials"; they may be special sections masquerading as news, news pages driven by commercial interests, or Web pages where everything somehow is selling something. Without clear distinctions between news and advertising, readers or viewers lose confidence in the veracity of a news medium. And advertisers lose the business benefit of an environment of trust.

The problems and pitfalls inherent in pack journalism. Individually, most reporters are decent, dedicated, fair-minded people. But the press, en masse, tends to lose its common sense and its sense of fairness and independence and what we see all too often is the spectacle of a pack of hounds in pursuit of a quarry. We frequently see this phenomenon in political reporting, where the faintest whiff of scandal, or even of weakness, can send the pack in pursuit. At its worst, the pack, not finding a real problem, proclaims the "perception" of one and this perception becomes self-fulfilling.

The issue of conflict and context. On most issues most Americans are not on polar extremes. On abortion, for example, most seek a sensible center. Where is that center reflected in media coverage that mainly portrays rabid feminists or irate pro-life activists? Balance is not achieved by the talk show format of two extremists yelling at each other. And how many of us recognize our own communities from their depiction on local TV news shows -- a nonstop montage of mayhem, murder, rape, arson, child molestation and more?

The exaggerated tendency toward pessimism. Just look back a few years over much of the media coverage of "American competitiveness." All those news magazine covers on the coming "Japanese Century." And along with it, all the pessimism about the ability of U.S. industry to compete globally. It was nonsense. Similarly, it's one thing -- and an appropriate one -- for the press to probe particular instances of political corruption. It's quite another thing to jump to the cynical conclusion that our political process, and all politicians, are corrupted -- that "they all do it." They don't, and they aren't. Skepticism and criticism are essential to the media's role; reflexive pessimism is not.

The growing media fascination with the bizarre, the perverse and the pathological -- John Mark Karr journalism. Such so-called journalism helps instantly legitimize crackpot ideas, deviant behavior, or alleged victimization in our society. My point is not to argue for "good news" vs. "bad news," but to ask whether much of this amounts to news at all?

Social orthodoxy, or political correctness. These are reflected in a media whose job is not to parrot prevailing fashions, but to question, probe and thereby challenge them. Businessmen are not, by definition, greedy, and environmentalists, by definition, saintly. Third World poverty is not, by definition, a result of overpopulation as opposed to inane economic policies. And so on.

The media's short attention span. As the press hops from Baghdad to Beirut, Natalee Holloway to Valerie Plame, Super Bowls to Super Tuesdays, it justifiably can blame some combination of the nature of the news and the short attention span of the public. The public, meanwhile, bombarded and bewildered can blame a fickle and shallow press. There are too many instant celebrities. Too many two-day crises. Too many "defining moments" from people in search of instant history. In a world where everything is considered critical, nothing needs to be taken very seriously.

The matter of power. The press is at least partially responsible for greater public skepticism toward traditional institutions in America. But the truth, not lost on our public, is that the press is a large and powerful institution, too: "60 Minutes" is more powerful than almost all of the subjects it exposes. This newspaper, arguably, has more influence on national economic policy than do most corporations. Networks are owned by giant industrial corporations, magazines by entertainment conglomerates, and most newspapers by national chains. Given these realties, we cannot plausibly pretend to be a David out there smiting Goliaths and expect the public to believe it.

Annan To Blast U.S. In Farewell (USAT)

By Barbara Slavin

USA Today, December 11, 2006

In a farewell speech on U.S. soil today, retiring United Nations Secretary-General Kofi Annan plans to deliver a tough critique of President Bush's policies. He will accuse the administration of trying to secure the United States from terrorism in part by dominating other nations through force, committing what he termed human rights abuses and taking military action without broad international support.

Though Annan has long been a critic of the war in Iraq and other Bush foreign policies, the planned speech is among his toughest and is unusual for a U.N. secretary-general concluding his tenure.

Annan's remarks, provided to USA TODAY by his office, list principles for international relations, among them "respect for human rights and the rule of law."

These ideas can be advanced only "if America remains true to its principles, including in the struggle against terrorism," the speech says. "When it appears to abandon its own ideals and objectives, its friends abroad are naturally troubled and confused."

In the 61-year history of the U.N., no secretary-general has ended his tenure by criticizing U.S. policies so sharply, said Stanley Meisler, a historian of the United Nations and author of a new biography of Annan.

DOJ_NMG_0104303

Ric Grennell, spokesman for the U.S. mission to the U.N., said he would not discuss the remarks prior to their delivery. John Bolton, outgoing U.S. ambassador to the U.N., also declined to comment.

In his speech, Annan refers to the U.S.-led invasion of Iraq. When "military force is used, the world at large will consider it legitimate only when convinced that it is being used for the right purpose … in accordance with broadly accepted norms."

The speech continues that "governments must be accountable for their actions in the international arena, as well as in the domestic one."

The speech, to be delivered at the presidential library of the late Harry Truman in Independence, Mo., contrasts Truman's support for the United Nations with the Bush administration's unilateral actions.

Annan acknowledges terrorism and other global threats but cautions against nations acting alone. "Against such threats as these, no nation can make itself secure by seeking supremacy over all others," the speech says.

Annan leaves office Dec. 31 and will be replaced by former South Korean foreign minister Ban Ki Moon.

Annan's predecessor, Boutros Boutros-Ghali, developed a personal hostility toward then-U.S. ambassador to the U.N. Madeleine Albright, but saved his anger for a book after he left office, Meisler said.

The United States supported Annan for the job 10 years ago, when it blocked Boutros-Ghali from serving a second five-year term. Annan has worked with the United States on a number of issues, including U.N. reform, said Lee Feinstein, a U.N. expert at the Council on Foreign Relations.

Critics of Annan in Congress, including Sen. Norm Coleman, R-Minn., faulted the Ghana-born, U.S.-educated diplomat for lax management of the $64 billion U.N. oil-for-food program. The 1996-2003 effort was tainted by $1.5 billion in kickbacks to the regime of Saddam Hussein.

"Annan's legacy will be one of missed opportunity and failed leadership," said Coleman, who urged Annan to resign last year.

What I've Learned (WP)

By Kofi A. Annan

Washington Post, December 11, 2006

Nearly 50 years ago, when I arrived in Minnesota as a student fresh from Africa, I had much to learn -- starting with the fact that there is nothing wimpish about wearing earmuffs when it is 15 degrees below zero. All my life since has been a learning experience. Now I want to pass on five lessons I have learned during 10 years as secretary general of the United Nations that I believe the community of nations needs to learn as it confronts the challenges of the 21st century.

First, in today's world we are all responsible for each other's security. Against such threats as nuclear proliferation, climate change, global pandemics or terrorists operating from safe havens in failed states, no nation can make itself secure by seeking supremacy over all others. Only by working to make each other secure can we hope to achieve lasting security for ourselves. This responsibility includes our shared responsibility to protect people from genocide, war crimes, ethnic cleansing and crimes against humanity. That was accepted by all nations at last year's U.N. summit. But when we look at the murder, rape and starvation still being inflicted on the people of Darfur, we realize that such doctrines remain pure rhetoric unless those with the power to intervene effectively -- by exerting political, economic or, in the last resort, military muscle -- are prepared to take the lead. It also includes a responsibility to future generations to preserve resources that belong to them as well as to us. Every day that we do nothing, or too little, to prevent climate change imposes higher costs on our children.

Second, we are also responsible for each other's welfare. Without a measure of solidarity, no society can be truly stable. It is not realistic to think that some people can go on deriving great benefits from globalization while billions of others are left in, or thrown into, abject poverty. We have to give all our fellow human beings at least a chance to share in our prosperity.

Third, both security and prosperity depend on respect for human rights and the rule of law. Throughout history human life has been enriched by diversity, and different communities have learned from each other. But if our communities are to live in peace we must stress also what unites us: our common humanity and the need for our human dignity and rights to be protected by law.

That is vital for development, too. Both foreigners and a country's own citizens are more likely to invest when their basic rights are protected and they know they will be fairly treated under the law. Policies that genuinely favor development are more likely to be adopted if the people most in need of development can make their voice heard. States need to play by the rules toward each other, as well. No community suffers from too much rule of law; many suffer from too little -- and the international community is among them.

My fourth lesson, therefore, is that governments must be accountable for their actions, in the international as well as the domestic arena. Every state owes some account to other states on which its actions have a decisive impact. As things stand, poor and weak states are easily held to account, because they need foreign aid. But large and powerful states, whose actions have the greatest impact on others, can be constrained only by their own people.

That gives the people and institutions of powerful states a special responsibility to take account of global views and interests. And today they need to take into account also what we call "non-state actors." States can no longer -- if they ever could -- confront global challenges alone. Increasingly, they need help from the myriad types of association in which people come together voluntarily, to profit or to think about, and change, the world.

How can states hold each other to account? Only through multilateral institutions. So my final lesson is that those institutions must be organized in a fair and democratic way, giving the poor and the weak some influence over the actions of the rich and the strong.

Developing countries should have a stronger voice in international financial institutions, whose decisions can mean life or death for their people. New permanent or long-term members should be added to the U.N. Security Council, whose current membership reflects the reality of 1945, not of today.

No less important, all the Security Council's members must accept the responsibility that comes with their privilege. The council is not a stage for acting out national interests. It is the management committee of our fledgling global security system.

More than ever, Americans, like the rest of humanity, need a functioning global system. Experience has shown, time and again, that the system works poorly when the United States remains aloof but it functions much better when there is farsighted U.S. leadership.

That gives American leaders of today and tomorrow a great responsibility. The American people must see that they live up to it.

The writer, secretary general of the United Nations, will leave office Dec. 31. This article is based on an address he will give today at the Truman Presidential Museum & Library in Independence, Mo.

Bolton's Spot May Sit Empty For Months (WP)

By Al Kamen

The Washington Post, December 11, 2006

It's beginning to look like the post of U.S. ambassador to the United Nations is once again going to be vacant for several months. John Bolton's recess appointment ended over the weekend -- he's said to be heading back to his perch at the American Enterprise Institute -- and there's still no white smoke from the White House on a successor.

Unless President Bush uses his recess appointment powers once again, a new ambassador probably won't make it through the Senate much before March, and that's if the eventual nominee isn't controversial.

The front-runners these days of course include our man in Baghdad, Zalmay Khalilzad, any number of losing GOP House and Senate candidates -- starting with outgoing Ohio Sen. Mike DeWine-- to veteran diplomat and Chicago lawyer Richard Williamson, who had been a top official at the mission a few years back.

For the moment, though, career diplomat Alejandro Wolf, now No. 2 in New York, looks to be acting ambassador for a bit.

Meanwhile, Rich Grinnell, who holds the record for longevity as top spokesman at the mission -- five years and two months -- is likely to be moving on. He was spokesman for ambassadors John D. Negroponte, John C. Danforth and Bolton. It is unclear what's going to happen to Bolton's unusually large six-member staff in his spacious office in Foggy Bottom.Farewell, Weldon

Outgoing Rep. Curt Weldon (R-Pa.), a cherished Loop favorite, waxed eloquent at his last hearing of the House Armed Service Committee Thursday, going on for a good 20 minutes about how he and the committee can take credit for, among other things: a "normalized relationship" with Libya; two meetings with the North Koreans despite Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice doing "everything she could to stop us"; ensuring the unmanned drone "Predator would be armed"; developing "missile defense"; and, negotiating "the framework to end the Kosovo War."

"I am the troublemaker," he said proudly, maybe losing his seat because of his "pushing the envelope." Or perhaps it was those FBI agents searching his offices? "And God willing, I'll be going back to North Korea in the next two months to continue that dialogue," he vowed.

So the six-party talks will be seven-party talks?

Gonna miss him a lot.A Few Words on Terror

Everyone but Michigan football fans mark your calendars. On Dec. 13, author John Mueller is appearing at a Cato Institute forum to discuss his book "Overblown: How Politicians and the Terrorism Industry Inflate National Security Threats, and Why We Believe Them." Mueller, our invite says, holds the Woody Hayes Chair of National Security Studies at Ohio State University.Time to Move On Ron Bonjean, the highly regarded communications director for House Speaker J. Dennis Hastert (R-Ill.) and before that public affairs director at the Commerce Department, is moving over to the Senate side to be executive director of the Senate Republican Conference. Bonjean earlier served as press secretary to then-Senate Majority Leader Trent Lott (R-Miss.) and communications director to then-Rep. J.C. Watts (R-Okla.), and before that worked for several other House members.

Republican aides are moving around, going private, in large part because Democrats have taken over. But Democratic staffers are also moving to the private sector. Lloyd Ritter, formerly Washington representative for the Union of Concerned Scientists and more recently point man on renewable energy for Sen. Tom Harkin (D-Iowa) on the Agriculture, Nutrition and Forestry Committee, is off to do green-energy consulting.Is There an Ambassador in the House?

It's not often that famous guests pop in on House committee Christmas parties, but one celebrity came early and stayed late Thursday evening at the House Judiciary gathering. He was even recognized -- to a brief round of applause -- during remarks by incoming committee chairman Rep. John Conyers Jr. (D-Mich.).

The honored guest? Former ambassador Joseph C. Wilson IV, he of the Iraqi yellowcake and the Valerie Plame controversies. Didn't somebody named Pelosi say impeachment was off the table?Party Faux Pas, Averted

Finally, Pentagon folks note that all those Dec. 15 Christmas parties could have caused logistical and security nightmares if someone like President Bush or Vice President Cheney were to show up that day, outgoing Secretary of Defense Donald Rumsfeld's last, to pay their respects. So they really had to be moved to other days. It wasn't just that everyone would be seen partying the day he left.

U.S. May Soon Seek Iran Sanctions Vote (AP)

By George Jahn

AP, December 11, 2006

The U.S. and its closest Western allies may soon call a vote on U.N. Security Council sanctions against Iran, even at the risk that Russia and China may abstain or veto the measures, officials said Sunday.

"They're talking about a vote as soon as possible," a U.S. official said of plans by the Americans, French and British. He and other diplomats and representatives of Western governments spoke to The Associated Press on condition of anonymity because they were not authorized to divulge Western strategies on Iran.

The decision to risk a Russian and Chinese veto would reflect recognition by the five permanent Security Council members that they cannot agree on a common approach to dealing with concerns that Iran might be seeking to develop nuclear arms.

That would mean a serious setback to months of efforts by six world powers — the five permanent members plus Germany — to act in concert in getting Iran to freeze its uranium enrichment activities either, through enticements or the threat of punitive U.N. action.

In a fresh bid to win Russian and Chinese support, France and Britain circulated a revised U.N. resolution Friday narrowing proposed sanctions.

DOJ_NMG_0104306

The new draft still would ban the supply of materials and technology that could contribute to Iran's nuclear and missile programs, but it spells out in much greater detail what items are prohibited. Russia and China had complained that the proposed sanctions in the original draft were too broad.

The new draft keeps a travel ban and asset freeze on companies, individuals and organizations involved in Iran's nuclear and missile programs, measures Russia opposes.

Russia and China, which have major commercial ties with Iran, have continued to push for dialogue instead of U.N. punishment, despite the collapse in October of an EU attempt to entice Iran into talks.

Russia proposed major changes to the original European text, including limiting sanctions to measures that would keep Iran from developing nuclear weapons and missiles. Russia also proposed eliminating any travel ban, asset freeze or mention of the nuclear facility being built by the Russians at Bushehr, Iran.

The new European draft drops all mention of Bushehr, which is projected to go on line in late 2007 and would be Iran's first atomic power plant. It still would limit technical assistance to Iran by the Vienna-based International Atomic Energy Agency, and urge countries to prevent Iranian students from studying nuclear-related disciplines.

A second U.S. official said the Russians now want even more concessions. He said Moscow was insisting that any resolution not mention tentative Russian plans to build a second reactor for the Iranians. As well, the Russians want to limit any sanctions to three months, after which they would be reviewed, the official said.

These and other demands were resulting in "a lot of frustration" within the Western camp, he said.

He said Washington was expecting "enough compromise to get it down to the level where the Russians (and Chinese) won't veto." But he acknowledged that the risk of rejection by the two countries could not be ruled out.

"If we cannot get an agreement on sanctions that are effective, we would want to table a resolution and take the chance of an abstention, or a veto," he said.

Ambassadors from the six countries were expected to discuss the new draft early next week, possibly Monday.

Iran maintains its nuclear program is purely peaceful, aimed solely at producing nuclear energy, but the U.S. and the Europeans believe Tehran's enrichment activities are ultimately aimed at producing nuclear weapons.

Reflecting fresh Iranian defiance of Security Council demands, President Mahmoud Ahmadinejad said Saturday that his country had begun installing 3,000 uranium enriching centrifuges, which would give the program the capability to make fuel for power generation — or the fissile material for nuclear warheads.

When the State Department recently asked the CIA for names of Iranians who could be sanctioned for their involvement in a clandestine nuclear weapons program, the agency refused, citing a large workload and a desire to protect its sources and tradecraft.

Frustrated, the State Department assigned a junior Foreign Service officer to find the names another way -- by using Google. Those with the most hits under search terms such as "Iran and nuclear," three officials said, became targets for international rebuke Friday when a sanctions resolution circulated at the United Nations.

Policymakers and intelligence officials have always struggled when it comes to deciding how and when to disclose secret information, such as names of Iranians with suspected ties to nuclear weapons. In some internal debates, policymakers win out and intelligence is made public to further political or diplomatic goals. In other cases, such as this one, the intelligence community successfully argues that protecting information outweighs the desires of some to share it with the world.

But that argument can also put the U.S. government in the awkward position of relying, in part, on an Internet search to select targets for international sanctions.
